"They were nevertheless the authorized agents of the corporate petitioners, * * * to sell the books. The misrepresentations they made were at least within the apparent scope of their authority and part of the inducement by which were made sales that inured to the benefit of the corporate petitioner. Unsuccessful efforts by the principal to prevent such misrepresentations by agents will not put the principal beyond the reach of the Federal Trade Commission Act." [19] (Italics added.)

In the case before us the petitioner himself, in his testimony, states that the weavers' course was sold almost entirely through salesmen all over the United States and Canada. The salesmen who, at times, numbered as many as eighty, were secured through advertisements in national trade and specialty magazines. They were supplied with a sales kit paid for by them. They were not trained to teach the course, but to sell it. They were furnished with credentials showing them to be representatives of the petitioner. The course was prepared and mailed by the petitioner and the contract of purchase of the course was made with the petitioner by the salesmen. So, regardless of the manner in which these salespersons may have been designated in contracts between them and the petitioner or were carried on his books, so far as the public was concerned, they were his authorized agents and acted not only within the apparent but also within the actual scope of their authority. And the Commission was right in holding him responsible for their acts.

IV

Cessation of Business

Before discussing specific objections to the findings, we dispose of the contention that the petitioner is no longer engaged in the business and, that, for this reason, the Order to Cease and Desist should be set aside and no order for its enforcement be issued by this Court.

At the first hearing the petitioner, while stating that for reasons of health, his operations have been suspended, added that "he might want to resume the business under another set-up." At the final hearing, he testified that he had sold the assets to a corporation named Weavers' Guild, Inc., which took over the salesmen and the materials used in making the sales as of December 31, 1953. The incorporators were the petitioner's daughter, her husband and a former employee. The petitioner receives a royalty for the use of the course. He has stated that he continues to act in an advisory capacity "at any time they want me". A letter dated April 20, 1954, was admittedly signed with his name as "Director" and was sent by his direction by an employee of the corporation.

Instances exist where courts have modified cease and desist orders directed against corporations which had been dissolved under state law and were no longer in business.[20] Nevertheless, as one of the aims of the statute is to prevent unfair and deceptive practices, orders will be sustained even when it is clearly shown that the practices have actually been abandoned.[21] The cogent and obvious reason is that there is no guarantee that the practice might not be resumed.[22]

In accord with these cases, this Court has approved the inclusion of an officer of a corporation in such an order when necessary.

> "to make it fully effective in preventing the practices it found illegal." [23]

And courts, generally, will sustain orders directed against the persons who manage and control a corporate body in order to prevent resumption of unlawful practices.[24] This accords with the general attitude of the courts to respect the judgment of regulatory agencies as to the scope of an order if it appears that it could reasonably have concluded that the order was necessary.[25]

In view of the facts recited, the Commission was within its authority in concluding that the change in the relationship was more apparent than real and that too much reliance should not be placed on a promise of discontinuance of activities or participation in them by the petitioner.

V

The Challenge to the Findings

In considering the challenge to the Findings, we state generally that a study of the record leads to the conclusion that there is substantial evidence in it, considered as a whole, to sustain them all,[26] in accordance with the standards which the Supreme Court has laid down.[27] We speak of these Findings as the Findings of the Commission. In reality, they were the Findings of the Hearing Examiner which the Commission, on appeal, adopted as their own, with one exception.

In what follows, we shall review some of the evidence relating to the Findings under attack.

A. The Use of the Word "Guild."

We begin with the finding as to the name because the use of the name "Weavers' Guild" is characteristic of the entire pattern of the business conducted by the petitioner. Its use since early in 1952 is deceptive. It conveyed the impression that it is a "national" organization, the importance of membership in which should be emphasized by salesmen to persons to whom they sought to sell the course of instruction, and who were to be impressed with the fact that they were needed to fulfill a "national" program.

Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, 1934, gives the following as the first definition of "guild":

> "An association of men belonging to the same class or engaged in kindred pursuits, or with common interests or aims, formed for mutual aid and protection."

The legal definition, is, in substance, the same.[28] They both refer to a non-profit association of persons engaged in the same craft for mutual assistance. The public has become familiar, in recent years, with the activities of the Newspaper Guild and of the various artists' guilds.

Courts have uniformly sustained Orders of the Federal Trade Commission prohibiting the use of misleading designations. Thus, a flour company was prohibited from using the word "milling" in its title, because the word was understood by dealers and the purchasing public to indicate concerns which grind wheat into flour, which the particular mill did not do.[29] This Court sustained an Order forbidding, in advertising a medicated douche powder, the use of the word "MD" because the purchasers would mistake it for an abbreviation of Doctor of Medicine, and imply medical approval. The Court said:

> "Above and beyond the oral evidence in this case—evidence which, we repeat, is both substantial and impressive—stands the mute and accusing testimony of the thing itself. We have examined the advertising matter and the container put out for the petitioners' douche powder. Like the Commission, we too have noticed that blatant emphasis on the letters 'MD'. We too have discerned the attempt—and, we believe, the conscious attempt—to capitalize upon the prestige of a profession that, for all its blunders and ineptitudes, from the very days of Hippocrates and Galen has built up a noble tradition of self-sacrifice and service to humanity.
> "We agree with the conclusion of the respondent that the use of the letters 'MD' is deceptive." [30]

In another case this Court forbade the use of the word "Hollywood" with the legend "favorite of the stars" in conjunction with a cosmetic preparation upon the ground that it gave the impression that it was a product of Hollywood's theatrical colony and was preferred by the motion picture stars.[31] And generally courts will sustain the acts of the Federal Trade Commission in prohibiting the use of a trade-name that might cause confusion, whether the name used is that of a competitor or not.[32]

The case before us was a proper one in which to apply the principles of these cases. No Weavers' Guild of America ever existed. The purchasers derived no benefit from it. It was merely a fictitious name under which the petitioner was doing business and its use was likely to mislead.

B. Representations as to Earnings.

The Commission found that earnings of $1452 in eleven days, $1368 in seven days and $1302 in ten days are not typical earnings of salesmen selling the petitioner's course. One of the exhibits in the record which the petitioner admitted that he disseminated, contained, among other things, the following statement:

> "Meet a few of our salesmen."

Below it were photographs of three persons, G. Worthingham, whose earnings for eleven days were listed as $1452, W. H. Orledge, whose earnings for seven days were listed as $1368 and S. Buda, whose earnings for ten days were $1302. Under each photograph topping the listing of the dates on which the various amounts which comprised the total were made, was the legend "Typical earnings with us". The vice of the advertisement lay in the fact that these earnings

> "a voluntary association of persons pursuing the same trade, art, profession, business, such as printers, goldsmiths, wool merchants, etc., united under a distinct organization of their own, analogous to that of a corporation, regulating the affairs of their trade or business by their own laws and rules and aiming, by cooperation and organization, to protect and promote the interests of their common vocation." Federal Trade Commission*, 6 Cir., 1953 [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,526], 206 F. 2d 311, 319) (Italics added)

were, in no way, typical. They were exceptional. For they represented persons who had devoted much time and were assisted by others in selling the course. And the petitioner testified that he "would consider a man a very good man if he made one sale a day." For that he would receive $22.50. The sales price was $35.00. And the payment of a commission of $22.50 of this price is, by itself, of the character to induce salesmen to resort to questionable practices, which it is the duty of the Commission to prohibit.

So the Commission was justified in enjoining the representation that the typical earnings of persons selling the petitioner's course of instruction are greater than they actually are in fact.

C. Representation as to Materials to be Furnished to Salesmen.

The Commission found that the petitioner did not furnish to sales agents the names of prospective purchasers, or with everything necessary in selecting and closing sales. The advertisement already referred to contains this statement:

> "You buy Nothing—you demonstrate Nothing. We furnish everything from tested, proven sales talk to order closing sales kit. For full facts and proof—write quick, today, to Weavers Guild, Dept. 0-3, 4634 Hollywood Blvd., Hollywood 27, California.

Another advertisement contains the phrase in bold face:

> "You Work on Qualified Leads."

Still another repeated the statement:

> "You don't demonstrate anything. You work from qualified leads."

In every-day parlance, "the furnishing of a lead" to a salesman implies supplying the names of persons who might become purchasers. When to the words is added the adjective "qualified" the inference becomes almost a promise of "good prospects." The petitioner in his first interrogation before the Commission, was asked:

> "Q. Do you supply them (the salesmen) with the names of prospects or leads?"

and his answer was categorical:

> "No, we do not. I will qualify that by saying once in a great while we will get an inquiry of some kind and might refer it to the salesmen."

He also stated that salesmen were required to pay five dollars, as a returnable deposit, for the sales kit and that if they needed additional brochures to leave with the customers, they would have to pay for them.

So here again, there is substantial testimony to sustain the finding and the paragraph of the Order prohibiting such representation unless it is stated that the articles are furnished after the agents have made deposits or payments for them.

The foregoing three representations were alleged to have been made to salesmen to induce them to sell the course. We now come to the representations directed at the purchasers of the course of instruction.

D. Representations as to the Nature of the Course.

The Commission found that the petitioner's course was not a complete course in reweaving. While the petitioner called his "Nu-Weaving," his brochures and advertisements describing the course used the word "re-weaving" in such a manner that it would be difficult for a person not knowing how to differentiate between the various types of weaving to know that the lessons did not relate to reweaving.

In one of the exhibits, below the title "Learn and Earn with Nu-Weaving", occurs the following language:

> "The modern method of Invisible Re-Weaving"

In the same brochure it is written:

> "We furnish everything you'll need to learn. To reweave you must know the 3 basic weaves of cloth."

And at the end, there is this statement:

> "Reweavers earn as high as $100 a week."

The evidence before the Commission shows that reweaving is difficult to learn. For it involves the taking of threads identical to the yarn used in the cloth and weaving them into the threads that are in the material itself. The method is known as "invisible reweaving" or "French reweaving."

Another method is what is known as "patch weaving." It is done with swatches of material. The swatch is placed on top of the material and the threads are pulled from each side and the threads are woven back into the weave of the material, pulled underneath and into the weave of the material so as to give the appearance of one continuous piece. This method is not so satisfactory as the French weaving because, as one witness stated, "the pattern is broken and is not perfect." This is known as "over-lay."

The third method is known as "end weaving." This is done by placing a piece of cloth over the hole, threads are pulled underneath into the weave, so as to make the thread become a part of the material itself. What the petitioner called "Nu-Weaving" was this third method. It required the use of a special needle to draw the threads fringing the patch through the cloth, and to hook them to the back. It implied, as the petitioner himself testified at the final hearing, the use of a pattern

> "over the damaged part of the material and interweaving of the fringes of the patch with the undamaged portion of the material so that it appears to be continuous in pattern."

The representations so intermingled the words "reweaving" with the others that they conveyed the impression that the more difficult form of reweaving was being taught. The Commission was right in requiring the petitioner to desist from representing that his course of instruction constitutes a complete course in reweaving "unless and until such is in fact true."

E. Representations as to the Ease in Learning the Craft.

The Commission found that the representation that reweaving is learned and can be mastered easily and by many in ten days was incorrect. The experts produced by the Commission, to whose testimony we have already referred in the preceding paragraph, testified that true reweaving is a difficult course taking many months to learn. The petitioner himself, in his testimony, stated that true reweaving was difficult to learn. So, in the main, we are confronted with the fact that the basis for the objection of the petitioner to this and the preceding Finding is his contention that he did not advertise the difficult two types of reweaving discussed.

The short answer to this claim is that the word "reweaving" was so intermingled with the word "Nu-Weaving" that the prospective purchaser to whom, in alluring and blatant terms, it was held out as a craft easily learned and from which great remuneration could be expected, with little effort, might be led to believe that the difficult reweaving was being actually taught in a few easy lessons. So here again, the Commission was warranted in requiring that the petitioner confine his representation as to his course "to the overweaving or patch type" of reweaving.

F. Representations as to Personal Instruction.

The Commission found that, at times, sales agents made the representation that prospective students would be given personal assistance in completing the course, when, as a fact, no such assistance was provided as a regular part of the course. There is evidence in the record that at least two salesmen made such representation. In one of the circularized letters signed by the petitioner, salesmen are instructed to hold out to women these inducements,

> "Their present security lies in the continued employment and good health of the breadwinner. If something happens to him, a strike, layoff, injury or death, then security vanishes.
> "You'll agree that's something for her to think seriously about. Every woman realizes these things and You Can Capitalize heavily on these ever present fears.
> "Women want to 'express' themselves. They want to do creative, useful work. The Man Who Shows Them 'How' Will Be Welcome and Will Reap A Harvest. They only need someone to show them 'how'.
> "If, in addition to that he opens up a Weavers Work Shop (one of the three) opportunities open to everyone of my associates he can use the graduates to feather his own nest as employees in a permanent profitable business of his own.
> "Nothing could be sweeter for You. One hand washes the other in this deal and you get yours coming and going." (Emphasis added.)

And in the questionnaire to be analyzed more fully in the next subdivision, the petitioner speaks of "assistance" which the salesmen can give to graduates "in starting their own business." The petitioner's insistence that such promises were unauthorized is contradicted by these facts. For they show that what the salesmen told the prospective students was, in the spirit, if not to the letter, of what they were encouraged, indeed, coached by him to tell. More, even if they were not fully authorized, the Commission was exercising its preventive powers in ordering him to desist, in view of the fact that they were made by the salesmen within the apparent and real scope of their authority.[33]

[33] See cases cited in Notes 16, 17, 18 and 19.

G. Representation as to Potential Earnings of those Completing the Course.

The Commission found that the representation that $25 per week for spare time work and from $50 to $200 per week could be reasonably expected was not true. The circular letter referred to tells salesmen.

> "You pitch to housewives mainly; you can see them all day long; they are now earning exactly nothing. They need only to be convinced that they can make as little as $15.00 a week in their spare time at home and they will buy."

The very alluring use of the words "as little as" is significant. In one of the advertisements the salesmen are advised:

> "You can show them how to earn up to $5.00 an hour continuously at home, with invisible Nu-Weaving."

A circular addressed to the salesmen entitled "Questionnaire", is very revealing. It contained the following preamble:

> "This is self-explanatory.
> "It was composed through a compilation of all the usual questions which arose in the prospect's mind. Read them through several times and 'fix' the answers in your mind. Thus, you will have them all at your finger tips. Already, unhesitant answers to any questions generates a prospect's confidence in the salesmen. With this knowledge, your first 'pitch' should be as good as any that follows." (Emphasis added.)

The questions themselves bear the following heading:

> "We Know You Must Have Loads of Questions to Ask Us but We Have Been Asked So Many Questions About Nu-Weaving We Think We Can Anticipate Most of Yours—So Read These Questions and Answers."

The first six questions are a complete answer to the attempt of the petitioner to thrust upon his salesmen the sole responsibility for the representations with which we are dealing.

Here we have instructions which use the words "invisible repair," "invisible weaving" and "reweaving," indiscriminately and almost interchangeably, and statements urging salesmen to represent that it is "easy" to earn $25 a week in "spare time" and that many "full-time" re-weavers "earn as high as $200 per week."

Because they disclose so thoroughly the manner in which the petitioner was "coaching" his salesmen, the questions are reproduced in their entirety:

> "Q. 1 What is Nu-Weaving? Ans. Nu-Weaving is a new method of invisible repair to damaged cloth. Through the use of specially designed hand instruments and a newly created method of doing invisible weaving, the time required for repairs on most jobs is about ⅓ of the time needed heretofore by the old methods.
> "Q. 2 What does all this mean to me? Ans. Because of this great saving in time, operators are able to do this work at about ⅓ of the usual price and still earn as much per hour as operators using the old method.
> "Q. 3 How much money can I expect to earn? Ans. If you work only spare time it is easy to earn $25.00 a week. Many full-time reweavers earn as high as $200 a week.
> "Q. 4 In just what way does this make Nu-Weaving an attractive trade? Ans. Because, while only a small 5% of the public could afford the old, expensive methods, Now—through Fast Nu-Weaving, this type of repair fits everyone's pocketbook; thus, a much greater field for this work is open and a much greater need exists for competent Nu-Weavers.
> "Q. 5 Why haven't there been more invisible weavers in the past? Ans. Due to the long time necessary to teach the old way of doing invisible weaving, those 'in the know' have usually been reluctant to impart their knowledge to more than a limited number of apprentices.
> "Q. 6 How long does it take to become competent? Ans. Many students trained have completed their course in a period of two to three weeks." (Italics added.)

In another of the advertisements of the course the statement is made:

> "Reweavers earn as high as $100.00 per week."

There is testimony in the record that it was not possible to earn that amount, unless the person devoted all her time and had established a custom that would bring in work enough to produce such earnings. It certainly could not be obtained through cleaners and dyers who, in the same questionnaire, were declared to be the main source of custom and profit for the graduates of the course. Question 15 reads:

> "What assistance do you give graduates in starting their own business? Ans. The main source of Invisible Reweaving are cleaners, upholsterers and insurance companies. If you will submit a list of not more than 20 such business concerns, we will contact them with advertising material and attempt to arrange for you to leave samples of your work for display. You will find them eager for the most part to give you their full co-operation. The lower price schedule; 3 days delivery and excellence of work is sufficient to encourage them to become Nu-Weaving agencies."

Operators of commercial weaving establishments testified that employees skilled in all types of reweaving could not earn the amounts which were held out as easy possibilities to the graduates of this course in a very limited type of weaving. These misrepresentations were of the type which courts have condemned repeatedly. The Commission was fully justified in ordering the petitioner to desist from representing that the potential earnings of those purchasing and completing his course and engaging in reweaving are greater than they are in fact.[34]

Of a similar Order this Court has stated:

"It does not preclude all future representations by petitioners of the earning experience of their graduates. It does preclude representations that petitioners' graduates earn wages in excess of the average net earnings which they actually receive. In short, the order says no more that that future representations by petitioners must have a basis of fact. The order is clear and definite and within the discretion delegated by Congress to the Commission to prescribe appropriate remedies."[35]

H. Representation as to Cost of Materials.

The Commission found that the representation that materials supplied with the course are worth $30 was false. Admittedly, they were not worth such amount. Replacements were sold for $1.00. In a brochure entitled "Sales Ideas on Nu-Weaving" copyrighted by the petitioner in 1952, is found the following:

"Sales Pitch in Nu-Weaving"

In following leads, the salesman is instructed with relation to the price:

"To impress them with the value of a set of needles, say, 'One can't put a price on these because we never sell them. We won't sell them to anyone. They go only with our course. But one firm, as you see here, sells a set of similar needles for $27.50."

This was palpably false. The needles referred to were of a different character and were hand-made. And the Commission was justified in assuming that the representation was not limited to the period when, as claimed, needles were scarce and in preventing recurrence by prohibiting the representation that the needles were worth more than the petitioner ordinarily charged for them.

I. Promise of Refund.

The Commission found that representations were made that the petitioner would make full refund of moneys paid on the contracts if the purchasers were unable to complete the course. There is evidence in the record that such representations were made and that the petitioner refused such refunds when demanded. There is a letter signed by the petitioner as "Director" of Weavers Guild on April 20, 1954, at a time when, as he now contends, he was no longer connected with the business, addressed to the Better Business Bureau of Los Angeles, who had evidently sought the cancellation of the contract of a dissatisfied purchaser from Waterbury, Connecticut in which he states:

[34] Tractor Trucking [Training] Service v. Federal Trade Commission, 9 Cir., 1955 [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,196], 227 F. 2d 420.

[35] Tractor Trucking [Training] Service v. Federal Trade Commission, supra, Note 34, p. 425. Of the type of advertising here involved and its capacity to deceive the public, the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit has stated:

"The important question to be resolved is the impression given by an advertisement as a whole. Advertisements which are capable of two meanings, one of which is false, are misleading. * * * Advertisements which create a false impression, although literally true, may be prohibited. * * *

"The meaning of advertisements to the public and their capacity to deceive are questions of fact for the Commission to determine, and its conclusions may not be disturbed unless arbitrary or clearly wrong. * * * Applicable here is our statement in Zenith Radio Corp. v. Federal Trade Commission, 7 Cir., 143 F. 2d 29, 31, 'The Commission had a right to look at the advertisements in question, consider the relevant evidence in the record that would aid it in interpreting the advertisements, and then decide for itself whether the practices engaged in by the petitioner were unfair or deceptive, as charged in the complaint.' " (Rhodes Pharmacal Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 7 Cir. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,607], 1953, 208 F. 2d 382, 387)

"There were no special circumstances in this case to make us desist from our usual policy of non-cancellable enrollments, which was clearly printed on the order form signed by Mrs. Hine."

Granted that these representations may have been made in derogation of the terms of the written contract and that they were unauthorized or even condemned after they occurred, the Commission, in view of the entire pattern of the venture, was authorized in holding the petitioner responsible for them and in ordering that no such representations be made in the future unless refunds are actually made upon demand by the purchaser.

J. Representations as to Approval of the Course for Veterans' Training.

The Examiner found that there was no evidence that petitioner's correspondence course was represented to prospective purchasers as having been approved for training by the Bureau of Education of the State of California and the United States Veterans' Administration. On appeal, the Commission disapproved the finding and instead of it substituted the following:

"The Commission finds that the respondent has falsely represented that his course of instruction has been approved for training by the Bureau of Education of the State of California and the United States Veterans Administration."

The petitioner insists that the Examiner was correct and that the evidence supports his conclusion and not that of the Commission.

The Findings of the Examiner are entitled to weight and consideration by the Commission. But there is no mandate that it must accept them. The reviewing court should

"accord the findings of the trial examiner the relevance that they reasonably command in answering the comprehensive question whether the evidence supporting the Board's order is substantial." [36]

We are of the view that the Commission properly rejected this Finding of the Examiner. In considering the evidence in this case, the pattern and frame-work of the whole enterprise must be taken into consideration.

The representations already discussed and the implications they carried are of the very type most likely to deceive.[37] In the petitioner's instructions to the salesmen, in telling them what line or "pitch" to use, fact and fancy, past and present activities are so intermingled that the salesmen were justified in applying to the present course official approval of a resident course formerly taught by the petitioner.

In forwarding the material as to the approval of that course by the Bureau of Education of the State of California and the United States Veterans Administration, instructions were given to refer to the fact in selling the present course. But nowhere was the dissimilarity between the two courses pointed out. The rider which accompanied the materials relating to the approval was equivocal. It read:

"The V. A. and State Approvals

"It is easy to get a letter of recommendation but it is something else when a public body actually sends their 'charges' to you for instructions and PAYS the tuition fee.

"You can imagine with what keen study they scrutinize our operations, what an acid test they used to evaluate the worth of our course.

"These photostats are Cynamite. If used effectively, think what confidence it must generate in your prospect. There are very many deals that would give their right eye to have a wallop like this in their kits. All right. You've got it—Use it—Use it effectively—Use it to engender confidence."

And there is a letter addressed to one of the prospective salesmen under the date of January 28, 1952, which states:

"The fact that our course was accepted and successfully used in the training of G. I.'s is certainly one of the highest recommendations we could submit."

The home study course was never so approved. One of the objects of the Federal Trade Commission Act is to eradicate business methods having a capacity to deceive.[38]

This accords with the policy of the Act to stop unfair methods of competition in their inception.[39] In the light of these objectives, the facts just referred to warranted the Commission in making a Finding contrary to that of the Examiner and adding to the Order a provision commanding the petitioner to desist from representing that his course of instruction had been approved for training by the Bureau of Education of the State of California or the United States Veterans Administration.

Summary and Conclusion

[Evidence]

In what precedes we have considered the objections, legal and factual, urged against the Order of the Commission. This has required the examination of a very voluminous record. No attempt has been made to summarize all the evidence relating to each of the facts bearing upon the specific Findings under attack. Some only were given but all facts relating to a particular subject appearing in the record, favorable or unfavorable to the particular findings, were considered, in obedience to the mandate to determine the correctness of the Conclusions on the factual issues before the Commission on the record as a whole.[40]

[Locality of Practices]

Much is made in the argument of the fact that a large portion of the practices found by the Commission to exist related to one region—the New Orleans Region. But they are not confined entirely to that area. The advertisements were published in trade magazines of national circulation and the various circulars to salesmen had wide, interstate distribution.

More, it is quite customary to find a particular territory fertile ground for the type of shrewd misrepresentation and equivocal advertising with which the record in this case is replete. The Commission by taking action when these practices are called to its attention, prevents their spread elsewhere, which is in true keeping with the object of the Commission to cause the discontinuance of unfair and deceptive practices at their inception. And courts, on review, may infer the existence of practices other than those proved.[41]

["Puffing"]

One other observation is in order. It is argued earnestly that some of the representations, such as those relating to the character of the course, and the ease with which it may be learned, are nothing more than the "puffing" which is tolerated in modern commerce and may, in certain instances, be considered innocuous even in cases under the Federal Trade Commission Act. However, an examination of the cases referred to as countenancing this shows that in the particular instances, the "superlative" words were used in a context which negatived the idea that they were "calculated to deceive." In one of the cases cited, the Court remarked upon the characterization of a product as a "perfect" lubrication:

> "So far as we know, there is nothing 'perfect' in this world, but still it is a common term, which undoubtedly means nothing more than that the product is good or of high quality. We can conceive of situations where the use of such words might be deceptive and even fraudulent."[42] (Italics added.)

In another cited case, the use of superlatives in an advertisement relating to a

[41] As said of a similar contention that the number of persons deceived was small:

"The contention is made that there is no evidence to support the Commission's finding that a substantial portion of the public was induced to purchase petitioner's merchandise on the strength of these false representations, and therefore the Commission's action was not in the public interest. The argument is based on the de minimus concept; only fourteen housewives testified before the Commission although thousands of sales were made. We are not persuaded by this reasoning, however. There is no indication that these were the only housewives to whom false representations were made. On the contrary, the evidence shows that all salesmen carried order blanks marked 'Special Offer', and the brown envelopes were distributed to all buyers indicating that these fourteen witnesses were but a few of the many deceived. Substantial amounts of merchandise having been sold by false and misleading representations, the interest of the public in the proceeding was well established." (Consumer Sales Corp. v. Federal Trade Commission, supra, Note 17, p. 407) (Emphasis added)

And see cases cited in Note 37.

[42] Kidder Oil Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 7 Cir., 1941 [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,085, 56,100], 117 F. 2d 892, 901.

modern course in reducing was held, in the circumstances, to contain "nothing deceptive."[43] However, this is not the situation here. Here, we have statements made to salesmen with the intention that they be conveyed by them to prospective purchasers and which are aimed to induce the purchase of a course of study. As to a similar situation, the same court which decided the two cases just referred to, said:

> "Neither are we impressed with the suggestion that representations relied upon can be excused on the basis that they are only 'puffing', as that expression is sometimes used. It seems plain that the representations were made in order to induce the purchase of petitioners' products, and those contained in printed matter as well as the false statements by the salesmen were made with that end in view. Statements made for the purpose of deceiving prospective purchasers and particularly those designed to consummate the sale of products by fright cannot properly be characterized as mere 'puffing'."[44] (Emphasis added.)

It should be added that we are not in the realm of civil torts. Even in that realm the old rule of caveat emptor has been abandoned, in favor of the more ethical attitude that one dealing with another in business had the right to rely upon representations of facts as the truth.[45] And the Supreme Court has applied with great consistency this approach in dealing with the Federal Trade Commission by stating, in a leading case:

> "The fact that a false statement may be obviously false to those who are trained and experienced does not change its character, nor take away its power to deceive others less experienced. There is no duty resting upon a citizen to suspect the honesty of those with whom he transacts business. Laws are made to protect the trusting as well as the suspicious. The best element of business has long since decided that honesty should govern competitive enterprises, and that the rule of caveat emptor should not be relied upon to reward fraud and deception."[46] (Emphasis added.)

[Capacity to Deceive]

In sum, capacity to deceive and not actual deception is the criterion by which practices are tested under the Federal Trade Commission Act. The record in this case shows a series of acts which were calculated to deceive, some practiced directly by the petitioner, others by salesmen encouraged by him to practice them and for which he should be responsible, because made within the actual and apparent scope of their authority.

[Affirmed]

The Order of the Commission is affirmed.

Fur Products Labeling Act in promulgating Rule 44 of the Rules and Regulations under the Act, which specifically prohibits various forms of misrepresentations as to the price and value of furs, even though the Fur Products Labeling Act itself does not expressly refer to misrepresentations as to price and value. The Commission in promulgating the rule correctly interpreted and carried into effect the intent of the Congress in passing the Act. The object of the Act was to prevent, among other things, false advertising of fur products or furs, "no matter to what it related." Although the word "price" does not appear in Section 5(a) of the Act which prohibits false advertising, the section declares fur products or furs to be falsely advertised if an advertisement "contains any form of misrepresentation or deception, directly or by implication, with respect to such fur product or fur (Section 5(a)(5))." This section prohibits other misrepresentations as to fur products or furs, including those relating to price and value. Under Section 3(a) of the Act, specific practices set forth in the Act and in the rules and regulations under the Act are declared to be unlawful, and the Federal Trade Commission, under Section 8(b) of the Act, is authorized to prescribe rules and regulations.

See Fur Labeling, Vol. 2, ¶ 6631.

Fur Labeling—Fur Products Labeling Act—Advertisements in Commerce—Interstate Commerce.—Sales of furs to persons residing outside of California, advertising in newspapers of interstate circulation, and out-of-state origin of approximately one-fourth of the fur products sold, taken together, established the fact that a furrier was engaged in interstate commerce as that term is defined in the Fur Products Labeling Act and in the Federal Trade Commission Act. There is no constitutional inhibition against regulating purely local affairs if, in the opinion of Congress, they have a deleterious effect on the commerce between states. Congress had the power to prohibit advertising in commerce of goods either originating in interstate commerce or which might be introduced into interstate commerce. The constitutional grant of power to regulate commerce between the states gives Congress a power which is both plenary and absolute.

See Unfair Practices, Vol. 2, ¶ 5005; Fur Labeling, Vol. 2, ¶ 6614.

Fur Labeling—Misrepresentations as to Prices and Values—Tendency of Advertising To Mislead—Sufficiency of Evidence.—A Federal Trade Commission order prohibiting a furrier from representing (1) that the regular or usual price of any fur product is any amount which is in excess of the price at which it usually sells such product, (2) that a sale price enables purchasers to effectuate any savings in excess of the difference between the said price and the price at which comparable products are sold, (3) that an amount set forth on price tags represents the value or the usual price at which the fur product had been customarily sold, (4) that any such product is of a higher value than is the fact, or (5) that any such product is from the stock of a business in a state of liquidation or from the stock of a business recently consolidated with another was affirmed. The Commission's findings that the furrier falsely and deceptively advertised its fur products were supported by substantial evidence. It is not necessary that the advertising be, in fact, misleading; if it has a tendency to mislead, it is within the power of the Commission to interdict.

See Fur Labeling, Vol. 2, ¶ 6625.20, 6631.30, 6632.20, 6645.

Federal Trade Commission Enforcement and Procedure—Fur Products Labeling Act Proceeding—Court Review—Duty of Court.—A United States Court of Appeals, in reviewing a Federal Trade Commission order prohibiting violations of the Fur Products Labeling Act, ruled that the enactment of the Administrative Procedures Act has placed upon the courts the responsibility of reviewing the entire record with the object of determining whether, on the whole, substantial evidence sustained the action of the administrative body. The findings of the administrative body are to be accepted unless they are unsupported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole, and the courts will not substitute their judgment for that of the administrative body. Thus, in reviewing a Federal Trade Commission order, the court should not segmentize the facts but rather take a comprehensive view of the whole record in order to determine whether the Commission has exercised, in a legal manner, the functions committed to it by the Congress. Also, the test of the proper scope of an order is whether the Commission might have reasonably concluded from the evidence that such an order was necessary.

Affirming a Federal Trade Commission cease and desist order in Dkt. 6297.

Before: LEMMON and CHAMBERS, Circuit Judges, YANKWICH, District Judge.

[FTC Order—Review]

YANKWICH, District Judge [In full text]: Before us is a petition to review Order of the Federal Trade Commission to cease and desist entered on May 11, 1956, in a proceeding instituted by a complaint filed on February 25, 1955, which charged Jacques De Gorter and Suze C. De Gorter, as individuals and as partners, trading as "Pelta Furs," with the violation of the Fur Products Labeling Act[1] and Rule 44 of the rules promulgated by the Commission under the Act.[2]

More particularly, in addition to the violation of the regulation cited, they charged violation of § 5(a)(1) and (6) of the special Act[3] and what are now §§ 2(a)(1) and 2(a)(6) of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended in 1952.[4]

The De Gorters will be referred to as "the petitioners." However, as Jacques De Gorter was a witness in the case, we shall, in speaking of his testimony and admissions, for brevity, refer to him as "De Gorter."

After hearings were had before a Hearing Examiner, he rendered an Initial Decision on November 18, 1955. We need not concern ourselves with its details, for on appeal, the Commission, with two members dissenting, set it aside and filed their own Findings and Order on May 11, 1956, directing the petitioners to cease and desist from (a) misbranding fur products, (b) falsely and deceptively invoicing fur products and (c) falsely and deceptively advertising fur products, all in particulars to be referred to in detail hereafter.

The Order was based on the findings of the Commission that the petitioners had violated the sections referred to of the Fur Products Labeling Act and Regulation 44 enacted under it, and that their activities also constituted

> "unfair and deceptive practices and unfair methods of competition in commerce within the intent and meaning of the Federal Trade Commission Act."

I.

The Scope of Review

On this type of review, this Court will not entertain questions not raised before the Administrative body.[5] And the basic statute declares specifically that, on review, the Commission's Findings

> "as to facts, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive."[6]

The courts, including this Court, have applied this mandate consistently.[7] In assaying the facts found by the Commission, the Courts are aware that, in dealing with unfair competition,

> "Congress advisedly left the concept flexible to be defined with particularity by the myriad of cases from the field of business."[8]

[8] Federal Trade Commission v. Motion Picture Advertising Service Co., 1953 [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,426], 344 U. S. 392, 394.

The enactment of the Administrative Procedures Act[9] has placed upon the courts the responsibility of reviewing the entire record with the object of determining whether, on the whole, substantial evidence sustained the action of the administrative body.[10] This means that

> ". . . the findings are to be accepted unless they are unsupported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole."[11]

So doing, Courts will not substitute their judgment for that of the Commission. As stated by the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit recently,

> "It was for it, not for us, to pass upon the credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony in the light of it all, conflicting or otherwise. * * * Having done so, the findings of the Commission, when, as here, the record as a whole gives them substantial support, are final even though the evidence is so conflicting that it might have supported the contrary had such findings been made."[12] (Italics added.)

In view of the aim of the Congress to vest in the Commission the power to determine what unfair practices are detrimental to interstate commerce, in reviewing an order to cease and desist we should not segmentize the facts but rather take a comprehensive view of the whole record in order to determine whether the Commission has exercised, in a legal manner, the functions committed to it by the Congress.[13]

II.

The Commerce Clause

Applying the rule which limits review to the questions presented to the Commission,[14] three questions are involved: (1) whether the petitioners are engaged in interstate commerce, (2) whether the practices are unfair under the terms of the particular Act, Rule 44 of the Commission, and the Federal Trade Commission Act, and (3) if they are, whether the Rule is within the rule-making authority conferred on the Commission by the Fur Products Labeling Act.[15]

The three problems thus postulated are so interrelated that, while we shall, in what follows, attempt to give a definite answer to each, in the interest of brevity and to avoid repetition, no clearly defined line will be drawn in discussing the legal principles or facts as they relate to one or the other of the problems. We begin by stating that the constitutional grant of power to regulate commerce between the states[16] gives the Congress a power which is both plenary and absolute. As stated by the Supreme Court in a noted case,

> "This power over commerce when it exists is complete and perfect."[17]

As stated succinctly in the same case, in exercising it the Congress may prohibit purely local activities:

> "Activities conducted within states lines do not by this fact alone escape the sweep of the Commerce Clause. Interstate commerce may be dependent upon them."[18]

And so we find, to refer only to some recent cases, that labor relations at local level, because they affect commerce, have been made the subject of federal regulation.[19] And standards established under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 for fixing minimum wages and maximum hours have been applied to local manufacturers whose products were destined for interstate commerce.[20] The same statute has been applied to employees engaged in the maintenance and operation of a building when it appeared that the tenants of the building were engaged in the production of goods for interstate commerce.[21] An inspection statute of tobacco produced intrastate and destined to consumers within the state as well as without has been sustained.[22] So have marketing agreements relating to agricultural products.[23] These cases promulgate no novel doctrines. They merely reassert a fundamental principle obscured at times[24] that the criterion for exercise of the Congressional power to regulate interstate commerce is the effect of an act upon it and not its source.[25]

In passing upon regulatory measures enacted under the commerce clause the courts have not drawn any rigid distinction between articles which are in the flow of commerce and those which have come to rest. Illustrative is a case involving a section of the Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act of 1938.[26] The section prohibits:

> "doing of any . . . act with respect to, a . . . drug . . . if such act is done while such article is held for sale after shipment in interstate commerce and results in such article being misbranded."[27]

The court held that a retail druggist who had purchased sulfathiazole tablets from a wholesaler and who, six months after, removed them from a container labelled according to the Act and sold them in a container not so labelled was guilty of violation of the section. The court could find no constitutional infirmity in such application as the lower court had in relying on cases, some of which are relied on here.[28]

In regulating intrastate transactions it is not necessary that the regulation be confined to persons who are also engaged in interstate commerce.[29]

III.

The Purpose of the Fur Products Labeling Act

[FTC Rules—Prices]

As the Congress had the power to prohibit advertising in commerce of goods either originating in interstate commerce or which might be introduced into commerce, the question is (1) did it do so when it enacted the Fur Products Labeling Act and (2) was advertising relating to price and value within the interdictions of the Act?

The Federal Trade Commission answered in the affirmative by promulgating Rule 44 specifically prohibiting certain types of misrepresentations as to prices. The full text of the Rule is reproduced in the margin.[30]

In addition to questioning the finding of the Commission that they were engaged in interstate commerce, the petitioners' chief attack against the findings of the Commission relates to Paragraph C(2) of the Order

[30] Rule 44, 16 C. F. R., 1949 ed., Supp., § 301.44, which reads:

"Misrepresentation of prices.

"(a) No person shall, with respect to a fur or fur product, advertise such fur or fur product at alleged wholesale prices or at alleged manufacturers cost or less, unless such representapertaining to pricing. It is reproduced in the margin.[31]

The claimed insufficiency of the evidence to support this finding will be treated further on in the Opinion. For the present we advert to the contention that the Act does not prohibit misrepresentations as to prices and that the Commission in enacting Rule 44,[32] exceeded its statutory powers.

[Local Activity]

Our answer is that the Commission in enacting this rule correctly interpreted and carried into effect the intent of the Congress in passing the Act. It is obvious from the legal discussion which precedes that there is no constitutional inhibition against regulating purely local activities if, in the opinion of the Congress, they have a deleterious effect on the commerce between States.

[Fur Act]

The object of the Act under discussion is to make unlawful

"the introduction or manufacture for introduction, into commerce, or the sale, advertising or offering the sale in commerce, or the transportation or distribution in commerce, of any fur product which is misbranded or deceptively advertised or invoiced." [33]

The title of the Act and the subtitles to its various subdivisions indicate plainly that one of the evils sought to be stamped out is the advertising along with introduction into commerce, manufacture, for commerce and sale in commerce. Not only the specific acts codified as sections 69 to 69(j) of the Title, but also the rules and regulations to be prescribed under Section 69f(b) are declared to be "an unfair method of competition and an unfair and deceptive act or practice in commerce under the Fair Trade Commission Act." [34]

The Act vests the Commission with the power to enforce these sections

"by the same means, and with the same jurisdiction, powers, and duties as though all applicable terms and provisions of the Federal Trade Commission Act were incorporated into and made a part of this Act." [35]

"(c) No person shall, with respect to a fur or fur product, advertise such fur or fur product as being 'made to sell for', being 'worth', or 'valued at' a certain price, or by similar statements, unless such claim or representation is true in fact.

"(d) No person shall, with respect to a fur or fur product, advertise such fur or fur product as being of a certain value or quality unless such claims or representations are true in fact.

"(e) Persons making pricing claims or representations of the types described in paragraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d) of this section shall maintain full and adequate records disclosing the facts upon which such claims or representations are based.

"(f) No person shall, with respect to a fur or fur product, advertise such fur or fur product by the use of an illustration which shows such fur or fur product to be a higher priced product than the one so advertised.

In addition to this, Subdivision (b) of the same Section provides:

[Construction of Act]

The petitioners ask us to apply narrowly the doctrine of ejusdem generis as expounded in some state cases,[37] so as to limit the power of the Commission to the subjects actually covered by the Act. Because the Act does not speak of misrepresentation as to price and value, we are urged to find that the Commission was without power to promulgate Rule 44, which specifically prohibits various forms of misrepresentations as to prices.

The Supreme Court of the United States has laid down rules for the interpretation of federal statutes. These are explicit, and are binding on us. So we need not, indeed we are not free, to resort to state decisions in interpreting a federal statute. The rule of ejusdem generis, as applied by the Supreme Court, has been succinctly stated by Mr. Chief Justice Hughes in this manner:

"The rule of ejusdem generis is a familiar and useful one in interpreting words by the association in which they are found, but it gives no warrant for narrowing alternative provisions which the legislature has adopted with the purpose of affording added safeguards. 'The rule of "ejusdem" is applied as an aid in ascertaining the intention of the legislature, not to subvert it when ascertained.' Texas v. United States, 292 U. S. 522, 534."[38] (Emphasis added.)

In the case in which this statement was made, it was argued that an act[39] dealing with fraud against the Government should be limited to cases involving pecuniary or property loss. The Court declined to apply the narrow rule of construction and held that the presentation of any false statement was punishable by the Act, whether it resulted in loss to the Government or not. This accords with a concomitant rule that

"The policy as well as the letter of the law is a guide to decision."[40]

[Object of Act]

The object of the statute before us—as appears from the legislative history,[41] was to prevent, among other things, false advertising of fur products or furs, no matter to what it related. There is no rigid requirement of semantic perfection in the use of words by the Congress. All that is required is that the Congress make

"a choice of language which fairly brings a given situation within a statute."[42]

As stated by the Supreme Court in another case:

"Words generally have different shades of meaning and are to be construed if reasonably possible to effectuate the intent of the lawmakers; and this meaning in particular instances is to be arrived at not only by a consideration of the words themselves, but by considering, as well, the context, the purpose of the law, and the circumstances under which the words were employed."[43]

The word "price" does not occur in the section of the Act under consideration relating to false advertising.[44] However, the [44] 15 U. S. C., § 69c.

Section declares fur products or furs to be falsely or deceptively advertised if an advertisement, representation, public announcement or notice which is intended to aid, promote, or assist, directly or indirectly, in the sale or offering for sale of such fur product or fur among other facts given or omitted,

> "(5) contains the name or names of any animal or animals other than the name or names specified in paragraph (1) of this subsection or contains any form of misrepresentation or deception, directly or by implication, with respect to such fur product or fur." [45]

It is evident that the last portion of this clause, which we have italicized, covers misrepresentations relating to other matters than the name or names of animals; otherwise it would be meaningless. For after specifying names of animals this provision prohibits specifically "any form" of misrepresentation or deception relating to "such fur product or fur." If the misrepresentations or deceptions which the Congress had in mind were misrepresentations kindred to names of animals, it would have used the words "with respect to such name or names." The use of the phrase "with respect to such fur product or fur" is proof that the clause meant to cover other representations than those relating to names, which were mentioned in the first paragraph of this subsection. Perhaps better grammatical construction might have required the placing of this clause in a separate paragraph at the end of this portion of the section. But we cannot destroy its obvious meaning because, in the slow and arduous process of the enactment of the statute, a clause which has a distinct meaning was inserted in the wrong place. Neither rules of grammar, punctuation nor syntax is decisive of the construction of a statute, if their strict observance would render ineffective any portion of it.[46] Because of this the Supreme Court has stated:

> "It has often been said that punctuation is not decisive of the construction of a statute. * * * Upon like principle we should not apply the rules of syntax to defeat the evident legislative intent." [47]

Some years ago this court, speaking through the late Wm. H. Sawtelle, Circuit Judge, expressed this thought in language which is both colorful and meaningful:

> "There is only one remaining basis for the contention of appellant on grammatical grounds that the opening phrase, 'within five years after entry,' is applicable to the classification under which he falls. That basis would be the closely related field of rhetoric, but it is neither the province nor the desire of this court to set itself up as an academy of letters to rule on questions of style. It may be admitted that the language of many statutes might be improved upon, but, so long as that language follows certain well-established rules of grammar, it is not our duty to judge it by its nicety of phraseology." [48]

More recently, this Court was called upon to determine whether the penalty in an amendment to the Immigration and Naturalization Act applied to a person who transports within the United States an alien who is illegally in the United States.[49] The section punishes several acts. It was argued that, because of the arrangements of the Section, there was no penalty for transporting an alien. While conceding that grammatically the Section might be incorrect, this Court held that the statute, construed as a whole, in the light of the purpose sought to be achieved, should be given effect in every one of its parts, and that the penalty should apply to "any person" doing any of the acts, although, at first glance, the statute made it uncertain whether the word "he" referred to the alien or to one who transports him or to both. The court said:

> "While the verbal arrangement of the statute may be thought awkward, we are of opinion that a reading of it as a whole in light of the congressional declaration of purpose leaves no rational doubt as to what was intended. That part of subsection 8(a), ending with the word 'who,' specifies the persons whose activities are the subject matter of the legislation. Paragraph (1) following relates to the activity of smuggling aliens into the United States; paragraph (2) to the transportation of aliens within the United States by one who knows they are unlawfully here and who knows or has reason to believe that the alien's last entry occurred within three years prior to the transportation; paragraph (3) to the concealing, harboring or shielding of aliens unlawfully in the United States; and the first part of paragraph (4) is aimed at those who aid, abet or encourage the smuggling of aliens into this country. Except for the proviso at the end of paragraph (4) the whole of the subsection constitutes a single sentence, divided into paragraphs which are in the interest of clarity separated from each other by semicolons. The penalty provision is not separately stated in the paragraphs but is set forth in the last. The several types of conduct banned are all made subject to the same punishment there specified, namely, fine or imprisonment 'for each alien in respect to whom any violation of this subsection occurs.' The words 'this subsection' can only refer to subsection (a). Thus it is manifest that the 'he' and 'his' of paragraph (2) refer to the phrase 'any alien,' which finally shows up in paragraph (4) after the several prohibited activities in respect of the alien have been specified."[50]

[Rule Upheld]

We have a similar situation here where, in a regulatory statute, the aim of which is to protect commerce between the states, by, among other things, preventing false advertising of fur products or furs, a general clause prohibiting deceptive advertising practices other than those enumerated instead of being placed after the ultimate clause and made a separate clause is put in as a part of the penultimate clause. As already appears, the whole section spells out certain particular falsities in advertising. The particular clause prohibits other misrepresentations as to fur products or furs. To relate it merely to names would render it meaningless. By applying the principles in the cases just cited, and taking into account the legislative history of the Act, it is quite evident that the intention was to reach all misrepresentations in advertising, including those relating to prices and value. If any doubt exists about the matter the clause under consideration indicates the intention to include them. The Commission was right in so interpreting the statute and acted within its powers in promulgating the rule under discussion.

IV.

Were the Petitioners in Commerce?

In the light of what precedes, the disposition of the remaining questions presents no great difficulty. The Commission was right in holding that the petitioners advertised in commerce.[51] Eight specific sales (two to the same person) of furs destined for delivery outside California between September 29 and December 18 of one year were testified to by De Gorter. The fact that some were sold on time payments to persons not residing in the State and that no California sales tax was collected, the invoices stating "Export" or "Out of State," dispels any thought that this was done merely to accommodate the customer.

De Gorter also testified that there were, in addition to the enumerated sales, a few other out-of-state sales. He did not say what "a few" meant. Advertisements were placed in two Los Angeles newspapers which have circulation outside California. And De Gorter admitted that "approximately" 25 per cent of his fur products were shipped into the State by New York manufacturers. As these importations were continued over a long period of years, there is present a constant flow of goods in commerce which, by itself, would justify the finding of the Commission.[52]

The sales to persons residing outside California, the advertising in newspapers of interstate circulation, and the out-of-state origin of approximately one-fourth of the products sold, taken together, establish the fact that the petitioners were engaged in [50] Herrera v. United States, 9 Cir., 1953, 208 F. 2d 215, 217. See, Perko v. United States, 8 Cir., 1953, 204 F. 2d 446, 447-448, in which the Court rejected a narrow application of the rule of ejusdem generis, which would have rendered meaningless the words "or other governmental purposes" in a section of the Air Commerce Act of 1926, relating to the power of the President:

". . . to provide by Executive order for the setting apart and the protection of airspace reservations in the United States for national defense or other purposes and, in addition, in the District of Columbia for public safety purposes." (49 U. S. C., § 174.) [Italics added.]

interstate commerce as that term is defined in the special Act under consideration and in the Federal Trade Commission Act.[53] Both from a legal and social standpoint, an interpretation that would eliminate false advertising as to value and price at a local level, from the evils which the special Act sought to eradicate, would render it ineffective. Such exclusion would open the door to the type of advertising which is most harmful—a type of advertising which, as will appear further on in the discussion—was characteristic of that carried on by the petitioners. In these days when, through the various media of communication, advertising has so important a part in promoting a wider sale and distribution of products on which the productivity and the well-being of the American economy depend, misrepresentations as to value and price are more likely to have a harmful effect on interstate commerce than misbranding or false invoicing.

All these reasons converge in calling us to reject the narrow interpretation which the petitioners would have us place upon the statute in question in order to avoid the consequences of a type of advertising of prices which the Commission characterized in its findings as "fictitious." This brings us to a consideration of the last point—whether the facts in the record warrant the finding that the advertisements were false as to prices.

V.

The Falsity of the Advertising

[Price Representations]

A study of these advertisements, in the light of the testimony introduced at the trial, compels the conclusion that the finding in this respect is sustained by substantial evidence on the record considered as whole.[54] Indeed, an analysis of the exhibits, in the light of De Gorter's own testimony shows that they were blatantly false. One advertisement speaks of

"Tremendous Inventory
1000 Selected Furs
Priced Regardless of Cost!"

Another uses this phraseology:

"Tremendous Inventory of
Selected Furs
Priced Regardless of Cost!"

Each of these advertisements listed high, apparently former prices ("values up to"), and reduced prices ("now"), giving but a fraction, in some instances a third, of the alleged value. They need not be given in detail here. Some of them will be referred to further on. A third advertisement reads:

"Pelta Fur consolidates with famous wholesale mink manufacturer
More room required! complete stock $250,000.00 exquisite styles now on Sale ½ price present unchanged price tags remain on garment
You May Deduct One-Half!!!"

[Evidence]

De Gorter, by his own testimony and admissions, demonstrated the falsity of these representations. His very pricing system had the badge of deceit in it. He objects to the finding that the prices were "fictitious." The word does not appear in the Act, but it is in the Regulation.[55] By applying it to the facts in the case, the Commission sought to indicate that the entire system of pricing was so arranged that the customer was given the false impression that he was purchasing either a fur at a reduced price, percentagewise or otherwise, when, in reality, no price ticket represented the actual price at which the garment was required to be sold by any salesperson.

"Fictitious" means founded on fiction, having the character of a fiction; false, feigned, or pretended.[56] Each of the last three adjectives could be applied to this method. On each garment there were three prices: a ticketed top price written in dollars and cents, fixed arbitrarily by the petitioners. To guide the salesperson, two additional prices, in code, were placed upon the tag—at either of which the fur could be sold, the percentage of the salesperson's commission depending on the price secured. The ticketed price was merely a bargaining price, of the type which characterizes oriental huckstering.

On one date the petitioners' books reflect nine sales of which only one brought the ticketed price. The others were at either the second or the third code price. De Gorter admitted that, on the whole, he received the ticketed prices in not more than ten percent of his sales. Not one of the prices had any systematic relation to cost or was set up on a definite pattern of profit.

The advertisements trumpeted widely to the prospective customers that they were buying furs of a higher value at a reduced price "regardless of cost" or "at half price." The salespeople re-echoed these statements.

As already appears, the ticketed price was merely the highest price that the petitioners had placed on the garment, which, when reduced by the salesperson to the coded prices, led the customer to believe that he was "picking up" a bargain which, in reality he was not.

We particularize by referring to some sales as to which De Gorter testified. In one instance, the advertised value of $189 appeared on the price tag, but the supposedly reduced figure $68 appeared only in code. In another instance mink coats had a ticketed price of $895 which was represented in the advertisement as the value of the garment. It was sold and shipped to Ohio at $488, the only coded alternative price the garment had.

As to the "half price sales" touted from another advertisement, the evidence shows that a plainly arbitrary price was put on the tickets and the customer informed that he could halve it. There is no evidence that any of the garments ever had the full value claimed for them or that they were intended to sell or had been offered for sale at the higher price. Equally unreliable were the statements as to the relation of price to cost. The phrases used were "discount sale," sales "many at cost," "below cost," "regardless of cost," "at a fraction of original price," "actually below wholesale."

The testimony showed that, as to one item which cost $150, the ticketed price was $298 and the garment was sold for $300, including tax. On another item, of which the purchase price was $69.50, the ticketed price was $249 and the two coded prices were $159 and $198. The garment was actually sold for $163.77, i. e. $159 and the tax. A third item cost $49.50, the ticketed price was $198 and the coded prices $149 and $98. De Gorter did not know what it sold for. So these sales were not "below" or "at cost," or sold "regardless of cost," as the advertisements claimed.

The deceptive character of these advertisements is also illustrated by the fact that when an advertisement stated, for instance, that a garment worth up to $295 was now priced at $150, the ticket price on the supposedly advertised garment was not changed to conform to the advertisement. The customer could not, therefore, identify the advertised product. As De Gorter testified, he might be shown a fur that had a mark of $298 on the ticket and be told that he could buy it for $149. One of the advertisements stated:

> "Complete stock now on sale, > half price, present unchanged price tags > remain on garments, you may > deduct one-half."

In the interrogation as to it before the Hearing Officer, De Gorter was asked:

> "Were you selling all of your merchandise at that time at one-half of your plainly-ticketed price?"

His answer was:

> "No sir, it was indicated exactly in numbers how many and what was sold. It says here 25 beautiful coats and jackets and the type of fur, it says here how many stoles, capes, and the different types, 150 stoles and so on, the different types."

Here again, we have insidious and insinuative language, conveying a false impression, and the attempt to evade its probable and, we may assume, intended effect. For the reader of the advertisement would receive the impression that the "entire" stock of the establishment was being liquidated. He would consider the enumeration of items as particularizing some of the "bargains" that could be picked up. De Gorter tried to defend his method as a practice which obtains locally in the trade and which was forced on him by various month-end and other methods of sales resorted to by other furriers. But no such rationalization can justify the practice. Nor is a Commission charged with preventing unfair and deceptive practices in commerce required to tolerate them because they may be accepted in a definite locality.

Indeed, it is against this type of deception that the Federal Trade Commission Act and the special Fur Products Labeling Statute and the regulations under it were directed.

[Tendency To Mislead]

In this field of the law, it is not necessary that the advertising be, in fact, misleading. If it has a tendency to mislead, it is within the power of the Commission to interdict. A case which arose under the 1950 amendment to Section 12 of the Federal Trade Commission Act,[57] can readily be applied to the situation before us, especially in view of the fact that the Commission here found violation of that Act also. A section of the latter Act makes it unlawful to disseminate or to cause to be disseminated

> "any false advertisement—for the purpose of inducing, or which is likely to induce, directly or indirectly, the purchase of food, drugs, devices, or cosmetics;"[58]

A seller of a product called "Reddi-Spred" which, under the statute, is a margarine,[59] issued advertisements which, without actually claiming that the product was butter, so interwove the word "butter," in bold face, with the phrasing of the advertisement, that it clearly gave the impression that a butter product was involved. In sustaining the action of the Commission which declared the advertising to be false and deceptive under the statute, the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit used this language:

> "The issue before us is not whether the advertisements of Reddi-Spred have the tendency or capacity to deceive the purchasing public into believing that it is in reality a dairy product or something sold under a trade name which is actually different from oleomargarine. Nor does the Commission contend there is no butter in Reddi-Spred. It does justifiably decide that the shrewd featuring of the word butter in the advertisements coupled with skillfully worded statements which infer that because of its butter content Reddi-Spred is substantially different from margarine suggests that Reddi-Spred is a dairy product and so violates the letter and spirit of the statute. With the advertisements before us it is impossible to say that the Commission's finding is arbitrary or clearly wrong."[60]

The special statute before us aims to protect interstate commerce from false advertising relating to fur products and furs. The advertisements under consideration here were alluredly false. For they conveyed the false impression that the purchaser was benefiting from reductions in prices.

As already appears, the sales were neither at a reduction from (a) a price at which the fur product or a similar product sold before, nor were they at (b) half price or (c) below cost.

[Order Affirmed]

In viewing the cease and desist order of this and other regulatory agencies, the decisions teach that the test of the proper scope of an order is

> "whether the Board might have reasonably concluded from the evidence that such an Order was necessary."[61]

We are of the view that the Commission reached such reasonable conclusion in issuing the Order to Cease and Desist before us.

It follows that the Order should be and is hereby affirmed.

"The Commission, which is deemed to have expert experience in dealing with these matters, Federal Trade Commission v. R. F. Keppel & Bro., Inc., 1934, 291 U. S. 304, 314, 54 S. Ct. 423, 78 L. In dealing with matters of this character, the Courts reject the rule of caveat emptor and insist that the fact that the careful reader of the advertisement might detect their true nature presents no obstacle in enforcing orders of the Commission directed at false and deceptive practices: *Federal Trade Commission v. Maryland Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade—Enforcement of Fair Trade Prices—Consent Judgment—Contempt—Effect of Schwegmann Decision.—A consent judgment restraining a non-contracting retailer from selling a fair trader's alcoholic beverages below their established fair trade prices will not be dissolved in view of the Schwegmann decision (1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,823, 341 U. S. 384) since the decision did not invalidate agreements voluntarily entered into by the parties pursuant to the provisions of the Maryland Fair Trade Act as protected by the Miller-Tydings Act. The consent judgment has the force and effect of an agreement or voluntary contract; therefore, the decision does not apply. If the retailer had not consented to the entry of a decree against him, and had not entered into a fair trade contract with the fair trader, and if a decree had nevertheless been entered against him pursuant to the terms of the Maryland Fair Trade Act under the supposed protection of the Miller-Tydings Act, he would have been entitled to have had the decree vacated. Since the consent decree had not been vacated or rescinded, the retailer was guilty of contempt of court when he sold one of the fair trader's products below its established fair trade price. The fact that the sale was made by an employee of the retailer does not constitute a defense. Furthermore, it is no defense that the fair trader changed its corporate name after the entry of the consent judgment since no new party was introduced into the action.

[Fair Trade Injunction]

James Macgill, Judge [In full text]: On July 12th, 1949, Seagram Distillers Corporation, a body corporate, filed its bill of complaint for an injunction against The Mills Cut Rate Liquor Mart, Incorporated, a corporation, and Hillard Donner and Joseph Donner, of Annapolis, Maryland.

The bill of complaint recited that the Complainant, in March, 1947, adopted a system of doing business under the authority of Chapter 239 of the Acts of 1937, known as "The Fair Trade Act," as codified under Sections 102 to 110 of Article 83 of the Annotated Code of Maryland, and pursuant thereto had entered into fair trade contracts with a number of retail liquor dealers in the State of Maryland, whereby uniform minimum resale retail prices to consumers for the products of the Complainant were established in accordance with certain schedules furnished by the Complainant. The bill of complaint went on to recite that such a Fair Trade Contract was entered into by the Complainant with a retail dealer in the City of Baltimore on March 10th, 1947, and that the Defendants refused to observe the minimum resale retail prices established by the Fair Trade Contracts entered into by the Complainant. The bill prayed for a temporary restraining order and an injunction, and this Court by its order of July 12th, 1949, granted a temporary restraining order, restraining the Defendants from selling certain alcoholic beverages at prices lower than the prices established by the Complainant for such products pursuant to the agreement or contracts made by the Complainant with retail dealers of the State of Maryland under the authority of the Maryland Fair Trade Act.

The Defendants on August 29th, 1949, filed their answer to the bill of complaint, admitting the allegations thereof and consenting to the passage of a decree granting the relief therein prayed. Thereupon this Court, by its decree of the same date, permanently enjoined the Defendants from selling certain of the products of the Complainant, therein named, at prices lower than the prices established pursuant to the agreements or contracts made by the Complainant with retail dealers in the State of Maryland under the authority of the Maryland Fair Trade Act. The Defendants consented to the passage of the decree in the form set forth.

[Dissolution of Injunction Sought]

On May 25th, 1950, the Defendants filed a petition in this Court and after reciting the passage of the decree referred to, and their assent thereto, alleged that thereafter they had ascertained that their competitors were permitted to sell alcoholic beverages at prices lower than those set by the Complainant, and, as a result thereof, the Defendants were being unjustly discriminated against. It was, therefore, prayed that the decree of August 29th, 1949, be set aside and the injunction issued thereunder be dissolved. To this petition, the Complainant, on June 8th, 1950, filed a combined answer and demurrer. On May 25th, 1951, apparently at the verbal urging of the Defendants, the late Judge James Clark passed an order setting the petition and answer for a hearing on May 31st, 1951. No action appears to have been taken as a result of this hearing, if such a hearing took place. It was suggested to this Court by counsel that in view of the fact that the Supreme Court on May 21st, of that year, handed down its decision in the case of Schwegmann Brothers v. Calvert Distillers Corporation [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,823], 341 U. S. 384, it was contemplated that the Defendants would amend their petition to recite that decision as an additional ground for the dissolution of the injunction.

[Contempt]

On August 10th, 1954, the Plaintiff Corporation filed its petition asking this Court to require the Defendants to show cause why they should not be punished for contempt for violating the terms of the order of this Court of August 29th, 1949. Thereafter, the individual Defendants, Joseph Donner and Hillard Donner, filed their answers to the contempt petition and later, on September 24th, 1954, they filed a petition for a dissolution of the injunction, giving as grounds therefor the Schwegmann case herebefore referred to, and also the ruling of this Court by the late Judge James Clark in the case of Seagram Distillers Corporation v. Albert A. Block, No. 9775 Equity. To this petition, the Complainant Corporation filed again a combined answer and demurrer, assigning as one of the grounds for the demurrer that the Defendants by consenting to the passage of the final decree made an agreement or contract to observe the minimum retail resale prices established under the Maryland Fair Trade Act, and, therefore, the Schwegmann decision did not apply.

[Issues]

There were two questions presented to this Court at the hearing before it on August 16th, 1956; (1) whether or not the individual Defendants, on the evidence submitted at that time, should be adjudged in contempt for violating the injunction of August 29th, 1949, and (2) whether the order of that date by this Court should be dissolved in view of the Schwegmann case. Although testimony was taken, first, to determine whether or not the individual Defendants had violated the order of this Court, the second question will be first considered in this opinion.

[Dissolution Denied]

It is clear that if the Defendants had not consented to the entry of a decree against them, and had not entered into a Fair Trade Contract with the Complainant Corporation, and if a decree had nevertheless been entered against them pursuant to the terms of the said Fair Trade Act under the supposed protection of the Miller-Tydings Act, they, on seasonal application, would have been entitled to have had the decree vacated, on the strength of the Schwegmann decision. The latter decision, however, did not invalidate agreements voluntarily entered into by the parties pursuant to the provisions of the Fair Trade Act as protected by the Miller-Tydings Act. This Court is of the opinion, as contended by counsel for the Plaintiff, that the consent decree in the case at bar has the force and effect of an agreement or voluntary contract.

> "A consent decree is an agreement of the parties under the sanction of the Court as to what the decision shall be."

(The Ansaldo San Giorgia, 73 Federal (2) 40, see also Hodgson v. Vroom, 266 Federal 267, People ex rel. Nelson v. Joliet Trust and Savings Bank, 42 Northeast (2) 90, Fidelity Union Trust Company v. Union Cemeteries Association, 40 Atlantic (2) 205, and City of Kankakee v. Lang, 54 Northeast (2) 605.) Even if it should be held otherwise, it would not avail the Defendants. The final decree in this case had neither been rescinded nor modified. The Defendants had ample opportunity to move for a vacation of the decree after the decision in the Schwegmann case on the ground of its invalidity and failed to do so. Their attempt to do so now, after they have been cited for contempt, comes too late.

"Certainly, where changes in the relations of the parties or the conditions upon which it is based, occurring after a final decree of the nature of that passed in this case, render its further operation unreasonable, unjust, oppressive or inequitable, the court which passed it necessarily must have the right to dissolve it, and it is wholly unnecessary to resort to so disorderly a proceeding as the commission of a contempt to secure relief." (Emergency Hospital v. Stevens, 146 Maryland 159, 166). "[An] order may be based upon erroneous facts . . . or an erroneous conception of the law, ... Nevertheless, it must be obeyed until such time as it is stricken out on application, or reversed on appeal, or otherwise ceases to be a vital and subsisting direction of a court with proper jurisdiction over the parties to the case." (Donner v. Calvert Distillers Corporation [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,740], 196 Maryland 475, 489).

[Price Violation]

Without going into the details of the testimony adduced by the Complainant to establish a violation of a decree issued by this Court, it appears clear from such testimony and evidence that on July 27th, 1954, Alex Donner, one of the employees of the Defendant, Hillard Donner, (the Defendant Corporation has been dissolved since the passage of the decree, and, thereafter, the liquor store was operated by said Hillard Donner) sold to Elizabeth S. Todd, the wife of an investigator employed by the Complainant a fifth of Seagram's "Ancient Bottle" gin for the price of $3.77 when the minimum resale price, as established under the Fair Trade Act at that time, to consumers for that brand of gin produced by the Complainant, was $4.03. It is also the opinion of this Court, on the evidence, that Mr. Hillard Donner and his employees, Mr. Joseph Donner and Mr. Alex Donner, were all well aware of this minimum price list at the time the sale was made.

[Plaintiff's Change of Name]

The Defendants have filed a motion of ne recipiatur as to the Complainant's petition to amend the title of its case to conform to the present name of the corporate Plaintiff. The Plaintiff filed its petition reciting that by amendment of its certificate of incorporation filed on June 26th, 1954, its name was changed to Distillers Distributing Corporation, and by further amendment filed on August 18th, 1955, its corporate name was changed to The House of Seagram, Inc. It was prayed that the title of the action be amended to show the name of the Plaintiff as "Seagram Distillers Corporation," now known as "The House of Seagram, Inc." On that petition, together with the exhibits filed and verification thereof, this Court on June 25th, 1956, ordered that the title of the action be amended as prayed. It is contended on behalf of the Defendants that the change of the corporate name brought a new Plaintiff into the action who was not a party to the original proceeding, and that, since the original decree was restricted to the benefit of the original Plaintiff, the new Plaintiff could not claim the advantage thereof. This Court finds no merit in this contention. No new party has been introduced into this proceeding; the Corporation remains the same in so far as the record discloses, but merely operates under another name. There is nothing here to indicate that the present Plaintiff is a legal entity separate and distinct from the original Plaintiff, either by way of being a successor corporation or an assignee of the Corporation as originally named.

The fact that the sale in question was made to Mrs. Todd by an employee of the Defendant, Hillard Donner, is of no avail to him as a defense. The act of Mr. Alex Donner, for the puropse of this proceeding, was the act of Mr. Hillard Donner. (Carroll v. State, 63 Maryland 551.)

[Contempt]

This Court must adjudge the Defendant, Hillard Donner, in contempt of this Court. The corporation, The Mills Cut Rate Liquor Mart, appears to have been dissolved prior to the violation cited, and the other individual Defendant, Joseph Donner, so far as this Court can determine, was at that time, neither a partner nor a co-licensee and so cannot be held.

Before passing an order against the said Hillard Donner, this Court will hear such testimony as may be offered as to the measure of punishment.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. September, 1956 Term—April, 1957 Session. No. 11798. Dated April 30, 1957.

On Petition for Review of a Final Order of the Federal Trade Commission.

Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act

Price Discrimination—Volume Discounts—Effect Upon Competition—Legality—Sufficiency of Evidence.—A Federal Trade Commission order prohibiting a manufacturer from discriminating in prices in the sale of its automotive ignition line and fuel-pump line to automotive parts jobbers or distributors was affirmed. There was substantial evidence to support the Commission's findings that purchasers of the manufacturer's products were competitively engaged in the resale of such products and that the manufacturer's discriminatory prices have an adverse effect upon competition. The price paid by jobber customers was based in the first instance on the manufacturer's jobber price list. Jobbers purchasing ignition products on the basis of a franchise agreement were accorded discounts of 20 per cent and 2 per cent from the jobber base price schedule, and jobbers purchasing ignition products on the basis of a rebate agreement were accorded instead of the usual 2 per cent, varying discounts from the jobber base price schedule depending on the total volume of monthly purchases. Essentially the same type of pricing was used for sales in the fuel-pump line. Also, the evidence established that within each classification or line the products were of one grade and quality.

See Price Discrimination, Vol. 1, ¶ 3505, 3505.390, 3508.495, 3508.652.

Federal Trade Commission Enforcement and Procedure—Enforcement of Prohibitions Against Price Discrimination—Postponement of Effective Date of Order—Sufficiency of Evidence.—On a petition to review a Federal Trade Commission order prohibiting a manufacturer of automotive products from discriminating in prices, the manufacturer's request, made on oral argument, that the effective date of the Commission's order be postponed until some future time was denied. There was no evidence that the manufacturer would be forced out of business if the traditional pricing practices which it followed would be denied to it, while its competitors were left free to continue such practices. Furthermore, the request made at the time of the oral argument came too late.

Affirming a Federal Trade Commission cease and desist order in Dkt. 5913.

Before DUFFY, Chief Judge, and FINNEGAN and SWAIM, Circuit Judges.

[Price Discrimination Order]

DUFFY, Chief Judge [In full text]: This is a petition to review and set aside a cease and desist order of the Federal Trade Commission. The complaint charged petitioner with discrimination in price between different purchasers of its automotive products of like grade and quality in violation of subsection (a) of Section 2 of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act (15 U. S. C. § 13).

At the conclusion of the testimony and evidence which comprised the Commission's case, petitioner moved to dismiss the complaint on the ground that a prima facie violation of subsection (a) of section 2 had not been established. This motion was denied. Petitioner did not present any evidence but again moved for dismissal which motion was likewise denied.

The hearing examiner entered an initial decision and made detailed findings of fact. He found that petitioner sold its products in commerce; that these products were of like grade and quality; that they were sold to petitioner's customers at different prices; that the customers who were accorded the different prices, competed with each other in the resale of such products; that the different prices were discriminatory and had the proscribed adverse effect upon competition. The examiner concluded that petitioner had violated section 2(a) of the amended Clayton Act, and entered a provisional order to cease and desist. Petitioner appealed and the matter came before the Commission for decision. The Commission denied the appeal, and adopted the findings, conclusions and order of the examiner as those of the Commission.

[Petitioner's Business and Practices]

P. & D. Manufacturing Co., Inc., is located in New York. It sells and distributes in commerce, certain automotive products and supplies which it groups into two lines, an ignition line and a fuel-pump line. The record shows that within each classification or line petitioner's products are of one grade and quality.

Petitioner's domestic sales volume in 1950 was approximately $1,685,000, and sales were made to some 700 automotive parts jobbers who petitioner calls distributors. They, in turn, resell these parts to garages, service stations, fleet owners, car dealers and other jobbers. The price paid by these jobber customers was based in the first instance on petitioner's jobber price list which is the base price schedule. Jobbers purchasing ignition products on the basis of the franchise agreement were accorded discounts of 20% and 2% from the jobber base price schedule. Jobbers purchasing ignition products on the basis of rebate agreements were accorded instead of the usual 2%, varying discounts from the jobber base price schedule depending on total volume of monthly purchases. Essentially the same type of pricing was used for sales in the fuel-pump line.

[Substantial Evidence]

We hold there is substantial evidence to support the Commission's findings that purchasers of petitioner's products are competitively engaged in the resale thereof; also that substantial evidence supports the Commission's finding that petitioner's discriminatory prices have an adverse competitive effect such as is proscribed by the statute. Of course, all the statute requires is that the practices complained of may substantially lessen competition. See Federal Trade Commission v. Morton Salt Co. [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,247], 334 U. S. 37, 46 and Corn Products Refining Co., et al. v. Federal Trade Commission [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,363], 324 U. S. 726, 738. We are also of the view that the Commission's order properly responds to the findings and conclusions of the Commission.

A more detailed discussion of our reasons for holding as hereinbefore indicated would seem to be unnecessary in view of our decisions in recent cases where practically the same issues were raised. These cases are: E. Edelmann & Company v. Federal Trade Commission [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,558], 239 F. 2d 152; Whitaker Cable Corporation v. Federal Trade Commission [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,559], 239 F. 2d 253, and C. E. Niehoff & Co. v. Federal Trade Commission [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,587], decided January 9, 1957, our No. 11526.

[Postponement]

On oral argument petitioner's counsel requested that we adopt here the same procedure as we did in the Niehoff case, that is, postpone the effective date of the Commission's order until some indefinite time in the future.

In Niehoff there was evidence in the record that C. E. Niehoff & Co. would be forced out of business if the traditional pricing practices which it then followed would be denied to it, while its competitors were left free to continue such practices. No such proof or argument was made in the case at bar. The suggestion made at the time of oral argument comes too late.

[Affirmed]

The order of the Commission is affirmed.

Order and Opinion upon Remand from the Supreme Court

PER CURIAM [In full text]: The Supreme Court, in Federal Trade Commission v. National Lead Company [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,629], 352 U. S. 419, has held that the paragraph quoted from the Commission's order on page 21 of our original opinion and on page 840 of the reported opinion [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,211] (227 F. 2d 825), represented proper exercise of its functions by the Commission in determining the remedy to be employed in enforcing its order. Consequently, what we have said in our original opinion to the contrary in that respect, including all that part beginning with and following the last paragraph on page 24 of the printed opinion, and with the last paragraph on page 841 of the reported opinion, is stricken. The said quoted paragraph of the Commission's order is now approved. Accordingly, the order, as modified by our original opinion and as now modified, is affirmed. The Commission shall, within 20 days, submit a proposed decree modifying its order in accord with the views expressed in our original opinion as modified hereby and in that of the Supreme Court on review, and submit the same to petitioners, and this court. Within 10 days thereafter petitioners shall consent or file objection thereto. The final decree will then be entered.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit. No. 5188. Dated May 2, 1957. Petition for rehearing denied, 1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,746.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts. WYZANSKI, District Judge.

Massachusetts Fair Trade Act and McGuire Act

Fair Trade—Resale Price Fixing Between Competitors—Producer's Suit To Enjoin Retailer from Selling Below Fair Trade Prices—McGuire Act—Competition Between Parties—Test.—An oil company could not maintain a suit to restrain an operator of two retail gasoline stations, a nonsigner of a fair trade contract, from selling the company's gasoline at less than the fair trade prices established under the Massachusetts Fair Trade Act, since the oil company and the station operator competed with each other in the sale of gasoline to commercial accounts. The company was engaged in interstate commerce; therefore, its fair trade contracts with its retailers, even though authorized by state law, were illegal per se under federal antitrust legislation unless exempted therefrom by the Miller-Tydings and McGuire acts. These acts provide that the grant of immunity from federal condemnation shall not make lawful any contract providing for the establishment of resale prices "between manufacturers, or between producers, or between wholesalers, or between brokers, or between factors, or between retailers, or between persons, firms, or corporations in competition with each other." The oil company and the operator competed with each other for the business of a not insubstantial class or type of consumers and therefore were corporations in competition with each other. Although their techniques of doing business differed they were nonetheless competitors, and this excluded the application of the exemption from antitrust legislation. The fact that their competition was not on the same "functional level" was irrelevant. Any competition for customers is an absolute bar to price maintenance agreements between competitors. Also, the company was not entitled to partial injunctive relief, that is, relief as to the separate class of business for which it and the operator did not actually or potentially compete.

Affirming a decision of the U. S. District Court, District of Massachusetts, 1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,547.

Before WOODBURY and HARTIGAN, Circuit Judges, and ALDRICH, District Judge.

Opinion of the Court

[Fair Trade Suit]

WOODBURY, Circuit Judge [In full text]: This appeal is from a judgment dismissing a complaint in a suit brought under federal diversity jurisdiction to enjoin a "nonsigner" retailer from selling the plaintiff's Esso and Esso Extra gasolines in Massachusetts for less than the minimum retail prices established therefor in fair-trade agreements entered into by the plaintiff with third party retailers pursuant to the Massachusetts Fair Trade Law, Mass. G. L. c. 93 § 14A-B, quoted in material part in the margin.[1]

[Requirements Contract]

The plaintiff, Esso Standard Oil Company, is a Delaware corporation engaged in the production, distribution and marketing of gasoline and other petroleum products throughout the United States and in foreign countries. In September, 1953, it entered into a three-year contract to take effect on May 1, 1954, with the defendant, Secatore's, Inc., a Massachusetts corporation operating two large gasoline service stations in East Boston, Massachusetts, whereby it agreed to sell to the defendant and the defendant agreed to buy from the plaintiff, all of the buyer's requirements of [1] "Section 14A. No contract relating to the sale or resale of a commodity which bears, or the label or container of which bears, or the vending equipment from which said commodity is sold to consumer bears, the trade-mark, brand or name of the producer or owner of such commodity and which is in fair and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced by others shall be deemed in violation of any law of the commonwealth by reason of any of the following provisions which may be contained in such contract:

"(1) That the buyer will not resell such commodity except at the price stipulated by the vendor.

"(2) That the producer or vendee of a commodity require upon the sale of such commodity to another, that such purchaser agree that he will not, in turn, resell except at the price stipulated by such producer or vendee.

"Section 14B. Willfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale or selling any commodity at less than the price stipulated in any contract entered into pursuant to the preceding section, whether the person so advertising, offering for sale or selling is or is not a party to such contract, is hereby declared to constitute unfair competition and to be actionable at the suit of any person damaged thereby."

Esso and Esso Extra gasolines at the seller's posted tank wagon prices "in effect at the time and place from which delivery is made."

[Fair Trade Contracts]

At the time when this contract was made the plaintiff had not entered into any fair trade agreements with anyone in Massachusetts. On August 7 and 8, 1956, however, while its contract with the defendant was in force, the plaintiff negotiated resale price maintenance agreements with several of its retail dealers in Massachusetts fixing minimum retail prices for its Esso and Esso Extra gasolines. The defendant was promptly notified of these agreements and directed to observe the minimum prices therein established. It refused to do so and asserts the right to persist in its refusal unless the court orders it to comply.

[Federal Fair Trade Laws]

It is obvious, and indeed it is freely conceded, that the plaintiff is engaged in interstate commerce. Thus its minimum price fixing agreements with its retailers, even though authorized by state law, are illegal per se under federal antitrust legislation unless exempted therefrom by the Miller-Tydings amendment, 50 Stat. 693 (1937), of § 1 of the Sherman Act and the McGuire amendment, 66 Stat. 632 (1952), of § 5(a) of the Federal Trade Commission Act.[2] Schwegmann Bros. v. Calvert Corp. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,823], 341 U. S. 384, 386 (1951); United States v. McKesson & Robbins, Inc. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,368], 351 U. S. 305, 310, 311 (1956), and cases cited. The Miller-Tydings amendment, and in almost identical language the McGuire amendment also, provide in material part that nothing in federal antitrust legislation "shall render illegal, contracts or agreements prescribing minimum prices for the resale of a commodity which bears, or the label or container of which bears, the trade mark, brand, or name of the producer or distributor of such commodity and which is in free and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced or distributed by others, when contracts or agreements of that description are lawful as applied to intrastate transactions" under local law. But both amendatory acts provide that the grant of immunity from federal condemnation "shall not make lawful any contract or agreement, providing for the establishment or maintenance of minimum resale prices on any commodity herein involved, between manufacturers, or between producers, or between wholesalers, or between brokers, or between factors, or between retailers, or between persons, firms, or corporations in competition with each other."

[Issue]

The critical, and as we see it the controlling, question before the court below and before us is whether the plaintiff and defendant are "corporations in competition with each other."

[Trial Court Ruling]

With its complaint the plaintiff filed a motion for a temporary injunction and the court below held a hearing on the motion. At that hearing the defendant stipulated that practically all of the allegations of fact in the complaint could be accepted as true and made three points in defense. It asserted, first, that the plaintiff's contract with the defendant barred the relief sought, second, that the plaintiff was "in competition" with the defendant and its other retailers, and, third, that the plaintiff had been lax in requiring its other retailers to observe its fair trade agreements. On the basis of the evidence introduced at this hearing the court in a carefully prepared opinion rejected all of these defenses and granted the plaintiff the temporary relief for which it asked.

Later on, however, after a hearing on the merits, the court below found on the basis of further evidence that the plaintiff was "in competition" with the defendant and its other retailers. Thus it concluded that the plaintiff's price maintenance agreements were not within the exemption of the Miller-Tydings and McGuire amendments and so were illegal under federal antitrust legislation. Wherefore it vacated forthwith the temporary injunction it had granted and entered the judgment dismissing the plaintiff's complaint which is before us on this appeal.

[2] The McGuire amendment not only reaffirmed the policy of the Miller-Tydings amendment, but it also eliminated the restrictive effect of the Supreme Court's decision in the Schwegmann Bros. case by exempting from the antitrust laws minimum price-fixing agreements made binding by state law on "non-signers" of such agreements.

[Competition Between Parties]

The plaintiff-appellant not only supplies its gasolines to its retail dealers who in turn sell to ultimate consumers at their filling stations, but it also sells direct to some ultimate customers. It has several hundred so-called "commercial accounts" in Massachusetts, all of whom use a substantial quantity of gasoline per year. These for the most part are operators of fleets of trucks or taxicabs, although some of them also use gasoline for lift-trucks and other off-the-road vehicles. In many cases the plaintiff at its own expense provides, installs and maintains underground tanks and pumps on the respective premises of these customers and it delivers gasoline to them from its bulk plants by tank truck in quantities never less than 300 gallons except in emergency. It charges them one cent per gallon above its posted tank wagon price. There is no set minimum annual consumption required to qualify for a commercial account, but the plaintiff will sell to any such account on which it thinks it can make a profit. Some of these accounts use less than 5,000 gallons annually, but most of them use much more. It actively solicits this type of business and in 1955, the last year for which complete figures were available, it amounted in Massachusetts to over $3,000,000 per year, or about 10% of the appellant's gross local business.

The defendant-appellee also does a substantial annual business at its filling stations with operators of fleets of motor vehicles. There is no evidence of the dollar volume of this business but in 1955 it had 45 accounts using over 5,000 gallons per year, so it clearly is not inconsiderable. It services these accounts at its filling stations in the customary way that filling stations generally service their customers. That is to say, the fleet operators' trucks or taxicabs are driven to the defendant's station and there the defendant's employees fill the vehicles' tanks and perform the incidental services ordinarily performed by filling station attendants.

[Interpretation of Federal Laws]

Thus, as the District Court found, there is most certainly an area in which the plaintiff and the defendant are in competition with each other. While their competitive techniques are different, one gives less service for a lower price and the other more service for a higher price, the fact remains that each in its own way is striving for the business of supplying gasoline directly to those who operate fleets of motor vehicles. And the area of their competition is not so small that it can be disregarded by application of the de minimis maxim. Nevertheless the plaintiff-appellant contends that its competition with the defendant-appellee does not exclude application of the exculpatory provisions of the Miller-Tydings and McGuire Acts because their competition is not on the same "functional level." It argues that by application of the rule of ejusdem generis the general language of the concluding phrase, "persons, firms, or corporations in competition with each other," is controlled by the preceding reference to six specific categories of competitors, and that therefore the phrase alludes only to retailers, wholesalers etc. who go under another name in commercial jargon, as perhaps "jobbers" or "agents." Alternatively it argues that in context the final phrase refers only to the type of competition which occurs between retailer and retailer or between wholesaler and wholesaler, and so forth, which it asserts is competition in serving the same "function." In short, by putting stress on "function" the plaintiff-appellant seeks to distinguish competition in rendering the same service from competition for the same customers.

[McKesson & Robbins Case]

We think these arguments must be rejected on the language and rationale of the Supreme Court in United States v. McKesson & Robbins, Inc. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,368], 351 U. S. 305 (1956). The defendant in that case manufactured a line of drug products which it marketed under its own brand name and it also acted as a wholesaler of its own and other commodities sold in drugstores. It entered into resale price maintenance agreements with respect to its own branded merchandise with other wholesalers of like products and the United States proceeded against it under § 4 of the Sherman Act for injunctive relief asserting that the agreements constituted an illegal restraint of trade. McKesson & Robbins contended in defense that it had made the price maintenance agreements in its role of manufacturer, and therefore the agreements were not "between wholesalers."

The Supreme Court, refusing to compartmentalize the defendant's business, rejected this defense. It might, perhaps, have rested its decision solely on the proposition that McKesson & Robbins was a wholesaler because it did "wholesale" selling or, alternatively, that it was more a wholesaler than a manufacturer, and hence its price maintenance agreements were "between wholesalers." But it did not so limit its rationale. It said at pages 312-13:

> "Any doubts which might otherwise be raised as to the propriety of considering a manufacturer-wholesaler as a 'wholesaler' are dispelled by the last phrase of the proviso in question, which continues the proscription against price-fixing agreements 'between persons, firms, or corporations in competition with each other.' Congress thus made as plain as words can make it that, without regard to categories or labels, the crucial inquiry is whether the contracting parties compete with each other. If they do, the Miller-Tydings and McGuire Acts do not permit them to fix resale prices."

[Schwegmann Case]

It is true that the Court then went on to say that it had been said in Schwegmann Bros. v. Calvert Corp. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,823], 341 U. S. 384, 389 (1951), that the statutory language "'expressly continues the prohibitions of the Sherman Act against "horizontal" price fixing by those in competition with each other at the same functional level,'" and followed this with the statement: "Since appellee competes 'at the same functional level' with each of the 94 wholesalers with whom it has price-fixing agreements, the proviso prevents these agreements from falling within the statutory exemption." And on page 315 of its McKesson opinion the Court said that "the language of the proviso in question is unambiguous" and "excludes from the exemption from the per se rule of illegality resale price maintenance contracts between firms competing on the same functional level."

[Test]

Thus the Supreme Court in the McKesson & Robbins case, as in the Schwegmann Bros. case, made several direct references to competition "on the same functional level." But from reading the opinions in both cases in their entireties we think the Supreme Court in each instance was using the phrase in a descriptive rather than a restrictive sense. The word "functional" itself is not precise in meaning and it does not seem to have any clear significance in either case. In neither case is the word defined and it may well have been used in contradistinction to "categories or labels" to broaden the construction of "competition" beyond that between businesses of the same nomenclature. Indeed, this interpretation is in keeping with the admonition, to be considered more fully later, that the exemption accorded by Congress in the Miller-Tydings and McGuire Acts from the ban of the Antitrust Acts is to be narrowly construed. As we read the long quotation from the McKesson & Robbins case above, "categories or labels" are not the "crucial inquiry." What is determinative is "whether the contracting parties compete with each other." The parties before us on this appeal, as we have shown, are in a real sense competing with each other for the business of a not insubstantial class or type of consumers of gasoline. Although their techniques of doing business differ, they are nonetheless competitors, and this excludes application of the exemption from antitrust legislation.

In short, we think the Antitrust Acts are not so much concerned with the preservation of competition in performing given functions as such as they are with preserving to consumers the benefits which result from competition between different businesses to serve a particular consumer need. And we do not think that Congress in the Miller-Tydings and McGuire Acts intended to limit or restrict full achievement of that major concern.

[Partial Injunctive Relief]

But the appellant contends that even though there is competition between the parties to a limited extent, nevertheless it is entitled to injunctive relief as to the separate class of business for which it and the defendant do not actually or potentially compete. That is to say, it contends that it is entitled to enforce resale price maintenance with respect to that separable portion of the defendant's trade as to which it does not compete, i. e. ordinary retail sales in relatively small amounts to the ordinary run of motorists.

The appellant did not make this suggestion in the court below. Thus there may well be unexplored practical difficulties, if not difficulties under local statutes, which would render it inexpedient to grant the partial relief asked for. This does not prevent us from considering the suggestion, however, for we could remand for further hearing. But we shall not take that course for we do not think the statute permits the partial relief requested.

No authority is cited for a grant of limited relief, and the possibility of granting such relief is not mentioned in any case which has come to our attention. Nevertheless, it can be said that the Miller-Tydings and McGuire amendments do not specifically forbid it, and in the many situations in which wholesalers and retailers in general are in competition for large accounts, to allow partial relief of the sort requested would effectuate the avowed purpose of the amendment to permit price maintenance as to trade marked or brand named goods in order to prevent destructive cutthroat competition and to cure the evils attendant upon the use by some retailers of "loss leaders." We cannot accept the argument, however, in view of the strictness with which the amendments were construed in the Schwegmann Bros. case, and also in the McKesson & Robbins case, wherein at the conclusion of the Court's opinion on page 316 it is said:

> "Congress has marked the limitations beyond which price fixing cannot go. We are not only bound by those limitations but we are bound to construe them strictly, since resale price maintenance is a privilege restrictive of a free economy."

Our conclusion, therefore, is that any competition for customers is an absolute bar to price maintenance agreements between the competitors.

[Other Defenses]

This conclusion renders unnecessary any consideration of the other defenses raised below and of the additional defense suggested on this appeal that gasoline cannot be fair-traded under the Miller-Tydings and McGuire Acts because it is not "a commodity which bears, or the label or container of which bears, the trademark, brand, or name" of its producer.

A judgment will be entered affirming the judgment of the District Court.

[Concurring Opinion]

ALDRICH, District Judge, (concurring). I concur in Judge Woodbury's opinion on rehearing [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,746]. However, now that it appears that appellant did raise the matter of partial injunctive relief below, I feel I must face up more squarely to that issue. Upon further consideration my prior concurring opinion is now withdrawn in toto, and the following observations substituted.

I do not quarrel with the view that the parties are "persons in competition with each other." The McGuire Act does not, contrary to appellant's argument, exempt from permissible fair trade agreements contracts between "producers, wholesalers, brokers, factors, retailers, or other persons in competition with each other," which might call for the application of the rule of ejusdem generis to limit competition to so-called horizontal levels, but reads "persons," not "other persons." Hence it withholds approval of agreements, express or by operation of law, between all competitors. If there were doubt of this interpretation the history and purpose of the Sherman Act, and the fact that McGuire's intent is to carve limited exceptions thereto, would supply the answer. True, since most competition is on horizontal levels, courts in particular cases may naturally fall into the use of that terminology. But, as appellant suggests as to the Sherman Act, quoting from Times-Picayune Publishing Co. v. United States [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,494], 345 U. S. 594, at 615, ". . . the Act deals with competitive realities, not words." If bona fide competition exists here, I see no basis for restricting the language of the statute.

Competition has many meanings. In a sense the movie house and the television retailer are in competition with each other for the "amusement dollar." But here the essential commodity, gasoline, is the same. The servicing, etc., may be only the fringe. If owners of fleets of trucks or taxi-cabs may be influenced in their choice of purchasing gasoline from appellant or appellee by the question of price, I believe the latter are "persons . . . in competition with each other" within the Act, I can not say that the finding below that they are is plainly wrong. But if the parties are thus persons in competition it is because of appellee's unusual activities distinguishing it from other retailers whose business is less extensive. If those activities are truly severable, it seems arguable that the bar to appellant's injunction should be equally so. If appellant manufactured, and fair-traded, both gasoline and toothpaste, and appellee sold both, but the parties were actually in competition only as to the former, I could not say they were persons in competition as to both.

However, I suggest appellant's rights here are lost not because of appellee's special activities which made them persons in competition, but because its own activities made it a retailer. Agreements between retailers are not protected. The statute supplies no definition of retailer. The dictionary supplies two: one who sells in small quantities, and one who sells to the ultimate consumer. Of these the latter seems the more in keeping with the concept of the Fair Trade acts. It clearly covers appellant's "commercial accounts."

Either competition or retailing would result in the denial of complete relief to appellant, but the second must be fatal to even partial relief. It would be one thing to say that with respect to separable activities as to which the parties were not competing they were not "persons in competition with each other." It would be quite another to say that if appellant is to be classed as a retailer it can escape the force of the Act, even in part, by showing it is something additional. Price-fixing agreements between retailers are invalid per se, irrespective of the area of competition. On this basis there could be no possible issue of partial relief.

New York Fair Trade (Feld-Crawford) Act

Fair Trade—Fair Trade Agreements Between Competitors—Validity of Contract.—In a fair trade enforcement action brought by a manufacturer against a retailer, the retailer's contention that the manufacturer's fair trade contract was invalid because it was a horizontal price fixing agreement was rejected, and the manufacturer was granted injunctive relief and damages in the amount of $1,000. The contract was not a horizontal price fixing agreement between persons, firms, or corporations competing on the same functional level. The contract was between a manufacturer and a retailer, and it complied with the provisions of the New York Fair Trade Act.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3100.

[Validity of Contracts]

BENVENGA, Justice [In full text]: In this action plaintiff, a manufacturer of branded and trade marked products, seeks to enjoin defendant, a retailer selling directly to the public, from selling its products at prices below those established in accordance with the Fair Trade Law (see General Business Law, section 369-a). The evidence shows repeated violations by defendant of plaintiff's fair trade rights. The Fair Trade Law, as has been pointed out, permits a manufacturer, whose trade mark or brand name may represent a large advertising investment and a carefully nurtured good will, to prevent retailers, over whom he would otherwise have little control, from seriously impairing the value of that trade mark and good will by reselling his identified products at unreasonably low prices (General Elec. Co. v. Masters [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,776], 307 N. Y., 229, 238-239, appeal dismissed [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,907] 348 U. S. 892). Although defendant admits the existence of plaintiff's fair trade contract, he denies its validity and enforcibility, relying upon United States v. McKesson & Robbins [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,368] (351 U. S., 305) and United States v. Meredith Pub. Co. (U. S. D. C., S. D. N. Y., May 14, 1956, Civ. 109, 292, not officially reported). These cases hold, in substance, that the Fair Trade Law does not apply to "horizontal" price-fixing agreements between manufacturers, or between producers, or between wholesalers, or between brokers, or between factors, or between retailers, or between persons, firms or corporations "in competition with each other at the same functional level" (see 351 U. S., at pp. 311, 313, 315). The contract here involved is not a "horizontal" price-fixing agreement between persons, firms or corporations competing on the same functional level. It is an agreement between a manufacturer and a retailer; it complies with the provisions of the Fair Trade Law, and is substantially similar to the contracts which were upheld in the General Electric Co. case (supra, at p. 241). And, apparently, the contract here in suit was upheld in Schwegmann Bros. v. Eli Lilly & Co. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,516] (205 F., 2d, 788, cert. denied 346 U. S., 856, 905), cited with approval in the General Electric Co. case (supra, at p. 240). Judgment is therefore directed for plaintiff in accordance with prayer for relief and damages are assessed in the sum of $1,000. Settle judgment.

Fair Trade—Enforcement of Fair Trade Prices—Violation of Injunction—Contempt. —A retailer, who was adjudged guilty of contempt of court for willfully violating a preliminary fair trade enforcement injunction, was fined the sum of $500. [Contempt]

A. DAVID BENJAMIN, Justice [In full text]: On the testimony offered before me at the hearing on November 29, 1956, I find that the defendant in the several instances claimed has willfully and deliberately violated the order of this court entered November 15, 1955 granting a preliminary injunction herein (General Business Law, § 369-a et seq.; Fair Trade Law).

His conduct in so violating the temporary restraining order was calculated to impair, impede, defeat and prejudice the rights of the plaintiff and to flout the mandate of this court. He is therefore adjudged guilty of contempt of court (Judiciary Law, § 753, subd. A, pars. 1, 2, 3).

The plaintiff has shown no pecuniary loss arising from the offenses. The defendant is now contrite. He is aware of the seriousness of his offenses; he will not suffer them to be repeated and pleads for leniency. He conducts a small neighborhood retail business. He wife is hospitalized and he is the sole support of his young daughter and his aged mother. The court in assessing punishment herein is not unmindful of defendant's circumstances. He is fined the sum of $500. Motion granted. Submit order accordingly.

Appeal from order of the Supreme Court at Special Term (LYNCH, J.) entered February 14, 1957 in the New York County Clerk's office adjudging defendant guilty of two separate contempts.

New York Fair Trade (Feld-Crawford) Act

Fair Trade—Enforcement of Fair Trade Prices—Violation of Injunction—Contempt—Hearing.—An order adjudging a defendant guilty of contempt for violating a fair trade enforcement injunction was affirmed, where the order was entered on affidavits, without a hearing. The affidavits were not so hopelessly complicated, when considered with other factors, as to require a hearing. The record showed prior violations of the injunction, and the defendant failed to produce certain sales records.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3380.34.

[Contempt—Hearing]

PER CURIAM [In full text]: This Court has repeatedly held that orders of reference upon the disposition of motions are not encouraged and should be made rarely and resorted to only in exceptional cases where the interests of justice require the unraveling of complicated facts which cannot be determined upon hopelessly conflicting affidavits. (Shillman v. Toulson, 211 App. Div. 336; Slutzkin v. Gerhard & Hey, Inc., 195 App. Div. 559; Weinberger v. Metropolitan Traction Co., 63 App. Div. 240; Wamsley v. Horton & Co., 68 Hun. 549.) It does not appear that the affidavits herein were so hopelessly complicated, when considered with the other factors, as to require Special Term to order a hearing.

There are no affidavits from the sales persons or the bookkeeper to support the claim of defendant's president that he instructed said employees not to sell products manufactured by the plaintiff or that they, in fact, made no such sales. There have been eleven prior violations of the permanent injunction resulting in four adjudications of contempt. Each such violation was categorically denied. Nine of the denials were subsequently withdrawn and in lieu thereof admissions made of said violations. The record abundantly sustains Special Term's exercise of its discretion in granting the motion to punish for contempt.

Furthermore, the affidavit of defendant's president, which lacks a verification date, is equivocal. The affidavit states (referring to sales slips produced by plaintiffs):

> "The defendant Golden Rule Appliance Co., Inc., has no such register which would give this type of receipt. It is impossible to get a receipt of this kind from your deponent's store, since we have no available machine which would give a receipt of this kind or one similar to it. Our sales slip is a handwritten one, which is written out when a sale is consummated."

The affidavit fails to state that the defendant never had such a machine or that such a register was never in defendant's store.

Although the aforementioned affidavit states that the business practice in Golden Rule Appliance Co., Inc. is to keep a tape which shows every sale made each and every day, no such tape was presented to Special Term.

The order appealed from should be affirmed, with $20 costs to the respondent.

Before: CLARK, Chief Judge, and LUMBARD and WATERMAN, Circuit Judges.

[Appeal]

Plaintiff appeals from an order, D. C. S. D. N. Y. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,531], 146 F. Supp. 300, entered in its action charging defendants with a conspiracy to restrain interstate commerce in soft drinks which dismissed two of its four causes of action, struck out parts of the other two causes, and ordered the filing of an amended complaint embodying these and other corrections or amplifications of the retained causes. Defendants have moved to dismiss the appeal. Motion granted.

[Partial Dismissal of Claims]

PER CURIAM [In full text]: The complaint herein, as Judge McGohey shows in his reasoned opinion, D. C. S. D. N. Y. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,531], 146 F. Supp. 300, charged an extensive conspiracy to restrain interstate commerce in soft drinks. Judge McGohey was not impressed with certain of the claims and therefore dismissed two of the four causes of action into which the complaint was divided and ordered extensive corrections by way of an amended complaint in the others. Thus he held insufficient a count alleging a conspiracy between a corporation and its own officers and directors, as well as a count alleging a well-known and apparently valid trade-mark now void and unenforceable. All the acts alleged are intertwined to make one conspiracy, so that this is a single claim, not a multi-claim, controversy. True, after we had once dismissed this appeal, Judge McGohey was persuaded belatedly to file the findings of finality set forth in F. R. 54(b) to make a judgment on one of several claims appealable. But we have held that dismissal must follow, notwithstanding the finding, if but a single over-all claim is stated. See, e.g., Leonidakis v. International Telecoin Corp., 2 Cir., 208 F. 2d 934; Zwack v. Kraus Bros. & Co., 2 Cir., 237 F. 2d 255.

[Appeal Dismissed]

Plaintiff relies on certain expressions, apart from context, in Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Mackey [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,370], 351 U. S. 427, and Cold Metal Process Co. v. United Engineering & Foundry Co., 351 U. S. 445, as extending claim to mean not a single happening, transaction, or occurrence, but in effect any variation in legal theory, and that the district judge's certificate must be accepted by us unless there is abuse of discretion. 351 U. S. at page 452. We do not think Justice Burton intended to go thus far; the whole tenor of his discussion, as well as the actual decisions, seems to us to re-enforce the point of our cases stated above. But if we are in error here, then we must find an abuse of discretion in the granting of the finding of finality. There is here but one species of economic activity and coercion stated, though it may have taken various forms and may have violated differing rules of statutory or common law. We cannot decide the issues intelligently piecemeal and, if we so attempt, are sure to find ourselves uttering pious generalities only which will come back to plague us later. We doubt if plaintiff will actually find itself limited in proof that it may wish to offer at trial and we venture the prophecy that this present issue will be quite moot after trial.

Motion granted; appeal dismissed.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Interlocking Directorates—Enforcement of Clayton Act Prohibition—Stockholder's Derivative Action—Attorney's Fees Where Action Rendered Moot.—Where a stockholder's derivative action to enjoin certain individuals from serving on the boards of directors of two corporations at the same time in violation of the Clayton Act was rendered moot when the individuals resigned as directors of one of the corporations, the plaintiff stockholder was not entitled to counsel fees in his derivative action since he failed to prove sufficient benefit to his corporation to entitle his attorney to reimbursement. Section 16 of the Clayton Act allows "injunctive relief * * * when and under the same conditions and principles as injunctive relief against threatened conduct that will cause loss or damage is granted by courts of equity, under the rules governing such proceedings * * *." The modern equity practice is to allow counsel fees to successful prosecutors of derivative suits, although no judgment has been obtained, if they show substantial benefit to the corporation through their efforts. The court rejected the theory that counsel fees could not be recovered because the stockholder could have obtained for his corporation gratuitously from the Federal Trade Commission everything for which he now asks the corporation to reimburse his attorneys. Also rejected was the contention that antitrust derivative suits cannot be brought under Section 16 of the Clayton Act.

[Stockholder's Action—Counsel Fees]

CLARK, Chief Judge [In full text]: Plaintiff appeals from the refusal to allow him counsel fees in a shareholders' derivative action involving somewhat novel circumstances. The action was aimed at interlocking directorates in competing corporations in violation of § 8 of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. § 19. Judge Dimock in a reasoned opinion, D. C. S. D. N. Y., 141 F Supp. 453 [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,371], denied recompense to counsel on the ground that the primary remedy was with the Federal Trade Commission, which has jurisdiction under 15 U. S. C. § 21 to issue cease and desist orders in the premises. The judge thought that plaintiff could have obtained for his corporation gratuitously from the Commission everything for which he now asks the corporation to reimburse his attorneys. Since we can see no showing of ultimate benefit to the corporation we think the result reached was correct, although we do not accept the basis assigned below.

Plaintiff is a shareholder in Merritt-Chapman & Scott Corporation and brought this action as a derivative suit on behalf of the corporation primarily to enjoin defendants Louis E. Wolfson and Alexander Rittmaster from serving as directors of this corporation at the same time as they served as directors of Montgomery Ward & Co., Inc. He alleged that the two corporations or subsidiaries were in competition in the manufacture and sale of paint and some household appliances. Other relief in addition to the mandatory injunction was sought, including damages, reimbursement of defendant Merritt and its subsidiaries of expenses or penalties incurred and counsel fees for himself. Judge Herlands denied a defendants' motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, and thereafter Wolfson and Rittmaster resigned as directors of Montgomery Ward. Defendants then sought dismissal on the ground that the case had become moot, while plaintiff without contesting this point sought counsel fees of $25,000 by cross motion. Judge Dimock, in the opinion above cited, ordered the action dismissed, but refused plaintiff counsel fees as stated above. This appeal is not from the dismissal, but only from the refusal of counsel fees.

There is nothing in the record to make clear who is to pay the counsel fees. Obviously no fund has been built up or recovered from which they can be paid. The demand for judgment for counsel fees is directed against all the defendants, thus including Merritt and its two subsidiary corporations, as well as the directors of Merritt or its subsidiaries, and also including at least one Ward director. Presumably plaintiff expects payment eventually at least from the corporation he claims to be benefiting, but the ambiguity inherent in his demand tends to highlight the uncertain nature of the supposed benefits.

[Private and Public Remedy]

There is nothing in the statute which restricts remedy against interlocking directorates to action by the Commission. It seems well known that the Commission has found little occasion, and perhaps little incentive, to take action in the premises. See Kramer, Interlocking Directorships and the Clayton Act After 35 Years, 59 Yale L. J. 1266; 105 U. of Pa. L. Rev. 261, 264, notes 27, 28; 54 Col. L. Rev. 130. Apparently competitors, who could sue under 15 U. S. C. § 15 or § 26, have little motivation to pursue this obviously preventive remedy against antitrust violations[1] until there is more direct prospect of harm and of treble damages than mere interlocking suggests. Actually the two reported cases to date were government injunction actions. United States v. W. T. Grant Co. [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,493], 345 U. S. 629; United States v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., D. C. S. D. N. Y. [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,481], 111 F. Supp. 614. Vicarious prosecution has been quite usual and presumably effective in various areas of public interest, and there seems little doubt but that the spur of counsel fees adds greatly to the likelihood of private law enforcement. As urged in several critical notes on this case, 70 Harv. L. Rev. 369; 66 Yale L. J. 413; 105 U. of Pa. L. Rev. 261; 9 Stan. L. Rev. 387, it seems not in the public interest to require shareholders to await delaying or nonexistent agency action. Enforcement of antitrust policy will be better advanced by complementary action within the grasp of both public and private interests. Such seems to be the view in representative analogous situations. Thus, though the New York Attorney General is under a legal duty to sue to right corporate wrongs, no one has thought that shareholders should therefore be deprived of allowances for counsel. N. Y. General Corp. Law §§ 60, 61, 61-b; Shielcrawt v. Moffett, 294 N. Y. 180, 61 N. E. 2d 435. Similar are cases involving derivative suits pressed while S. E. C. proceedings were not only possible, but pending, e.g., Howard v. Furst, D. C. S. D. N. Y., 140 F. Supp. 507; Horwitz v. Balaban, D. C. S. D. N. Y., 112 F. Supp. 99; Dederick v. North American Co., D. C. S. D. N. Y., 48 F. Supp. 410. See also Goldstein v. Groesbeck, 2 Cir., 142 F. 2d 422, 154 A. L. R. 1285, certiorari denied 323 U. S. 737 (derivative action permitted where S. E. C. had jurisdiction); De Koven v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., D. C. S. D. N. Y., 216 F. 955 (same, where Attorney General could have enjoined merger).

[Stockholders' Suits—Antitrust Laws]

The defendants also urge that the motion for counsel fees be denied under Decorative Stone Co. v. Building Trades Council of Westchester County, 2 Cir., 23 F. 2d 426, 428, certiorari denied 277 U. S. 594, and Milgram v. Loew's Inc., 3 Cir. [1950-1951 Trade Cases

[1] See United States v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., D. C. S. D. N. Y. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,481], 111 F. Supp. 614, 616 (Weinfeld, J.): "* * * what Congress intended by § 8 was to nip in the bud incipient violations of the antitrust laws by removing the opportunity or temptation to such violations through interlocking directorates."

¶ 62,938], 192 F. 2d 579, 587, certiorari denied Loew's Inc. v. Milgram, 343 U. S. 929, both holding that 15 U. S. C. §§ 15, 26, prevent bringing a derivative suit to enforce the antitrust laws "at law" and prevent an award of counsel fees if the suit is brought "in equity," since the provision therefor of § 15 applies only at law. Disallowance of counsel fees means that for all practical purposes there will be virtually no derivative suits brought to enforce the antitrust laws under these sections. See the law review notes supra and the authorities they cite. In Fanchon & Marco, Inc. v. Paramount Pictures, 2 Cir. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,452], 202 F. 2d 731, 734-735, we rejected the idea that antitrust derivative suits could not be brought under 15 U. S. C. § 26; and it would be foolish indeed not to hold that, although the suits can be brought, counsel fees cannot be recovered. This contention stems from ancient learning quite out of place under modern conditions and with the fused civil action of the federal rules.

The defendants' third argument, however, has merit. We agree that the plaintiff has failed to prove sufficient benefit to the corporation to entitle his attorney to reimbursement from the defendants. 15 U. S. C. § 26 allows "injunctive relief * * * when and under the same conditions and principles as injunctive relief against threatened conduct that will cause loss or damage is granted by courts of equity, under the rules governing such proceedings, * * *." The modern equity practice is to allow counsel fees to successful prosecutors of derivative suits although no judgment has been obtained if they show substantial benefit to the corporation through their efforts, e.g., Pergament v. Kaiser-Frazer Corp., 6 Cir., 224 F. 2d 80; Baker v. Seattle-Tacoma Power Co., 61 Wash. 578, 112 P. 647; Greenough v. Coeur D'Alenes I and Co., 52 Idaho 599, 18 P. 2d 288. Nor is it necessary that a cash fund be produced. See cases cited in Hornstein, Legal Therapeutics: The 'Salvage' Factor in Counsel Fee Awards, 69 Harv. L. Rev. 658, 678, 680; Abrams v. Textile Realty Corp., Sup., 97 N. Y. S. 2d 492. But there should be some check on derivative actions lest they be purely strike suits of great nuisance and no affirmative good, and hence it is ruled generally that the benefit to the corporation and the general body of shareholders must be substantial.

In lengthy and detailed affidavits by his counsel, plaintiff attempted to show a variety of important and valuable benefits he had conferred on the corporation. It is obvious that he has included all that can be thought of even remotely in this connection. But the very vigor of assertion highlights their fanciful, contrived, and mutually inconsistent character. Thus he stresses the possibility of penalties and damages being assessed; but while these might have affected the individuals, it seems highly doubtful that they could have been assessed against the corporation.[2] Next plaintiff contends that, even if no action could have been brought successfully against Merritt, he saved the corporation from the expense and publicity of having to defend. Thus plaintiff anomalously counts it as a benefit that he exposed the corporation to litigation expense and notoriety in an effort to erase the risk that others might do the same thing. Finally plaintiff points to the fact that Merritt now has more of Mr. Wolfson's services which it previously shared with Montgomery Ward. Presumably Montgomery Ward's claim to Mr. Wolfson's efforts was as valid as Merritt's, and the district court would not have enjoined Mr. Wolfson to devote himself solely to Merritt; at best plaintiff could have obtained an injunction forcing the erring directors to choose one corporation or the other. Having thus jeopardized Merritt's claim to what plaintiff calls "a man of unusual ability and imagination * * * capable and invaluable," plaintiff can hardly count it a benefit that Mr. Wolfson eventually chose this corporation rather than the other. Indeed, in almost the same breath he claims to have saved the corporation from Wolfson's activities and reputation as an overdaring financier. That he thus cannot himself determine which way the benefit lies and indeed which corporation he is benefiting is convincing demonstration of the purely speculative nature of his claim.

Affirmed.

[2] The corporation was joined as a party defendant in the two cases cited, but the point was not referred to in United States v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., D. C. S. D. N. Y. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,481], 111 F. Supp. 614, and was particularly reserved in United States v. W. T. Grant Co. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,493], 345 U. S. 629, 634, note 8.

Sherman Antitrust and Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Acts

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Criminal Prosecutions—Grand Jury Proceedings—Production of Documents—Return of Copies of Documents After Dismissal of Criminal Actions.—Where the Government made copies of documents which it obtained by a subpoena duces tecum served during a grand jury proceeding in which indictments charging violations of the antitrust laws and the Robinson-Patman Act were returned, the Government will not be compelled to return the copies of the documents where the Government subsequently dismissed the indictments and filed civil suits for injunctions based on the same transactions as those involved in the indictments. The Government had returned the original documents. Under ordinary circumstances, the copies should be returned. However, in the instant case, if the copies were returned, the Government would immediately have the right to secure the same documents by discovery proceedings in the civil actions. The owner of the documents therefore would not be benefited or harmed by the failure of the Government to return the copies of the documents.

[Motion]

ALEXANDER HOLTZOFF, District Judge [In full text]: This is a motion by a defendant in two criminal cases for a return by the Government of copies of certain documents.

[Prior Proceedings]

In these two cases the grand jury returned indictments charging the defendant with violations of the anti-trust laws and the Robinson-Patman Act. During the investigation that led to the indictments, the Government secured the production by the defendant by subpoenas duces tecum of a large number of documents. During the grand jury proceeding the Government for its convenience made copies of some of these documents. Eventually these indictments were dismissed on motion of the Government without a trial, and immediately after the dismissal, the Government filed civil suits for injunctions based on the same transactions as those involved in the indictments. The Government has returned the original documents that the defendant had produced in response to subpoenas duces tecum, but has retained the copies that it had made of some of them. The defendants now move for a return of the copies.

[Return of Copies]

There is no doubt that it was both lawful and proper for the Government in the course of its investigations to make copies for its use in the proceedings of documents which had been lawfully produced by the defendant. The question is, however, whether the proceedings having been terminated, the copies that were lawfully made should be turned over to the defendants.

In the case of United States v. Wallace Co., 336 U. S. 793, 801, the Supreme Court in a somewhat similar situation made the following statement:

"Return of the photostats, like return of the originals, necessarily followed from the dismissal of the indictment."

Under ordinary circumstances in the light of this statement, this Court would order return of the copies. If, however, the copies were returned, the Government would immediately have the right to secure the same documents by discovery proceedings in the civil actions, pursuant to Rule 34 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The Court is unable to perceive that any benefit or advantage would inure to the defendant by requiring this circumlocution. There is no question in this case of any unlawful search and seizure or of the privilege against self incrimination. All that is involved is a matter of practice and procedure.

The Court feels, in accordance with the modern tendency to eliminate technicalities and to simplify procedure, that no legitimate advantage would be obtained and that no disadvantage would be involved if this motion were denied instead of the Government being directed to return the copies and then be permitted to make a motion under Rule 34 for their production, which would undoubtedly delay further proceedings in these cases. The law will not require a party to do a futile thing.

The motion is denied.

In the United States District Court for the Western District of Missouri, Western Division. No. 7089. Dated April 4, 1957.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Pretrial Procedures—Interrogatories.—An interrogatory requesting that motion picture distributors state the total number of feature pictures released during certain periods of time was too general in scope because it was not limited to any geographical area. Also, an interrogatory requesting a defendant to state the total grosses of two theatres during a certain period of time was too remote. The evidence which might be produced as a result of such information would not be admissible or lead to evidence that would be admissible. However, an interrogatory requesting that the distributors state the total film rental received for each feature picture released in a certain area during a specified period of time was proper if limited to one city.

Order

[Interrogatories]

R. M. DUNCAN, Chief Judge [In full text]: Plaintiff has propounded the following three interrogatories to the defendant, to which the defendant objects:

"Interrogatory No. 1.

"That each distributor-defendant states the total number of feature pictures released by each distributor (a) during each year of the damage period, and (b) during each year thereafter to date."

The objection to Interrogatory No. 1 is sustained. The court has heretofore passed upon this question. The interrogatory does not limit the distribution of pictures to any area, but is apparently general in scope, and would include the whole United States.

"Interrogatory No. 2.

"That each distributor-defendant state the total film rental received by it for each feature picture released by such defendant from the exhibition of such feature pictures in the Kansas City Film Exchange Territory from January 1, 1954 to date."

It is my opinion that the plaintiff would be entitled to the information sought, if it were limited to the City of Kansas City. I am not advised as to the extent of the Kansas City Film Exchange Territory, but if this information can be furnished on a purely local basis, it is information that might become important in view of the scope this case is likely to take with respect to damages. If the parties cannot agree upon this matter, it may be further presented to the court.

"Interrogatory No. 3.

"That the Paramount defendant state the total grosses of the Newman Theatre and the Liberty Theatre from July 4, 1931 to September 15, 1932, during the time that both threatres were operated first run by Publix-Dubinsky Brothers Theatres, a subsidiary and affiliate of Paramount."

It seems to me that the information sought in Interrogatory No. 3 is entirely too remote, and that the evidence which might be produced as a result of such information, would not be admissible or lead to evidence that would be admissible, and the objection is therefore sustained.

[Plaintiff—Complaint]

SMITH, District Judge [In full text]: This is a civil action under the antitrust laws, and particularly Section 15 of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. A. 15. The plaintiff, a corporation organized under the laws of Germany, was formerly an enemy alien within the meaning of Section 2(a) of the Trading with the Enemy Act of 1917, 50 U. S. C. A., App. 2(a). The complaint charges that the defendant and others, not named as defendants, are, and have been for more than six years next preceding the commencement of the action, engaged in a conspiracy in restraint of trade. The plaintiff seeks to enjoin the alleged illegal conduct and to enforce its claim for treble damages.

[Right to Maintain Action]

The defendant filed an answer to which it is alleged, as an affirmative defense, that the plaintiff has no right to "institute or maintain" the action. The defense rests solely upon an express limitation in House Joint Resolution No. 289, 65 Stat. 451, approved October 19, 1951, 50 U. S. C. A., App. XX. The defense is raised at this time on the dual motion of the defendant, to wit, a motion for judgment on the pleadings under Rule 12(c) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U. S. C. A., and a motion for summary judgment under Rule 56(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U. S. C. A.

The argument urged by the defendant in support of the motion is the same as that urged in support of the motion in the companion case, Farbenfabriken Bayer, A. G., v. Sterling Drug, Inc., Civil 909-55. This argument was fully discussed in the opinion filed in the companion case and we see no reason to repeat the discussion. We are of the opinion that the argument will not avail the defendant in the instant case.

The cause of action upon which the claim in the instant case is predicated accrued within six years next preceding the commencement of the action. This cause of action was not subject to seizure and vesting prior to January 1, 1947. The Joint Resolution is, therefore, not applicable. It may be argued that the plaintiff has a cause of action based upon the alleged conspiracy in restraint of trade prior to January 1, 1947, but is must be noted that this cause of action, if it existed, is not the basis of the present claim. The claim asserted in the instant case is necessarily limited by the statute of limitations.

The motion for judgment will be denied.

Clayton and Sherman Antitrust Acts

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Jurisdiction of Federal Courts—Removal of Proceeding from State Court—Remand to State Court—Common Law Conspiracy.—Where an action for fraudulent misrepresentation and for common law conspiracy had been removed from a state court to a United States District Court on the ground that the controversy involved a substantial federal question, that is, redress for violations of the Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts, the action was remanded to the state court since there was no federal question involved in the action. The plaintiff's cause of action predicated upon a theory of common law conspiracy in the state court by pleadings which avoided reference to the federal antitrust statutes placed the jurisdiction of the state court beyond question. The state court had jurisdiction of the subject matter of the action. The fact that a violation of common law rights may also be a violation of a federal statute does not deprive a state court of jurisdiction unless Congress conferred exclusive jurisdiction on the federal courts as to all rights and remedies in respect thereto. There is no Congressional intent or expression to such an effect.

Memorandum and Order

[Removal to Federal Court]

R. Jasper Smith, District Judge [In full text]: Plaintiff's motion to remand and defendants' motion to dismiss are before me for ruling. I dealt with this case earlier under similar circumstances, rendering my decision then in Caraway v. Ford Motor Co., et al. [1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,536], 144 F. Supp. 295. That opinion provides background for this question, and reveals in detail the procedural steps leading up to my decision where I dismissed without prejudice that part of plaintiff's complaint based on alleged violations of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act and the Clayton Act, and remanded to the state court the remainder of the complaint which sought redress for fraudulent misrepresentation.

Thereafter, plaintiff filed an amended complaint in the state court, supplementing his count for fraudulent misrepresentation with an additional count for common law conspiracy. Again the action was removed here upon the petition of defendants, on the ground that the controversy involved a substantial federal question, specifically, redress for violations of the Sherman and Clayton Acts.

[Motion To Remand]

Defendants now move to dismiss the complaint. Plaintiff counters with a motion to remand to the state court.

[Issue]

The critical question involved is whether the state court has jurisdiction of the subject matter of this action. Plaintiff argues that his complaint asserts an actionable common law conspiracy. Defendants claim that it purports to allege an action arising under the anti-trust laws of which federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction. I must decide, concerning the alleged conspiracy, whether plaintiff may sue under the state common law in a state court, or whether his exclusive remedy is under the Sherman and Clayton Acts in the federal courts.

[Common Law Rights]

Nothing is found in the federal anti-trust statutes expressly or impliedly providing exclusive jurisdiction in federal courts respecting violations of individual, private rights. The statutes provide only two civil remedies, i. e., injunctive relief against a threatened or continued violation of the Acts, or treble damages in an action at law. These remedies are not available to plaintiff in a state court action because they are cognizable in federal courts exclusively, and the state court has no jurisdiction to give relief thereon. But these provisions relate to remedies. It is unreasonable to maintain that the anti-trust statutes were intended to exclude persons who had common law rights, arising from something also forbidden or declared to be unlawful by the acts, from pursuing their remedies in a proper jurisdiction.

[State Court Jurisdiction]

There is considerable diversity of theory of recovery between a case that is commenced solely for redress of violation of the federal anti-trust laws, and is dependent for its sustention upon the existence of the remedies prescribed in those laws, and a case in which the injured party merely attempts to assert violations of his common law rights, which may also be protected by federal legislation. The fact that a violation of common law rights may also be a violation of a federal statute does not deprive a state court of jurisdiction unless Congress conferred exclusive jurisdiction on the federal courts as to all rights and remedies in respect thereto. I find no Congressional intent or expression to such an effect here.

A person who has been injured in his trade or business by the activities of an unlawful monopoly, combination or restraint is entitled to recover damages in an action at law for the loss suffered, recovery being sustainable both at common law and under the federal anti-trust statutes. Southern States Oil Co. v. Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey et al., 26 F. Supp. 633; Hand v. Kansas City Southern Ry. Co., 55 F. 2d 712; and Guiterman v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 48 F. 2d 851.

Plaintiff's new cause of action predicated upon a theory of common law conspiracy in the state court by pleadings which avoid reference to the federal anti-trust statutes place the jurisdiction of the state court beyond question. Thus, having eliminated any possibility of federal question jurisdiction, and observing the lack of diversity of citizenship between the parties, I must sustain plaintiff's motion and remand this case to the court from whence it was removed, the Circuit Court of Jackson County, at Kansas City.

This ruling also disposes of defendants' motion to dismiss, and necessarily requires the denial of that motion without prejudice. It is so ordered.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Allocation of Selling Time Among Tobacco Warehouses—Legality of Allocation by Board of Trade—Reasonableness of Method of Allocation—Limitation on New Warehouses.—A tobacco board of trade, composed of persons operating on a tobacco market, did not violate the Sherman Act by allocating available selling time among auction tobacco warehouses in a local Georgia market. The available selling time for tobacco was limited; therefore, the total available selling time had to be allocated among the warehouses. That necessity gave rise to a custom by which the function of allocating selling time among local warehouses devolved upon the local board of trade. The court took judicial notice of such a custom in Georgia. Also, the board of trade did not violate the Sherman Act when it changed from the floor space system (allocation based on a warehouse's square foot area) of allocating selling time to the performance system (allocation on the basis of a warehouse's last year's performance) of allocating selling time when a new warehouse, larger in area than any one of the existing warehouses, was constructed in the local market. Under the former system, the new warehouse would have received approximately 36 per cent of the available selling time, while, under the latter system, the new warehouse received approximately 14 per cent of such time, leaving approximately six-sevenths of such selling time for apportionment among the six other warehouses in the local market. Under the performance system, a new warehouse larger than average size would receive the same selling time as the average of the other warehouses. However, no justification for percentage limitations on increases or decreases in selling time during subsequent selling seasons could be found. Such a limitation practically froze the seven warehouses in the prior year's competitive positions and eliminated, in major part, the hope of gain and risk of failure inherent in a true performance system. If evidence shows that the limitation tends to prejudice the public interest, it may constitute an undue and unreasonable restraint of trade.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.468; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2610.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Parties Defendant—Survival of Action Against Personal Representatives of Deceased Defendant—Limitation on Damages Recoverable.—A treble damage action survived against the personal representatives of the estate of a defendant who had died after the commencement of the action and after process had been served on him. Combinations in restraint of trade or tending to create or maintain a monopoly give rise to causes of action at common law; however, public injury alone justifies the threefold increase in damages. The policy of the federal statute requires the survival of the cause of action to the extent that actual damages may be recovered. Trebling of damages is in the nature of a penalty for a public wrong. The personal representatives should not be liable for more than actual damages. The same result would be reached under the applicable state law.

[Trial Court Ruling]

RIVES, Circuit Judge [In full text]: In an action for treble damages for alleged violations of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act,[1] the district court sustained the motions of the defendants to dismiss and for judgment on the pleadings, and this appeal ensued.

[Allocation of Selling Time]

The basic facts as established by the pleadings, admissions and affidavits are sub-

[1] 15 U. S. C. A. §§ 1, et seq. In pertinent part §§ 1, 2, and 15 of said Act provide as follows:

"§ 1. Trusts, etc., in restraint of trade illegal; exception of resale price agreements; penalty

"Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal * * *. Every person who shall make any contract or engage in any combination or conspiracy declared by sections 1-7 of this title to be illegal shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court."

"§ 2. Monopolizing trade a misdemeanor; penalty

"Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court."

"§ 15. Suits by persons injured; amount of recovery

"Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the anti-trust laws may sue therefor

stantially without dispute. We shall therefore heed Judge Sibley's wise admonition,[2] and go directly to the facts.

Beyond the control of the defendants, according to the present record, are many of the facts and circumstances from which it is claimed that the necessity arose for the allocation of selling time among tobacco warehouses in each of the local markets in the flue-cured area.[3]

The internal allocation of selling time among the warehouses on any local market is done by the tobacco board of trade of the particular city where the market is located. The defendants, as majority voting members of The Douglas Board of Trade, are responsible for the allocations of selling time among the warehouses on the Douglas, Georgia, tobacco market, and those allocations give rise to the present action.

[Douglas Market]

The Douglas market has been in continuous existence since 1918. At the present time it includes seven tobacco warehouses, one of which is operated and controlled by the plaintiffs, and six by various parties named as defendants. Tobacco is brought in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages, by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee."

[2] "Under the Rules of Civil Procedure a case consists not in the pleadings, but the evidence, for which the pleadings furnish the basis. Cases are generally to be tried on the proofs rather than the pleadings." De Loach v. Crowley's, Inc., 5th Cir., 128 F. 2d 378, 380.

[3] Clearly and succinctly stated in the affidavit of Fred S. Royster, President of the Bright Belt Warehouse Association, Inc.:

"It is necessary to allocate selling time among warehouses on each local market for the following reasons:

"Tobacco is a perishable commodity. It must be heat treated (referred to in the trade as redrying) within a short period of time after purchase and removal from the warehouse floors. The aggregate facilities of the tobacco buying companies and dealers for the redrying of producers' tobacco in the flue-cured area have a maximum capacity of about 120,000,000 pounds weekly. The limit of this capacity is such that the volume of tobacco sold at auction in any one week must be regulated in order to prevent tobacco from deteriorating before it can be processed.

"Regulation of the flow of tobacco from producer to manufacturer on an over-all basis within the flue-cured area is accomplished in the following manner:

"The flue-cured area is divided into 'belts.' In each belt there is in existence a Tobacco Warehouse Association operating in that belt, which is composed of all or most of the various warehouses. Membership by the individual warehouses is voluntary. Each of the five belt associations elect six of their members to serve on the Board of Governors of an organization known as the Bright Belt Warehouse Association. The Board of Governors of the Bright Belt Warehouse Association represent the vast majority of the entire tobacco warehouse industry in the flue-cured area comprising Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida and, through a 'sales committee', performs the following functions:

"(1) The Board of Governors sets the date for the opening of the tobacco auction markets in each of the five belts, beginning with the extreme southern belt and moving northward through the five belts. The markets in the Georgia-Florida belt open around July 15 to July 25 and operate for approximately four or five weeks. The South Carolina and Border Belt opens approximately one week to two weeks after the Georgia-Florida Belt and remains open approximately seven weeks. The Eastern North Carolina Belt opens approximately two weeks after the opening of the South Carolina Border Belt. The Middle Belt opens one or two weeks after opening of the Eastern North Carolina Belt. The old Belt follows, opening about two weeks after the Middle Belt.

"(2) The Sales Committee determines the number of hours per day during which all tobacco markets in each belt may operate. The maximum hours of operation for any market are 5½ hours since this is the maximum working day for United States Department of Agriculture Graders and is the generally accepted work day throughout the industry. In the event the sales committee finds it necessary to reduce sales hours, the markets are given 48 hours' notice.

"The sales committee does not distinguish between markets and allot more hours for sale to one market within the same belt than to another—all are allotted the same.

"(3) The Board of Governors determines the maximum number of baskets of tobacco which may be auctioned per hour per set of buyers. The maximum rate of speed is 400 piles per hour, or about 9 seconds per basket. This is the reasonable maximum speed for conduct of an auction sale and it is generally accepted in the industry as the best speed.

"The effect of the foregoing regulations promulgated by the Bright Belt Warehouse Association is that this association determines and controls the maximum amount of tobacco which may be sold in one day by each market. For example, one market has five sets of buyers. Since each set of buyers, under the regulations, can purchase a maximum of 400 baskets per hour, if the sales day is set at five hours, this means that one set of buyers in that market can purchase five times 400 baskets, or 2,000 baskets. Thus five sets of buyers can purchase five times 2,000, or 10,000 baskets per day. Since the sales committee of the Bright Belt Warehouse Association knows the average weight per basket of tobacco, it can effectively by the farmer-growers to the warehouses where it is sold at auction by the basket or pile to buyers assigned to the market by the buying companies (see footnote 3, supra). Those companies have assigned to the Douglas market two sets of buyers, from which it follows that only two auction sales can be conducted simultaneously, and that the maximum amount of tobacco that can be sold on the Douglas market in any one day of the four or five weeks of the selling season is 4400 baskets. The opportunities of each of the seven tobacco warehouses to sell any part of this 4400 baskets is controlled by the local Board of Trade, which assigns to each of the warehouses a certain portion of each selling day during which sales can be held at that warehouse. The buyers attend only those sales held pursuant to the schedule of selling time issued by the Board. Eligible for membership in the Board of Trade are the tobacco warehousemen, the buyers, and all persons operating on the tobacco market. The defendants comprise the majority of the participating or voting membership of The Douglas Board of Trade and, hence, control and direct the policies and practices of the Board.

For many years prior to the opening of the 1954 tobacco market season, it was the custom and practice of the Douglas Board of Trade to allocate selling time to each of the warehouses on the basis of the "Unit Floor-Space System." Each warehouse was credited with one unit for each 55,000 square feet of floor space. Five of the warehouses owned by various defendants were one-unit warehouses, and the sixth was a two-unit warehouse. Thus, prior to the construction of plaintiffs' warehouse, there were [was] a total of seven units, the two-unit warehouse operated and controlled by one set of defendants, two of the one-unit warehouses by another set of defendants, and each of the three other one-unit warehouses by a separate set of defendants. There being a total of seven units of floor space in the six warehouses, the two-unit warehouse was allotted two-sevenths of the selling time, and each of the other warehouses one-seventh thereof. In May of 1954 the plaintiffs commenced the construction of a four-unit or 220,000 square foot warehouse in Douglas. If the "Unit Floor-Space System" of allocation had remained in effect, the plaintiffs, upon completion of their warehouse in time for the opening of the 1954 season control the total tonnage moving through the markets by simply controlling the rate of sale and the hours of sale per day.

"In the final analysis the precise amount of tobacco which can be sold on any market in any one day is controlled by the number of sets of buyers on the market. The number of sets of buyers assigned to a market is determined exclusively by the buying companies and the Bright Belt Warehouse Association has nothing to do with the assignment of buyers to a market. Thus, if the buying companies choose to send another set of buyers to a particular market, that market would automatically be able to auction more tobacco per day.

"As hereinbefore stated, the maximum combined redrying capacity of the buying companies is approximately 120,000,000 pounds weekly. Thus, the reason that sales on the market must be geared to the overall redrying capacity is because there are redrying facilities on some markets and not on others and there is a cross movement of tobacco between markets for processing. In other words, for example, the American Tobacco Company may purchase tobacco on a particular market and ship it to some other locality for redrying. Of course, the Bright Belt Warehouse Association cannot tell a given buyer where to take his green tobacco for redrying nor on what markets to buy his tobacco.

"The sales committee of the Bright Belt Warehouse Association obtains a daily report from the United States Department of Agriculture of the total pounds sold on all markets on the preceding day and in this way the sales committee does keep a check on tonnage flow of tobacco to see that it does not exceed maximum processing capacity. Also, a particular buying company may notify the sales committee that their purchases have been so heavy that their redrying facilities cannot handle the tobacco and may request a curtailment of sales hours for a period of time. The sales committee, of course, gives serious consideration to such a request because it is to the interest of the farmers and the auction market system as a whole that buyers of a particular company not be withdrawn from the market because of an inability of that company to process its purchase. When in the considered judgment of the sales committee the public interest requires a temporary curtailment of the volume of tobacco flowing through the warehouses to the processing plants because of inability of the plants to redry the tobacco, it takes remedial action by either reducing sales hours or suspension of all sales until processing can catch up.

"The authority of the Bright Belt Warehouse Association derives from the consent of its membership and the farmers and industry generally. There is no statutory authority.

"The Bright Belt Warehouse Association takes no action with respect to the internal allocations of selling time among warehouses on any market."

on July 15, 1954, would have been entitled to considerably more than one-third of the total selling time available for the Douglas market.

[Plaintiffs' Warehouse]

As soon as the defendants learned of the plaintiffs' intention to construct a warehouse and throughout the period of construction differences arose, the defendants accusing the plaintiffs of trying to force them to buy the new warehouse rather than let the plaintiffs "hog" the market, and the plaintiffs accusing the defendants of trying to prevent them from engaging in the tobacco auction business on the Douglas market. The plaintiffs' warehouse, commonly known as the Big Independent 1, 2, 3, and 4, was completed by the end of June, 1954, at a cost of $200,000.00.

[New Method of Allocation]

On July 10, 1954, about ten days after the completion of plaintiffs' warehouse and five days before the 1954 season opened, The Douglas Board of Trade adopted new by-laws to provide for the allocation of selling time as follows:

"ARTICLE III.

"Warehousemen.

"Section 1. Any warehouse desiring membership in the Douglas Tobacco Board of Trade, Inc., and desiring to sell tobacco as a member of said association shall be built within the city limits of Douglas, Georgia, or within a reasonable distance from said city limits and within Coffee County, Georgia. A tobacco warehouse shall be a building suitable for selling tobacco, with proper lighting, scales, trucks and other necessary fixtures and shall be easily accessible, both to farmers and to buyers.

"Section 2. It is further provided that a warehouse under this provision is any warehouse building under one continuous roof (not connected with any other roof, and over one continuous floor (not connected with any other floor), and provided further that no single warehouse building shall be divided for the purpose of being counted as two or more warehouses. After a warehouse is originally built, no alterations or changes can be made to such warehouse in order to make more than one original house. Any concern operating more than one warehouse may transfer sales from one warehouse to another as they see fit."

"ARTICLE IV.

"Section 1. Until a change of conditions shall warrant a change in these By-Laws, and until there is such a change in these By-Laws, limited selling time available for the several auction warehouses on the Douglas Tobacco Market shall be divided among and allocated to the several warehouses doing business on the Douglas market at Douglas, Georgia, in accordance with the following rules, to-wit:

"A. If all of the warehouses on said market for any given year shall agree unanimously in writing upon the division of selling time among these warehouses then such unanimous agreement shall be recognized by the Douglas Tobacco Board of Trade and the selling time shall be allocated among the said warehouses in accordance with said unanimous agreement, which shall be signed by all warehousemen and the original filed with the secretary of the association and available to all interested parties.

"B. Inasmuch as 1954 season will be the first season after the formation of the Douglas Tobacco Board of Trade, Inc.,[4] the selling time for 1954 shall be allocated to each warehouseman in such proportion as the gross sales of tobacco in such warehouse were to the total gross sales on the Douglas, Georgia, tobacco market for the two years preceding the allocation provided, however, that after the 1954 season in arriving at gross sales no amount of tobacco sold in resale in excess of 10% of the total sales of gross sales of any warehouse will be considered. That is to say, after the 1954 season the allocation shall be in proportion to sales by each warehouseman to total sales, based on producers sales, plus 10% of resales of tobacco, provided further "That the said selling time in each warehouse shall not vary more than 3½% from the allocated selling time for the preceding season.

"Provided further, however, that in the event of a new warehouse and/or a warehouse which did not operate on the Douglas, Georgia, tobacco market during the preceding season, claiming selling time, then the selling time allotted to such new warehouse or warehouse not operating the preceding season claiming selling time, shall be allotted on an average and in proportion with the amount of selling time available to all warehouses operating as a part of Douglas, Georgia, tobacco market; provided, further, if such new warehouse and/or warehouse which did not operate the preceding season is smaller in size than the average of all warehouses comprising the Douglas, Georgia, tobacco market, then the selling time shall be allotted according to the proportion of its size in relation to all other warehouses. Provided further that if said new warehouse or warehouses which did not operate the preceding season is larger in size than the average of all warehouses operating on the Douglas, Georgia, tobacco market, such warehouses or warehouse shall not receive any consideration in selling time for the size in excess of the average of all warehouses and shall in no event be allocated more than its equal pro-rata share of selling time as it is determined by the number of warehouses operating as herein before set forth.

"C. The total remaining selling time allotted to the market after selling time has been allotted to a new warehouse and/or a warehouse which did not operate on the market during the preceding season shall be allotted to the remaining houses which did operate the preceding season in accordance with the first paragraph of subsection B above."

The parties are agreed that under the "Unit Floor-Space System" theretofore in effect the plaintiffs would have received approximately 36.36 per cent of the available selling time or an opportunity to sell 1600 baskets of tobacco a day during the 1954 market season, while, under the "Modified Experience Basis" adopted by the new by-laws, they were actually allocated one-seventh, 14.28 per cent, of the available selling time, limiting them to the sale of 628 baskets of tobacco a day during the 1954 season. The farmer-growers brought to the plaintiff's warehouse during the 1954 season more tobacco than could be sold within the allotted selling time.

The 1955 season opened on July 21, 1955, with the same maximum limitation on the total amount of tobacco that could be sold on the market in any one day—4400 baskets a day. The plaintiffs' allocation of selling time was increased from 14.28 to 14.77 per cent of the available selling time, or from a maximum of 628 to 650 baskets of tobacco a day. If the 3½ per cent (3½% of 14.28%) limitation had not been applied and the plaintiffs had been allocated selling time on the basis of their performance during the 1954 season, it is estimated that they would have received an allocation of selling time sufficient to sell 924 instead of 650 baskets of tobacco a day during the 1955 season.

[Basic Question]

The basic question for decision is whether, under the foregoing facts, the defendants were entitled to a judgment as a matter of law.

[Necessity of Allocating Selling Time]

Considering first the earlier year, 1954, the defendants insist that some form of allocation of selling time among local tobacco warehouses was necessary and that the change from the "Unit Floor-Space System" to the "Modified Experience Basis" was reasonable.

All of the responsible parties are not before the court, and the issues are not so framed as to call for a review of the necessity for some form of allocation of selling time. That necessity arises for the reason set forth in the affidavit of Fred S. Royster (footnote 3, supra), for none of which is there any claim that the defendants are responsible. The tobacco buying companies and dealers can preserve and redry only so many pounds of tobacco per week. There is thus a natural limit to the amount of tobacco they can purchase. They choose to make such purchases by open competitive bidding at tobacco auction markets. Their right to make that choice has not been questioned. In all probability the auction method provides each farmer-grower with more competition for the purchase of his tobacco than he would otherwise have. The buying companies assign to each market the number of sets of buyers they see fit, and again no one has questioned their right so to do. Certainly none of the defendants can require them to assign a greater number of buyers. Automatically the number of sets of buyers determines the amount of tobacco which can be sold on any market in any one day. When the buying companies and the Bright Belt Warehouse Association have acted, the total selling time of each local market and the total amount of tobacco which can be sold on such market have become fixed. The tobacco auction market system is thus an organized and restricted rather than an uncontrolled and completely free arrangement. This action is not a frontal attack upon that entire system, but is restricted to one relatively small segment, namely, the internal allocations of selling time on the Douglas market.

Auction tobacco warehouses do much more for the farmer than simply storing and preserving his highly perishable tobacco. One of their chief functions is to obtain the best possible price for his tobacco. At an auction sale the "man in the hole" represents the warehouse, keeps the bidding lively so as to get the highest price possible, and in so doing often has a pile of tobacco "knocked down" or sold to the warehouse itself. A farmer dissatisfied with the last bid has the privilege of rejecting all bids.

With two sets of buyers assigned to the Douglas market, and, hence, only two auction sales being conducted simultaneously, with a maximum working day of 5½ hours, and the market operating for only four or five weeks, and with the possibility of selling only 400 piles of tobacco per hour, it becomes obvious that for the tobacco auction market system to be workable at all, the limited total available selling time must be allocated among the warehouses upon some basis. That necessity has given rise to a custom adhered to generally throughout the flue-cured area by the buyers and by the warehouses alike by which the function of allocating selling time among the local warehouses devolves upon the local board of trade. In North Carolina that custom has been carried forward into a statute formally vesting such authority in the Tobacco Boards of Trade of the several towns and cities. North Carolina Public Laws, 1933, Chapter 268. Georgia has no similar statute granting specific authority to boards of trade. They have, however, exercised such authority for the past thirty-five years with the consent of all interested parties, so that the custom or usage has become the subject of judicial notice. See 20 Am. Jur., Evidence, Secs. 109 and 110.

[Systems Used]

Various local boards of trade have developed successively different systems of apportioning selling time among warehouses. Examples of such systems are "wall-to-wall," or the sale of all available tobacco in each warehouse before proceeding to the next; the "unit" system, under which each warehouse is counted as one unit; "floor space," or the allocation of the total available selling time among the warehouses in proportion to their square foot area; and the "performance" system, under which selling time is allocated to each warehouse on the basis of its individual last year's performance.

Up to the time of plaintiffs' advent upon the Douglas market, the operators of the six other warehouses had been able to reach unanimous agreement upon the amount of selling time to be allotted to each warehouse. Plaintiffs' appearance on the scene resulted in the adoption by the Board of Trade of the new by-law with which we are here concerned, and the effect of which, broadly speaking, was to switch from the "floor space" system to the "performance" system.

[Test of Legality]

This case does not involve any plan of market price fixing either directly or indirectly. There is, therefore, no conclusive presumption of illegality.[5] The guiding principle in this case is that stated in Chicago Board of Trade v. United States, 246 U. S. 231, 238:

> "The true test of legality is whether the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps thereby promotes competition or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition. To determine that question the court must ordinarily consider the facts peculiar to the business to which the restraint is applied; its condition before and after the restraint was imposed; the nature of the restraint and its effect, actual or probable. The history of the restraint, the evil believed to exist, the reason for adopting the particular remedy, the purpose or end sought to be attained, are all relevant facts. This is not because a good intention will save an otherwise objectionable regulation or the reverse; but because knowledge of intent may help the court to interpret facts and to predict consequences."

See, also, United States v. Tarpon Springs Sponge Exchange, 5th Cir. [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,236], 142 F. 2d 125, 128.

The Sherman Act does not erect any standards for the positive conduct of trade and commerce, it is prohibitory legislation. Men may conduct their businesses as they see fit so long as they do not tend to restrain trade or commerce. As recently expressed by the Supreme Court:

"That there is a national policy favoring competition cannot be maintained today without careful qualification. It is only in a blunt, undiscriminating sense that we speak of competition as an ultimate good. Certainly, even in those areas of economic activity where the play of private forces has been subjected only to the negative prohibitions of the Sherman Law, this Court has not held that competition is an absolute. See Chicago Board of Trade v. United States, 246 U. S. 231; cf. Mason, Monopoly in Law and Economics, 47 Yale L. J. 34.

"Prohibitory legislation like the Sherman Law, defining the area within which 'competition' may have full play, of course loses its effectiveness as the practical limitations increase; as such considerations severely limit the number of separate enterprises that can efficiently, or conveniently, exist, the need for careful qualification of the scope of competition becomes manifest. Surely it cannot be said in these situations that competition is of itself a national policy. To do so would disregard not only those areas of economic activity so long committed to Government monopoly as no longer to be thought open to competition, such as the post office, cf., e. g., 17 Stat. 292 (criminal offense to establish unauthorized post office; provision since superseded), and those areas, loosely spoken as of natural monopolies or—more broadly—public utilities, in which active regulation has been found necessary to compensate for the inability of competition to provide adequate regulation. It would most strikingly disregard areas where policy has shifted from one of prohibiting restraints on competition to one of providing relief from the rigors of competition, as has been true of railroads. Compare, e. g., United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assn., 166 U. S. 290, and United States v. Joint Traffic Assn., 171 U. S. 505, with the Transportation Act of 1920, 41 Stat. 456, 480; Consolidation of Railroads, 63 I. C. C. 455." Federal Communications Commission v. RCA Communications, Inc., 346 U. S. 86, 91, 92.

[Legality of Allocation]

We are led to the conclusion that the Douglas Tobacco Board of Trade did not violate the Sherman Act simply by exercising the regulatory powers, necessarily devolving upon it, of allocating selling time among the warehouses on the local market. As said by Mr. Justice Frankfurter concurring in Associated Press v. United States [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,384], 326 U. S. 1, 27:

"* * * ever since the Sherman Law was saved from stifling literalness by 'the rule of reason,' Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1; United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106; it is not sufficient to find a restraint. The decisive question is whether it is an unreasonable restraint. This depends, in essence, on the significance of the restraint in a relation to a particular industry. Compare Chicago Board of Trade v. United States, 246 U. S. 231, 238."

[Legality of Method]

So here, the real issues revolve about the legality and reasonableness of the methods of allocating selling time. The legality of the "performance" method of allocating selling time has been sustained by the North Carolina Supreme Court and by the Federal Trade Commission.[6]

[FTC and Court Rulings]

The opinion of the hearing examiner In the Matter of Wilson Tobacco Board of Trade, F. T. C. Docket No. 6262, contains a full and clear comparison of the various methods of allocating sales time from which he concludes that the performance system is best in that it transfers the area of competition from "butting dollar against dollar" in the construction of unneeded warehouse space to competition in the rendering of more and better service to the farmer.

The hearing examiner said:

"This system compels more intensive competition where it should be—on service, instead of bankroll—and puts the control of time share on the producer rather than on the financially powerful warehouse-

Docket No. 6262: Initial Decision of Hearing Examiner In the Matter of Asheville Tobacco Board of Trade, Inc., F. T. C. Docket No. 6490. See, also, *Cooperative Warehouse v. man. However, it brings problems with it also, such as equitable provision of time for a new entrant, who has no previous experience of 'performance to serve as a base * * *.'" F. T. C. Docket No. 6262 at p. 22.[7]

The Commission, in its decision of August 23, 1956, approved that finding of the Hearing Examiner, saying in part:

"Weighing and judging the reasonableness of the performance system in the light of its intent and effect, and in the framework of realities of the market place, as established on the record here, there remains no alternative but for us to conclude on the whole record that the initial decision is correct in upholding the reasonableness of the performance system." F. T. C. Docket No. 6262, p. 5.

As noted by the Hearing Examiner, however, a difficult problem is presented under the performance system to provide for a new entrant with no performance experience. In that case, the Board's regulation of December 5, 1952,

"provided that any newcomer on the Wilson market should be allotted for his ensuing first year of operation, the same amount of selling time as the last previous entrant (Liberty) had for that year, provided the new entrant built as large a warehouse as Liberty's; if not, then time is cut down in proportion to the size built." F. T. C. No. 6262, p. 31.

The Hearing Examiner concluded that that regulation was an unreasonable restraint of trade, saying:

"It is, in the hearing examiner's opinion, inherently unreasonable and unfair to fix a man's opportunity to engage in competition on the basis of the ability and performance of only one of his competitors. A broader base, such as an average of all, for one year, or over a period, would be more reasonable and, of course, some account should be taken of the entrant's initial investment, in relation to that of others, already operating." F. T. C. Docket No. 6262, p. 32.

That part of the initial decision was not appealed, though the Commission in a footnote to its decision commented:

"The resolution in question established an allotment of selling time for newcomers on the Wilson market, the same amount as the last previous entrant (Liberty) had for that year provided the new entrant built a warehouse equally as large as Liberty with proportionate reduction of time if smaller. The hearing examiner found it to be unreasonable and unfair to fix opportunity to compete on the basis of the ability and performance of only one competitor, suggesting some other broader basis such as an average of all competitors on the market. Respondents have not appealed from that finding." F. T. C. Docket 6262, at p. 3.

The case of Day v. Asheville Tobacco Board of Trade [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,057], 242 N. C. 136, 87 S. E. 2d 18, involved a by-law strikingly similar to the by-law adopted by the Douglas Board of Trade. The selling time was allotted on the basis of the sales of the warehouses the previous year, with a provision that a new warehouse larger than average size would receive the same selling time as the average of the other warehouses. The Court said:

"And the rule by which the allotment was made to plaintiff by the Board appears fair and equitable. Indeed, it does not appear that there is any restraint of trade in the rule." 87 S. E. 2d at p. 24.

[Action of Board of Trade]

The allocation of selling time among the local warehouses, as has been shown, was a necessity. So long as they were in unanimous agreement there was no objection to the "Unit Floor-Space System." With the advent of a new and powerful competitor, no agency existed for the necessary allocation of time except the Douglas Board of Trade. The time within which it had to take action was brief. Construction of the new warehouse began in May. Various, albeit heated, discussions ensued.

[7] "In summary, then, the Hearing Examiner is of the opinion and therefore finds:

"1. That under the exigencies and unchangeable market conditions, generally, and at Wilson, North Carolina specifically, the performance system of allocating sales time is per se a reasonable regulation and therefore not illegal because,

"(a) it promotes rather than hinders competition among warehousemen by putting a premium on additional sales effort—solicitation, advertising, etc. and increases the area of that competition,

"(b) puts the competitive emphasis solely on the warehouseman's economic function—service,

"(c) penalizes laziness and other inefficiency in that service: * * *." F. T. C. Docket No. 6262, at p. 33.

The warehouse was completed the last of June, and the new by-law adopted the 10th of July five days before the opening of the 1954 season. The plaintiffs themselves, by the timing of their project, bear the primary responsibility for the extremely brief period of time within which action by the Board of Trade became necessary.

The most directly pertinent decisions then available by which the Board of Trade might chart its course were those which we have discussed. Under those decisions, we think that it was not unreasonable for the Board of Trade to conclude that the allotment to the newcomer of more than one-third of the total available selling time was inequitable, and instead to allot to it one-seventh of such time, leaving six-sevenths thereof for apportionment among the six other warehouses in accordance with their performances during the preceding year.[8]

Some doubt is cast upon that conclusion by the Initial Decision of the Hearing Examiner of March 29, 1957. In the matter of Asheville Tobacco Board of Trade, Inc., F. T. C. Docket No. 6490, in which he concluded that a similar new warehouse provision was in restraint of trade, saying:

> "* * * it is basically unfair and arbitrary to limit the competitive opportunity of a new entrant in any market to the average competitive ability of all his established competitors. The very idea of such arbitrary limitation of opportunity is alien to the whole concept of the free-enterprise system." F. T. C. Docket 6490, p. 19.

[No Restraint of Trade]

In that decision, the Hearing Examiner declined to follow the precedent of Day v. Asheville Tobacco Board of Trade, [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,057], 242 N. C. 136, 87 S. E. 2d 18, and erroneously stated that the Federal Trade Commission had approved the Hearing Examiner's finding that the regulation allocating selling time to new entrants adopted by the Wilson Tobacco Board of Trade was an unreasonable restraint of trade, when, as we have noted, there was no appeal from that part of the Initial Decision in F. T. C. Docket No. 6262. The Hearing Examiner in the Asheville case, supra, made no suggestion as to how the problem may be solved under the performance system to provide for a new entrant with no performance experience. Without some such solution, the merits of the performance system are largely nullified. We think the solution reached by the Douglas Board of Trade was substantially in accord with that approved by the North Carolina Supreme Court in Day v. Asheville Tobacco Board of Trade, supra, and with that suggested by the Hearing Examiner in the Wilson case, supra, and that it was not an unreasonable restraint of trade. Thus far, that is as to the year 1954, we are in agreement with the district court.

As to the year 1955, however, the case for the plaintiffs is stronger. We can see no justification for the limitation on increases and decreases in selling time to 3½ per cent, meaning, as construed and applied, not 3½ per cent of the total available selling time but 3½ per cent of the selling time allotted to the particular warehouse. Thus plaintiffs' 1954 allocation of 14.28 per cent was increased by less than one-half per cent (3½% of 14.28%) to 14.77 per cent. Whether a like limitation appearing in the by-law involved in Day v. Asheville Tobacco Board of Trade, supra, was construed and applied in the same manner we cannot know, for the opinion does not discuss this 3½ per cent limitation. No such limitation was involved In the Matter of Wilson Tobacco Board of Trade, F. T. C. Docket No. 6262, but a similar limitation was held to be in restraint of trade in the Initial Decision In the Matter of Asheville Tobacco Board of Trade, F. T. C. Docket No. 6490, the Hearing Examiner stating:

> "Respondents adopted the gain-or-loss proviso, by which they assured themselves, not only that the established warehouses could not lose more than 3½% of their selling time in any one season by reason of business vicissitudes encountered during the preceding year, but that neither the new entrant nor any of the established warehouses could gain more than that amount in any one season. Again in the Wilson case, supra, the Hearing Examiner approved the performance system because he found that it possessed 'three requisites of competition: opportunities for competitors to grow; opportunities for competitors to appeal for patronage by improving or changing services; no restraint upon the farmer's freedom of election to patronize the competitor of his choice'. The gain-or-loss proviso obviously violates all these requisites of fair competition. In conjunction with the new-warehouse proviso, this limitation would have compelled the new entrant to wait between three and four years, under optimum conditions, before receiving the just porportion of the available selling time which, in a freely competitive system, would have been accorded to him promptly upon his entry into the market. This seems too heavy a competitive handicap for any business to be required to carry." F. T. C. Docket No. 6490, p. 19.

[8] There was already a surplus of warehouse floor space on the Douglas market and we think that the newcomer was entitled to no special consideration because of the unusual size of his warehouse.

The 3½ per cent limitation, we think, practically froze the seven warehouses in their 1954 competitive positions, eliminated in major part the hope of gain and the risk of failure inherent in a true performance system, and, if further evidence which may be taken upon remand shows that such limitation tends to prejudice the public interest,[9] it may constitute an undue and unreasonable restraint of trade and commerce.

The question remains as to whether the action survived against the personal representatives of the estate of one of the defendants, R. E. Holcomb, who died on October 26, 1955, after the commencement of the action and after process had been served on him. The district court, while considering that the personal representatives had become parties to the cause, denied their motion and plea in abatement "in view of the order of this Court dismissing said cause as to all defendants."

Combinations in restraint of trade or tending to create or maintain a monopoly gave rise to causes of action at common law.[10] As we noted in Kinnear-Weed Corp. v. Humble Oil & Refining Co. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,822], 214 F. 2d 891, 893, however, public injury alone justifies the threefold increase in damages.

The policy of the federal statute, we think, requires the survival of the cause of action to the extent that actual damages may be recovered.[11] Trebling of the damages seems to us to be in the nature of a penalty for the public wrong, and we do not think that the personal representatives would be liable for more than actual damages.[12] A different result would not be required even if the question were determined by the law of the State of Georgia.[13]

[Reversed]

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

[Actions Against Defendants]

SIDNEY SUGARMAN, District Judge [In full text]: On April 6, 1955 plaintiff commenced suit against the defendants in this court, charging violations of the antitrust laws in the New York area. Contemporaneously therewith the plaintiff commenced another suit in the District Court for the District of New Jersey, charging other defendants with similar violations in the New Jersey area. At about the same time a criminal indictment was returned by the Grand Jury for the Southern District of New York against the defendants in the New York civil suit and a criminal information was filed in the District of New Jersey against the defendants in the New Jersey civil suit.

[Single Conspiracy]

In the fall of 1956, in preparation for trial of the criminal information in New Jersey, it became evident to the government that instead of two separate conspiracies between more or less interlocking defendants there was but a single conspiracy encompassing the defendants in New York and New Jersey.

[New Indictment]

In January of 1957, on that new evidence, the Grand Jury for the Southern District of New York returned a superseding indictment charging the one overall conspiracy in the two states, naming as defendants the New York and New Jersey defendants previously severally named in the two prior proceedings.

[Amended Complaint]

The plaintiff now moves pursuant to F. R. Civ. P. 15(a) and 21 and 15 U. S. C. A. § 5 for leave to file an amended complaint in the pending New York civil action and to add parties thereto.

The conservation of money, time, effort and manpower that will inure to both litigants and the court militates in favor of the exercise of the court's discretion that the motion be granted. The measure of prejudice or hardship necessary to preclude the exercise of such discretion is lacking herein.

Accordingly, the motion is granted and the defendants are directed to serve their answers to the amended complaint, leave for the filing of which is hereby granted, within 20 days after the entry of an order herein. Settle order.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Exclusive Dealing—Exclusive Sales Right in Specified Territory—Legality.—An alleged contract giving a plaintiff the exclusive right to sell the defendant's product in a specified territory was not unlawful under Section 3 of the Clayton Act, since the alleged contract did not contain any provision that the plaintiff may not use or deal in the commodities of any competitor. Cases involving exclusive dealing arrangements were not applicable, since the contract did not involve a condition that the plaintiff deal only in the defendant's product. Therefore, it was not necessary to determine whether or not the contract did tend to create a monopoly.

See Exclusive Dealing, Vol. 1, ¶ 4009.100.

For the plaintiff: Windolph, Burkholder & Hartman, Lancaster, Pa.

For the defendant: Theodore L. Brubaker, Lancaster, Pa.

[Suit on Oral Contract]

JOHNSTONE, Judge [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: The plaintiff averred in its complaint in assumpsit that the plaintiff and defendant entered into an oral agreement on July 20, 1953, and that the oral agreement was confirmed by an exchange of letters between the parties in December, 1953. The complaint also averred that on September 8, 1955, the agreement was orally modified by the parties and the modification was confirmed by letter dated October 7, 1955. It is further averred in the complaint that the oral contract was further modified by the parties on August 18, 1955, but there is no averment that this modification was confirmed in writing. The defendant has filed preliminary objections to the plaintiff's complaint. * * *.

[Legality Under Clayton Act]

The third objection raised by the defendant is that the contract averred in the plaintiff's complaint is unlawful since it is a contract in restraint of trade and violates the Clayton Act. The particular section of the act complained of is found in 15 U. S. C. A. § 14. This section deals only with the lease, sale or contract for sale of goods, wares, merchandise and other products and embraces no other persons than lessees and purchasers: Curtis Publishing Company v. Federal Trade Commission, 260 U. S., 568. The act specifically forbids the sale or lease of commodities on the condition that the lessee or purchaser shall not use or deal in the commodities of a competitor. The contract averred in the plaintiff's complaint provides for the exclusion [exclusive] sale by the plaintiff of the defendant's product in a specified territory but does not contain any provision that the plaintiff may not use or deal in the commodities of any competitor. It is deemed unnecessary to determine whether the agreement between the parties did tend to create a monopoly since the one thing prohibited by the act is absent from the contract between the parties. The cases cited in the defendant's brief relating to

"exclusive dealing arrangements" have no bearing on the contract in question since it involves no condition that the plaintiff deal only in the defendant's product: Judson L. Thomson Mfg. Co. v. Federal Trade Commission [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,399], 150 F. 2d 952, 326 U. S. 776.

[Objections Overruled]

And now, January 18, 1957, for the reasons herein stated the preliminary objections to the plaintiff's complaint filed by the defendant are overruled, and leave is granted to the defendant to file an answer within twenty (20) days from the date hereof.

New York Fair Trade (Feld-Crawford) Act

Fair Trade—Advertising Below Fair Trade Prices—Notice of Price—Sufficiency of Notice.—To be entitled to injunctive relief against a nonsigner of a fair trade contract, a fair trader did not have to show that it gave a direct and specific notice to the nonsigner of the existence of fair trade prices on its products before a claimed violation of fair trade prices took place. Under the New York Fair Trade Act, no particular form of notice is required; the Act only requires the existence of knowledge, which need not be acquired in formal fashion. The fair trader was under no obligation to send direct or specific notice as to prices to the nonsigner. From the evidence in the instant case, there could be no inference other than that the nonsigner knew not only that the products were fair traded, but also knew their minimum prices and used them to show customers the extent of the discount available if the products were purchased from the nonsigner.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3268.34.

Fair Trade—Fair Trade Contracts—Validity—Attachment of Price Lists to Fair Trade Contracts.—A nonsigner's contention that a manufacturer's fair trade contracts were ineffective for the purpose of fixing minimum prices because price lists were not physically attached to the fair trade contracts was rejected. The fact that a price list may not be physically fastened to the fair trade contract does not affect the enforcibility of the contract. The price lists were given to each dealer as an integral part of and simultaneously with the signing of the fair trade contracts, and the price lists were adequately referred to and connected with the contracts by reference.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3130.34.

Fair Trade—Enforcement of Fair Trade Prices—Defenses—Refusal to Sell.—A nonsigner's contention that a fair trader was not entitled to equitable relief because the fair trader refused to sell its products to the nonsigner was rejected. The fair trader was free to choose those persons to whom it wished to sell its products. The New York Fair Trade Act does not require, as a prerequisite to injunctive relief, that a fair trader first give a retailer an opportunity to buy its products before the fair trader can proceed against the retailer. To sustain the nonsigner's contention would be to hold that only signers of fair trade contracts may be held liable under the Act, an interpretation which obviously is contrary to the Act. Also rejected was the nonsigner's contention that the motive of the fair trader was violative of the Act because its main purpose was not the protection of good will but to preserve to the fair trader and its dealers a lucrative market and to protect the dealers' competitive position in that market.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3460.

Fair Trade—Enforcement of Fair Trade Prices—Suit for Injunctive Relief—Scope of Injunction.—A fair trader, having established that a nonsigner violated the New York Fair Trade Act, was entitled to injunctive relief not only with respect to the specific products involved in the violation, but also as to all its other products similarly price fixed so as to protect it from any future violations of the same kind.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3366.34.

Fair Trade—Enforcement of Fair Trade Prices—Suit for Injunctive Relief—Right to Relief—Prior Compliance of Defendant.—A nonsigner's contention that a fair trader was not entitled to injunctive relief because the nonsigner had not previously advertised, sold, or offered for sale any of the fair trader's products below their fair trade prices was rejected.

[Action Against Nonsigner]

MARKOWITZ, Justice [In full text]: This is an action brought pursuant to the provisions of the Feld-Crawford Act (General Business Law, sec. 369-a et seq.) to enjoin defendants from advertising, offering for sale or selling at retail any of the products manufactured by plaintiff at prices which are lower than the minimum prices fixed for its products in fair trade agreements entered into between plaintiff and its dealers.

A temporary injunction herein was granted by an order of this court dated October 10, 1956, and is still in effect.

Plaintiff concededly relies herein upon the provisions of the General Business Law, section 369-b, which reads as follows:

> "Section 369-b, Unfair competition defined and made actionable. Willfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale or selling any commodity at less than the price stipulated in any contract entered into pursuant to the provision of section three hundred sixty nine-a, whether the person so advertising, offering for sale or selling is or is not a party to such contract, is unfair competition and is actionable at the suit of any person damaged thereby. Added L. 1940, c. 195, sec. 3, eff. March 19, 1940."

[Evidence]

Plaintiff's evidence which is uncontroverted, since defendants rested upon plaintiff's case and introduced no evidence on their own behalf, established the following: That plaintiff is a large scale manufacturer of electronic equipment including the magnetic tape recorders and reproducers referred to in the complaint as Series 600 and 601. All of its products bear its own registered trade mark and brand and are advertised and sold in fair and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced by several other manufacturers. Plaintiff expends substantial sums to advertise and promote its products and to build up its good will in relation thereto. The method of doing business followed by it is to sell its merchandise only to franchised dealers who enter into a terminable sales agreement on a non-exclusive basis. Whenever such a dealer is located in a fair-traded state such as New York, he is also required to sign a fair trade agreement which requires him to sell at retail at no less than the minimum prices fixed in a price list which is given to him along with the agreement. The plaintiff has followed this practice since 1953 and at this time has approximately 500 of such dealers selling its equipment under such conditions. In support of this testimony, copies of several fair trade agreements involving New York State dealers were introduced into evidence by the plaintiff. The testimony also established that the defendants have never been authorized to sell plaintiff's commodities. Plaintiff has never sold any merchandise to defendants nor given them a copy of its fair trade agreements or price lists.

The price of the plaintiff's 600 Series magnetic tape recorder was fixed by plaintiff's fair trade agreements at a minimum of $545. The price of the 601 Series magnetic tape recorder, which is an improved model of the 600 Series, is also listed by plaintiff at $545 for retail sales. Although manufacture of the 600 Series was discontinued on or about April 27, 1956, neither of the series models has ever been removed from coverage under the fair trade agreements of plaintiff.

[Defendant]

The evidence further discloses that defendant Sam Goody is in the retail business of selling phonograph records and related products, and defendant Goody Audio Center, Inc., sells phonographs, tape recorders, audio equipment and related products also at retail. Both operate under a selling policy which calls for a large volume of sales at very small unit markups.

[Advertisements]

In this case, the proof shows that on at least two different occasions, during conferences between representatives of plaintiff and defendants, officials of the plaintiff called attention to the fact that all of their products were fair traded, including the Series 600 and 601 tape recorders which were later advertised for sale by defendants, as evidenced by plaintiff's Exhibit 23. In July, 1956, defendants, through one of their representatives, contacted one of plaintiff's officers, then in New York, with a view toward obtaining a franchise for plaintiff's products. On August 1, 1956, during the course of a discussion between the defendants' representatives and plaintiff's officers, the defendants exhibited to representatives of plaintiff and also sent to plaintiff's home office in California a proof of an advertisement (Plaintiff's Exhibit 25B), ostensibly to be placed in the New York Times, which advertised, by name, plaintiff's 600 and 601 Series tape recorders for sale during the week from August 6-11, at a price of "30% and 25% off respectively." As a result thereof, plaintiff caused a telegram to be sent to defendants on August 2, 1956, in substance advising them that plaintiff's products are subject to fair trade agreements and that the proposed advertising thereof at prices below the fair trade list prices constituted unfair competition within the purview of section 369-b of the General Business Law and demanding that defendants refrain from such advertising or selling (Plaintiff's Exhibit 24).

Despite the telegram, receipt of which was not denied, defendants, on August 12, 1956, inserted an advertisement in the New York Times offering plaintiff's Series 600 tape recorder, by name, at a "30% reduction," specifying plaintiff's price therefor specifically at $545 and defendants' price as $381.50. The advertisement further suggested that defendants' further ads be watched for the 601 Series.

[Separate Price Lists]

The technical objection urged by defendants, to the effect that the aforesaid fair trade agreements are ineffective for purposes of fixing minimum prices because the price lists covered thereby are not physically annexed thereto, has no validity. The proof shows clearly that the lists are given to each dealer as an integral part of and simultaneously with the signing of the fair trade agreements in question. The circumstance that the price list may not be physically fastened to the agreement at the time does not affect the enforcibility of the agreement. The price lists are adequately referred to and connected with the agreements by reference and constitute minimum prices below which no dealer is permitted to sell at retail within the purview of section 369-b of the General Business Law.

[Notice to Defendant]

Defendants rely primarily on legal grounds in resisting the action, the nub of which appears to be that the plaintiff can only prevail if it shows that direct and specific notice was given to defendants of the existence of the fair traded prices before the claimed violation took place. The premise so urged is unsupported by the law prevailing in this jurisdiction. The act under which plaintiff proceeds requires no particular form of notice (Seagram-Distillers Corporation v. Seyopp Corp'n, 2 N. Y. S., 2d, 550). It only necessitates the existence of knowledge which need not be acquired in formal fashion and plaintiff was under no obligation to send direct or specific notice as to prices to defendants. As stated in the Seagram case, previously referred to, "* * * no notice at all is necessary except as a basis of proof that the defendant 'knowingly' made the sales complained of. * * *" In my view, there can be no inference other than that defendants knew, not only that these particular products were fair traded, but also knew their minimum prices and used them to show prospective purchasers the extent of the discount available to them if such equipment was purchased from defendants. Under all of the circumstances, advertising with such knowledge constitutes unfair competition within the prohibition of the Feld-Crawford Act, whether or not actual sales were proved. It is however, to be noted that plaintiff also introduced evidence, which defendants fail to contradict, to show that it sent a shopper to defendants' place of business to purchase a Series 600 recorder about two days after publication of the advertisement and she was advised that they were sold out.

[Product Fair Traded]

The claim made by defendants that the 600 Series recorder was no longer fair traded when they advertised it for sale is refuted by the uncontradicted proof of plaintiff whose witnesses affirmatively stated that said item was never removed from the fair traded agreements coverage. The circular of plaintiff to its dealers dated April 27, 1956 (Defendants' Exhibit A), while announcing in substance the discontinuance of the 600 series and the manufacture of the 601 series, nowhere implies that the former is no longer to be sold at the prescribed fair trade prices. As a matter of fact, the only reference therein to price seems to negate any such possibility since, referring to the 601 series, the circular states "The price is the same as the Model 600, i. e. $545.00." This language, thus, rather seems to indicate an intent to maintain the 600 series price at its fair trade level.

[Motive]

Nor do I see any merit to defendants' contention that the motive for this action is violative of the spirit of the Feld-Crawford Act in that its main purpose is not intended to protect plaintiff's good will, but to preserve to plaintiff and its dealers a lucrative market and to protect such dealers' competitive position in that market. Aside from defendants' complete failure to introduce evidence to support this argument, it is clear that the conduct complained of, as proved, constituted a positive violation of section 369-b and was actionable.

[Refusal to Sell]

By the same token, the assertion that plaintiff's right to equitable relief is lost by reason of its refusal to sell its products to defendants is also not valid. Certainly plaintiff is free to choose those persons to whom it sells its products. Nor does the Feld-Crawford Act condition, as a prerequisite to the relief sought, that a manufacturer must first give a retailer an opportunity to buy its products before it can proceed against him thereunder. The language of the statute involved indicates to the contrary, for it clearly contemplates the type of situations existing in the instant action, i.e., that of a violation by a non-signer of a fair trade agreement (Calvert Distillers Corp'n v. Nussbaum Liquor Store, Inc., 166 Misc., 342, 347). To sustain defendants' argument in this connection would be to hold that only signers of fair trade agreements may be held liable under the Feld-Crawford Act, an interpretation obviously contrary to the statute and the prevailing decisions.

[Prior Compliance]

The circumstances that defendants may not have advertised, sold or offered for sale any of plaintiff's products below fair traded prices subsequent to the acts complained of, cannot deprive plaintiff of its right to injunctive relief.

[Scope of Injunction]

Plaintiff, having established that defendants have violated the pertinent statute, is entitled to injunctive relief not only with respect to the specific items involved, but as to all other of the plaintiff's products similarly price fixed so as to protect it from any future violations of the same kind (Weisstein v. Freeman's Wines & Liquors, Inc., 169 Misc., 391).

[Damages]

Plaintiff is therefore entitled to an injunction as prayed for, but not to any damages, as plaintiff, at the trial, withdrew such claim.

Both sides having waived findings of fact and conclusions of law, the foregoing constitutes the decision of the court as required by section 440 of the Civil Practice Act. Settle judgment accordingly.

In the New York Supreme Court, Kings County, Special Term, Part III. Dated May 8, 1957.

New York Fair Trade (Feld-Crawford) Act

Fair Trade—Selling Below Fair Trade Prices—Notice of Price—Receipt of Notice After Acquisition of Fair Traded Products.—A noncontracting retailer was permitted to sell a fair trader's shirts at less than their established prices at a close out sale pursuant to the New York Fair Trade Act, in the event the fair trader did not purchase the shirts, where the retailer had no knowledge that the shirts were fair traded at the time it purchased them, and the retailer stated that it had no intention of thereafter purchasing or selling any of the price-fixed merchandise of the fair trader. A "holding that defendant

[the retailer] could not dispose of this merchandise other than by sale at the prices fixed by plaintiff [the fair trader] would be of doubtful constitutionality." The fair trader had given a general notice that it was fair trading its shirts, but it did not notify the retailer until after it had purchased the shirts. The law should not be used as an instrument to deprive an innocent purchaser of its right to dispose of property acquired before knowledge of the existence of a fair trade agreement. The retailer would not be able to dispose of the shirts if it was required to adhere to the fair trade prices. The fair trader, however, was granted injunctive relief against future sales by the retailer of fair traded shirts other than those acquired prior to the time it received notice.

[Permanent Injunction Sought]

The Referee, Honorable MEIER STEINBRINK [In full text]: Let the record show that in this action at the conclusion of the trial both counsel, for reasons that are obvious from the evidence, asked for an early and prompt decision. I say that because what I am about to dictate is not in erudite or polished form.

This action was begun by the plaintiff as against the defendant for an alleged violation of the provisions of the Feld-Crawford Act. In it the plaintiff asks for a permanent injunction restraining defendant from advertising, offering for sale or selling certain of plaintiff's products at less than the prices stipulated in its fair trade contract. No damages are asked for.

The action is brought under Section 369a and b of the General Business Law of the State of New York. Except as to one vital issue hereafter referred to there is little dispute as to the facts.

[Fair Trader]

Plaintiff is the manufacturer of men's shirts under the trade-mark "Arrow." Under this general trade-mark it manufactures and sells various classes and styles of shirts known by subsidiary trade-marks such as "Dart," "Par," and many others.

On January 28, 1955 it entered into a fair trade agreement with a New York City department store retailer providing for minimum prices for the sale in New York State at retail of some but not all of its men's shirts (Plaintiff's Exhibits 1 and 2). This agreement is still in effect although the schedule has been amended on two occasions.

The proof establishes that plaintiff manufactures and sells many styles and kinds of men's "Arrow" shirts, "perhaps several hundred," but that only a few are price-fixed. These, however, are the most popular and account for approximately 80% of the total sales of all "Arrow" shirts.

[General Notice]

Notice of the establishment of a fair trade price maintenance agreement was given by plaintiff to its many New York State customers and a general press release dated July 27, 1956 seems to have resulted in three very short, about 1½" long, news items published about August 1, 1956 to the effect that plaintiff, starting August 1st, would fair trade certain of its varieties of shirts. (Plaintiff's Exhibit 3).

[Defendant's Acquisition]

Defendant owns and operates three large cash-and-carry department stores. It had never sold "Arrow" shirts prior to March, 1957, although it did sell other men's shirts, none price fixed. After some negotiations with an exporter, Colamerica Company, it purchased on March 13, 1957 (Defendant's Exhibit C) approximately 200 dozen of "Arrow" men's shirts of which approximately 147 dozen were of the varieties covered by plaintiff's fair trade agreement and approximately 53 dozen were not so covered and are not affected by this action.

The shirts were delivered to defendant on March 15 (Defendant's Exhibit E, 2d page) and paid for on March 19 (Defendant's Exhibit D). They were all put on sale and prominently featured in defendant's advertisements on April 5 and 12 (Plaintiff's Exhibits 4 and 5) at a price considerably less than the fixed price applying to some of them.

[Notice to Defendant]

The matter being brought to plaintiff's attention, it promptly notified defendant by registered mail (letter dated April 5 and apparently received by defendant on April 8, Plaintiff's Exhibit 6) that certain of its "Arrow" shirts were subject to a fair trade contract with minimum resale prices specified.

[Temporary Injunction Denied]

Defendant continued to advertise and sell the shirts, including those price fixed, at prices below the specified minimums and this action followed. A motion for a temporary injunction was denied and a prompt trial ordered.

[Timeliness of Notice]

The disputed issue of fact hereinbefore mentioned is whether or not at the time of its purchase of the shirts in question defendant knew that they were subject to a fair trade agreement. Defendant strenuously maintains that it had no such knowledge and the testimony offered on its behalf through the witness Shulman and the witness Baruchin to that effect was unshaken on cross-examination.

Plaintiff could offer no proof of direct knowledge on the part of defendant prior to the receipt by it of plaintiff's letter of April 5th but argues that defendant must have known of the fair trade agreement and, in any event, has not shown that it did not have such knowledge. I agree that lack of knowledge of the fair trade agreement prior to the purchase of the articles in question is a matter of affirmative defense.

On the proof before me I must find, however, and I do find that defendants had no such knowledge in March of 1957 when it purchased the shirts in question or any time prior thereto and that the first knowledge it had of any fair trade agreement affecting this price was when it received plaintiff's letter dated April 5th.

Plaintiff further contends that knowledge or lack of knowledge on the part of defendant at the time of purchase of the articles is immaterial and that all that is required to be shown to entitle it to an injunction is the fact that after April 8 defendant sold the articles in question below the price fixed in the fair trade agreement.

The issue is one at law and does not appear to have been specifically passed upon in any case that has been brought to my attention or that I have been able, by independent research, to find. Various cases on the subject appear to be similar but, on careful analysis, are distinguishable. No useful purpose will be served by an extended discussion of these cases.

Plaintiff seeks to invoke the equitable jurisdiction of the court to prevent injury to its trade-mark. It would seem to me, however, the law should not be used as an instrument to deprive an innocent purchaser of its right to dispose of property acquired before knowledge of the existence of the fair trade agreement.

[Close-Out Sale Permitted]

The proof in this case is to the effect that defendant is and will be unable to dispose of the merchandise if required to adhere to the fair trade prices. In addition, this would be contrary to its general store policy. Under the special circumstances of this case, it would seem to me that defendant should be permitted to invoke paragraph 2 of Section 369a to permit it to close out these price-fixed items and to discontinue the sale thereof.

Defendant has stated that it has no intention of hereafter purchasing or selling any of the price-fixed merchandise of the plaintiff and, under the terms of the contract entered into by plaintiff with its customers, defendant should be permitted to tender back to plaintiff at its cost the balance of the merchandise on hand covered by the fair trade agreement. In the event of a failure of plaintiff so to purchase these items, defendant should be permitted to dispose of the merchandise on hand at whatever price it is able to obtain.

[Constitutionality]

It seems to me that in this way substantial justice will be done to both parties. It is my opinion that a holding that defendant could not dispose of this merchandise other than by sale at the prices fixed by plaintiff would be of doubtful constitutionality.

[Relief]

There will be judgment for the plaintiff granting an injunction against future sales by the defendant of price fixed articles other than those acquired during the month of March but upon the conditions heretofore stated. And this judgment will be without costs.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Pretrial Procedures—Interrogatories—Conspiracy.—Objections to interrogatories requesting counter-claimants to specify, in precise detail, the exact manner in which an alleged conspiracy is claimed to have operated, to supply the names, dates, and places of the origin of various pooling arrangements, and to detail all of the alleged overt acts were sustained. If the instant action had just been commenced and very broad and vague allegations were involved, the interrogatories might be proper; however, the pleadings in the action had been sustained against various motions to dismiss, and the parties had been through several years of depositions and were on the eve of trial. Also, interrogatories were held to be unduly burdensome in scope because they would require a speculative reconstruction of the business alleged to have been interfered with by the alleged conspiracy. Other interrogatories were held to be burdensome and/or irrelevant, and objections to still other interrogatories were overruled.

Memorandum Re Objections to Interrogatories

MICHAEL L. IGOE, District Judge [In full text]: The Court has before it for decision numerous objections to a comprehensive set of interrogatories filed jointly on December 29, 1956 by plaintiff-counter-defendant, Radio Corporation of America, and cross-defendants, General Electric and Western Electric Company. They have been briefed and the Court has heard extensive argument by counsel. Fortunately, counsel on both sides have made a number of concessions which go a great distance in narrowing the area of dispute, which is now limited to interrogatories 4 through 8, 14, 17(a), 21(a), 25, 36(d), 38, 39, 43, 47, 48, 56, 58 and 60.

[General Objections]

Zenith and Rauland, on whom the interrogatories were served, object vigorously to the remainder of them on the principal grounds of undue burden and lack of relevance to any issue in the case. On the question of their burdensome nature, the Court notes that these voluminous interrogatories, sixty-two in number, many with numerous subdivisions, were not served until nearly three months after the first date set for the trial of this action and until after several voluminous subpoenas, a prior set of interrogatories and many months of depositions of Zenith and Rauland officials had been utilized.

As to interrogatories 4A, 4(b) and 4(c), the Court is of the opinion that they are unduly burdensome in scope, in that they would require a speculative reconstruction of the business alleged to have been interfered with by the conspiracy charged. The Court notes that interrogatory 13, which was not objected to, requires Zenith to set forth the precise nature of its losses in export trade with particular countries, how it was arrived at and the persons participating in its computation. This would appear sufficient. If it should appear that Zenith does not have a proper basis for damages in the amounts claimed, that can be fully utilized at the trial. In the meantime, there is no point in requiring Zenith to reconstruct its losses on some other formula which was never actually employed.

As to interrogatories 5 and 6, the objections are sustained. Zenith should clearly not be required, at this stage of the litigation, to undertake 78,935 computations shown in the Schroeder affidavit to be necessary to comply with 5, and 6 appears objectionable on the ground of burden and further because it would appear to require Zenith to make a 27-year search of the laws and regulations of eleven different foreign countries "applicable" to the importation of radio and television receivers and tubes.

I will sustain the objections to interrogatories 7 and 8, which appear not only burdensome, but to require a great mass of data which can have little or no relevance. As the Court understands the issue, this information goes to the question of damages —it is sought to ascertain why, instead of exporting merchandise from the United States, Zenith did not instead manufacture locally in various foreign countries. As we understand the issue on which damages is sought, it relates to exclusion from export trade from the United States, rather than damage to a manufacturing business located in a foreign country.

Interrogatory 14 seeks greatly detailed data on the tax rates applicable to Zenith and Rauland going back to 1940. The tax rate applicable in the so-called damage years has no relevance to any issue with which the Court is presently familiar. If it should later develop that this information is necessary, and a proper showing is made, it will be ordered produced.

The objection to interrogatory 17(a) is overruled, on the understanding that it does not require Zenith to acquire or compile information not now in its possession.

The objection to interrogatory 21(a) is overruled. To the extent that license agreements within this category specify the patents licensed, there can be no problem; to the extent such patents are not specified, Zenith should give whatever information is in its possession.

The objection to interrogatory 25 is sustained. The Court sees no relevance to the issue of whether there was coercion in the release between Zenith and RCA in the details of releases between Zenith and complete strangers to the litigation involving other matters.

The objection to interrogatory 36(d) is overruled.

The objections to interrogatories 38, 39, 43, 47 and 48 are sustained. These are very long and involved interrogatories in which Zenith and Rauland are asked to specify in precise detail the exact manner in which the alleged conspiracy is claimed to have operated, supplying the names, dates and places of the origin of the various pooling arrangements, and detailing all of the overt acts. If we were at the threshold of this case and dealing with a very broad and vague allegation, such interrogatories might be proper. Here, however, the pleadings have been sustained against various motions to dismiss, and the parties have been through several years of depositions and are on the eve of trial.

The Court is not impressed with the suggestion that such intimate and detailed knowledge of the inner workings of an alleged conspiracy is necessary to support a claim for damages by one who would have been excluded from its inner councils by the very nature of the conspiracy. Nor does such information appear essential to preparation for the defense, considering the already formidable background and history of this case.

Interrogatories 56 and 58 appear to be highly burdensome, based on the facts stated in the Schroeder affidavit, and I am not satisfied that there has been any clear showing of relevance of the information sought, which relates wholly to any similarity between the structures of Zenith receivers over the years and information published in RCA bulletins.

In the light of the statement by counsel at page 75 of the transcript of the argument the objection to interrogatory 60 is overruled.

The motion to extend the time for answering the interrogatories not objected to until April 30 is granted. The interrogatories as to which the objections are overruled may be answered by May 15, 1957.

In the United States District Court for the District of Colorado. Criminal Action No. 14929. Dated February 15, 1957.

Case No. 1283 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Criminal Prosecutions—Indictments—Defendants' Plea of Nolo Contendere—Considerations in Acceptance or Rejection of Plea.—In a criminal antitrust action charging that rubber companies conspired to fix the prices of industrial V-belts, the companies were permitted to withdraw their pleas of not guilty and to enter pleas of nolo contendere on the condition that the 1955 amendment to the Sherman Act, increasing the maximum fine that can be imposed for a Sherman Act violation, would be applicable in fixing the amount of the fines.

The court ruled that it would not accept the pleas of nolo contendere in the absence of an exceptional circumstance which justifies the acceptance of the pleas. The fact that the companies will be subjected to the prima facie evidence provisions of Section 5 of the Clayton Act and faced with possible treble damage actions, if they are not permitted to plead nolo contendere, is not an exceptional circumstance justifying the acceptance of the pleas. The acceptance of a nolo contendere plea in a federal antitrust prosecution does not violate the Congressional policy expressed in Section 5 of the Clayton Act. Under Section 5 of the Act, the prima facie evidence provisions are not applicable to consent judgments or decrees entered before any testimony has been taken, and Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure specifically permits a plea of nolo contendere when the consent of the court is obtained. The intent of Congress has been to retain the plea in antitrust cases, and the use of the plea, if permitted by the court, is not contrary to the public interest as declared by Congress. In an antitrust case, there is the traditional basis for a nolo contendere plea because of the provisions of Section 5 and the potential treble damage actions. The exceptional circumstance found by the court was the congestion of the court's calendar. The public interest would be best served by the acceptance of the pleas, thereby eliminating a lengthy trial and making available court time for handling other litigation. However, the court rejected the contention that the congestion of a court's calendar should be the controlling reason for the acceptance of the pleas. The court noted that the Government did not show that the present prosecution was different from any other antitrust prosecution, that a nolo contendere plea has all the effect of a plea of guilty in the case in which it is made, and that the only penalty that can be imposed in the instant action was a fine and that a fine may be just as heavy under a nolo contendere plea as under a guilty plea.

Findings of the Court

[Nolo Contendere Pleas—Government Position]

The Court, Jean S. Breitenstein, District Judge [In full text]: We have set for this time Criminal No. 14929, The United States v. B. F. Goodrich and others. That is the matter we had up last week.

Mr. Hunter: Last Friday, Your Honor, the matter of the defendants' motions to withdraw their pleas of Not Guilty and to change them to nolo contendere came on for hearing before the Court. During the course of the hearing the Court inquired as to whether or not the attention of Attorney General Brownell had been called to the congestion of the court's docket, and if it had not been so called, would that matter be called to the attention of the Attorney General in connection with the Attorney General's position with respect to whether he should oppose nolo pleas in this case.

During this past week, Your Honor, the attention of the Attorney General has been called to the crowded condition and congestion of this court's docket. The Attorney General has expressed a very sympathetic concern for the congestion of this court's docket. The Attorney General has asked me to express to this Court that he is doing and will do all that is within the power of the Attorney General to do so far as alleviating conditions which may give rise to the congestion of this court's docket. The Attorney General, however, is of the opinion that the congestion of the court's docket is not a factor to which he should give consideration as to whether to oppose nolo pleas, and in that respect, Your Honor, the Attorney General has considered the matter and is still opposed to nolo pleas.

Now, one thing I think which should be called to the Court's attention in that respect, with respect to the Attorney General's policy, is that most anti-trust cases are brought in jurisdictions wherein the court's docket is very congested, and if consideration to the congestion of the court's docket were given in connection with the Attorney General's policy, there would be no policy. The exception would be the rule rather than the policy.

The Court: Anybody else have anything to say?

[Position of Defendants]

Mr. John Shafroth: Your Honor, our position is still as it was last week, that the matter of discretion is not for Mr. Brownell or anyone else except you and that what Mr. Brownell thinks of the congestion of the court's docket and whether it is a fact or not doesn't matter a bit. Mr. Brownell is concerned with the court's docket, or at least all of the committees that he forms and gives speeches at all year long on what to do about the congestion of the courts. But when it comes time for a matter of discretion in considering these pleas evidently he doesn't consider it a factor to be considered one way or the other.

As I pointed out last week, the Government doesn't lose anything from the acceptance of this plea. You don't have any problem regarding possible jail terms, as you might in the ordinary criminal case, unless you want to jail some of the United States Attorneys for contempt.

Last spring Mr. Brownell, talking at one of these meetings concerning the problem of congested court calendars, seemed to think it was in the public interest because he said,

> "This problem is of national concern (meaning congested dockets) and affects the rights of litigants in both State and Federal Courts. I am confident that this effort will succeed but it will take the active participation of each of us, not just today and tomorrow but continuously from now on and for many months to come, to correct this deficiency in the administration of justice."

Well, this will take us, as we said, maybe six weeks to try, and after the jury brings in a verdict for the defendants Mr. Brownell may reconsider this policy.

One other point that I would like to make is in connection with that argument in which you didn't agree with me last October but I think maybe that should be considered in exercising your discretion. As I recall, despite denying the motion, which is within your power, of course, you said the problem might give you trouble at the time of the trial. That was the duplicity question, and I think that in exercising your discretion as to the possible factor of evidence showing the conspiracy in two different periods where the penalty provisions would be different might have some bearing on how you exercise your discretion here. As a result of that problem I think you could have the possibility of having two cases out of this.

In conclusion, I want to say again that the discretion is not Mr. Brownell's or Mr. Hansen's who sit in air-conditioned offices in Washington but it is yours who sits behind the bench in an un-air-conditioned courtroom here. Thank you, sir.

The Court: Mr. Denious?

Mr. Denious: If Your Honor please, maybe I can sum up where we stand without going over the same ground again and make somewhat of a reply to the argument advanced by the Government. One of the things that struck me when I reflected about our argument last Friday was that nobody had ever read Section 5 to the Court. There has been an amendment to Section 5 but it is not material to our consideration. The section, so far as we are concerned, reads exactly the same as it always has since 1914 when it was enacted. The insertion by the amendment of 1955 was in view of a new section, which is codified as Section 15a of the United States Code, giving the Government a right to sue as a treble damage plaintiff or to sue as a private litigant and sue for civil damages because of any damage thought to be suffered by the Government in its proprietary capacity by reason of the violation of the Antitrust Laws.

Now, when they added that Section 15a, as codified, they just inserted in Section 5 these mentions of Section 15a; otherwise they did not change the section and it reads the same and reaffirms the policy which, as was stated before, was decided upon in 1914 when this issue of how much to help a possible private litigant was debated in Congress and the section was enacted in this form.

Now, the section also by the codification of 1955 was broken up into two parts. One part, the second part which is now numbered (b), relates to civil or criminal proceedings and the statute of limitations. It doesn't concern us, either, at this point. Section (a) is the only section we are interested in and it reads:

"A final judgment or decree heretofore or hereafter rendered in any civil or criminal proceeding brought by or on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws to the effect that a defendant has violated such laws shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any action or proceeding brought by any other party against such defendant under said laws", then the insertion "or by the United States under section 15a of this title, as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto." Then here is the proviso: "Provided, that this section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees entered before any testimony has been taken or to judgments or decrees entered in actions under section 15a of this title."

Now, the addition there was the part relating to judgments or decrees under 15a. The other proviso was identical, they didn't change it at all, they just added on, the proviso in 1914, and today reads:

"Provided, this section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees entered before any testimony has been taken."

That is the section that we are trying to come within, Your Honor, and of course it is an unusual situation. It isn't an unusual antitrust case but it is an unusual situation where a judgment in a criminal case is to be used as evidence in a civil case between different parties, and it is likewise out of the ordinary where a civil liability is to be three times the actual liability. So it is an unusual case. It doesn't arise in the ordinary criminal case.

Now, there is a way to avoid this unusual circumstance that a judgment in a criminal case shall be prima facie evidence in a civil action for treble damages. It is set forth in the section. The section which creates this prima facie evidence also shows a way where it will not apply. They can't say that there is any policy that we should always be subject to this prima facie evidence. The section which provides for it also says it shall not apply in one circumstance, namely, to judgments or decrees entered by consent before any testimony has been taken. The Lord hath given, the Lord hath taken away—all in Section 5.

Now, the only way that we can come within this proviso is by a plea of nolo contendere. That is the only way. I believe it is an accepted principle that when we construe or administer a statute we presume that Congress meant every word to mean something, certainly every clause to mean something, and when it puts in a clause like this proviso it means it shall have some utility and that it shall have some effect on people.

As pointed out in the Standard Ultramarine case by Judge Weinfeld, to plead guilty is not a solution to the dilemma because to plead guilty means to make an admission which can be used in treble damage action just the same as the decree can be used or the conviction but for the proviso. The plea of guilty constitutes an admission so you have a prima facie case against you by reason of your plea of guilty just the same, the same practical effect, as if you had been convicted after a trial. So that if the only way to come within this section would be to plead guilty, there wouldn't be any point in coming within it, there wouldn't be any benefit gained in the proviso, and the proviso must mean something. The only way, therefore, that we can come within it, if we are allowed to come within it, is by a plea of nolo contendere, and the discussions and the literature surrounding the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure show that that is why the plea of nolo contendere was preserved, so as to abide by this policy that was set by Congress in 1914 and by the amendment of 1955 was reaffirmed since it left the proviso exactly to the same effect.

Now, we have a blanket policy by the Attorney General which repeals the proviso in effect, as far as he is concerned, and that is all we have, is a blanket policy, because I am sure my notes are correct that the state of the docket or the rights of other litigants before this Court, according to the statement just made to Your Honor, were given no consideration by the Attorney General. That was the statement as I took it down, that it was not a factor to be considered. So that as far as the Attorney General is concerned he has a blanket policy, he doesn't care about the state of the docket and it is not a matter of discretion and he hasn't exercised any discretion. The discretion does lie in the Court and we think this is a case where the Court should exercise it.

In the first place, they chose this jurisdiction. They chose to bring most of the rubber industry out here to Denver instead of bringing the case back in Ohio or bringing the case where all these meetings, they allege, were held, with the single exception of one meeting down in Colorado Springs.

It is not an aggravated case. I believe I argued that to Your Honor last week, that there isn't anything in the indictment that shows any aggravation or any case except one of concert of action or conscious parallelism cases where you are right in the most shadowy area of the law and a person can be guilty or not guilty and nobody can tell. And we have the confirmation of the Government on that point, Your Honor, because last week the Government stated to Your Honor:

> "It is not a complicated case, Your Honor. It is an ordinary per se violation, ordinary price-fixing case, has been declared so, to be a per se violation since 1926 in the Trenton Potteries case, again in 1940 by the Socony-Vacuum case."

So we have no aggravated case. We have a case where if the guilt exists it is questionable and technical, and in addition to that, the courts have, in every case I can find except one, exercised their discretion and have exercised it to the effect that the plea of nolo contendere and the motion to allow should be granted.

Now, we do have the great Judge Weinfeld in December of 1955, in that case in 137 Federal Supplement, Standard Ultramarine case [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,237], deciding just the opposite of Judge Sugarman in the case in 136 Federal Supplement. Since that time I can not find the cases the Government points to, I can not find any report where the plea and the motion to make a plea of nolo contendere has been denied except in the Krause case. The Krause case was a case involving brewers' supplies, it was in Ohio, and there were circumstances which were prejudicial to the defendant and robbed him of any circumstance where he was entitled to consideration. But now since that time, by going through COMMERCE CLEARING HOUSE TRADE REGULATION REPORTS and looking for every case I could find I find that in the National Electrical Contractors the motion was granted January 21, 1956; in Memphis Retail Package Stores it was granted January 31, 1956; in Retail Liquor Dealers of Chattanooga it was granted March 23, 1956; in the Shell Oil case it was granted March 28, 1956; in the Akin Denison case it was granted April 18, 1956, and so on. National Linen Service, Garden State Retail Gasoline Dealers, Michigan Tool Company, Haverhill Oil Company, Chicago Towel Company, Lyman Gunsight Company in the District of Columbia, Buck Sporting Goods, Inc., in this Circuit and the Grinnell case down in Texas.

It was stated to Your Honor that Judge Weinfeld had placed a judicial construction on this policy and on Section 5 and on Rule 11. I say, Your Honor, that there has been a judicial construction placed on it, and while there may be cases, they say it is fifty-fifty but I can't find the cases, I say the judicial construction which has been placed on these rules and this section, Your Honor, since the decision of Judge Weinfeld, has been to repudiate that construction of his and to follow the construction contended for by us and to grant the defendants in other cases, as we are entitled to the discretion of the Court and the right to avoid this heavy and unusual civil liability and to tender a plea of nolo contendere where the Court can do exactly what it can do to us if we are convicted.

Thank you.

[Indictment]

The Court: Anybody else want to be heard?

After listening to the arguments last week I was disturbed by the situation that is presented. In order to help me make up my mind I put in a little overtime study and I have a few notes here on it.

In this case a one-count indictment was returned on June 1st, 1956, which charges the defendants with violation of 15 U. S. C., Section 1. The charge is that the defendants have engaged in a conspiracy in unreasonable restraint of interstate commerce in that they fixed and determined prices, terms and other conditions for the sale of V-belts. V-belts are endless belts used in connection with V-grooved pulleys for various domestic and industrial purposes. The indictment avers that in 1954 the combined V-belt sales of defendants amounted to approximately $60,000,000.

[Change of Pleas]

On June 29, 1956, each of the defendants entered a plea of Not Guilty. A time was fixed for the presentation of motions attacking the indictment. Motions to dismiss were filed by each defendant and were denied on October 22, 1956. Each of the defendants has now filed a motion for permission to withdraw its plea of Not Guilty and enter a plea of nolo contendere to the indictment. The attorneys for the United States oppose the motions.

[Contentions]

Defendants urge that they should be permitted to plead nolo contendere because of the provisions of 15 U. S. C., Section 16. That is Section 5 of the Clayton Act as amended by the Act of July 7, 1955. The Government resists the motions upon the basis of the 1953 memorandum of the Attorney General relating to nolo contendere pleas. Inherent in the position of the Government is the conclusion that the public interest is best served by its opposition to the acceptance of nolo contendere pleas except under conditions stated in the memorandum of the Attorney General. While counsel for the Government assert that there is no extraordinary situation here to justify the acceptance of a nolo contendere plea, they have not directed the attention of the Court to any peculiar or aggravating circumstance in this case which would distinguish it from an ordinary prosecution under 15 U. S. C., Section 1.

[Rule 11, Criminal Procedure]

Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure provides that with the consent of the Court a defendant may plead nolo contendere. The note of the Advisory Committee on Rules states that Rule 11 is substantially a restatement of existing law and practice and that the plea of nolo contendere has always existed in Federal Courts. (See Hudson v. United States, 272 U. S. 451; United States v. Norris, 281 U. S. 619.) The note of the Advisory Committee as it appears after Rule 11 in 18 U. S. C. concludes with this sentence:

> "While at times criticized as theoretically lacking in logical basis, experience has shown that it (that is, a plea of nolo contendere) performs a useful function from a practical standpoint."

Without regard to how I might feel about the philosophy underlying the plea of nolo contendere, the fact remains that the use of the plea in Federal Courts is accepted and indeed praised by many. (For example, see 5 Federal Rules Decisions, page 69, and Lenvin and Meyers' article on "Nolo Contendere: Its Nature and Implications", appearing in 51 Yale Law Journal, page 1255.) While the position of the Attorney General is not binding upon the Court, it must be given consideration, particularly in view of the contention that the public interest is best served by the rejection of such a plea.

In connection with the public interest it is suggested by defense counsel that this case will entail a lengthy trial which will further delay the expeditious disposal of court business within the District of Colorado. The congestion of cases upon the calendar of the United States District Court for the District of Colorado is indeed acute. The median time for the handling of civil jury cases from filing to disposition is, in the District of Colorado, nearly twice the national average. The number of criminal cases filed in this jurisdiction is very substantially higher than the national average per judge. While extreme efforts have been used to keep the criminal docket up to date the fact remains that at the recent conclusion of more than four weeks of criminal jury trials, conducted by three judges, over 40 criminal cases remain on the calendar awaiting trial. The available physical facilities are such that at the moment additional judge power can not be efficiently used for jury trials and the courtrooms cannot be used for jury trials during the summer months. Thus it is apparent that a prolonged trial such as is in prospect in this case will add materially to the problem of congestion and delay. Hence, the problem is posed as to whether public interest is in fact best served by the denial of the motions and the additional calendar congestion which will inevitably follow.

While the problems of congestion are of extreme importance in this district, I firmly believe that the ideal is to attain justice in each individual case rather than to look upon the business of the courts solely from the standpoint of calendar statistics. Although congestion and delay are deplorable, the Court must patiently give full consideration to the rights and claims of the litigants. Matters of additional judge power and adequate court facilities are for the proper consideration of the legislative and executive branches. I am unwilling to accept the position that the congestion of the court's calendar is a controlling reason for the acceptance of a plea of nolo contendere. Yet I must recognize that it is a factor which a trial judge may not blithely ignore.

[Exceptional Circumstance—Acceptance of Plea]

In the case of United States v. Colm, Criminal Action No. 14930, on November 30, 1956, I denied a motion for leave to plead nolo contendere and said, in effect, that I would not accept such a plea in the absence of exceptional circumstances. Indeed this has been the established practice in the United States District Court for the District of Colorado for many years. It has existed both before and after the 1953 Memorandum of the Attorney General. The important question to which I will give consideration in this case is whether or not there exists here an exceptional circumstance which justifies the acceptance of the plea. The only circumstance which has been pointed out as exceptional is the potential liability of the defendants under 15 U. S. C., Section 16. This section provides in part as follows:

> "A final judgment or decree heretofore or hereafter rendered in any civil or criminal proceeding brought by or on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws to the effect that a defendant has violated said laws shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any action or proceeding brought by any other party against such defendant under said laws or by the United States under section 15a of this title, as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto: Provided, That this section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees entered before any testimony has been taken or to judgments or decrees entered in actions under section 15a of this title."

The defendants assert that a nolo contendere plea will protect them against the prima facie evidence provision of the above statute. It has been said that the only basic difference between a plea of nolo contendere and a plea of guilty is that a nolo contendere plea will not be deemed in subsequent proceedings an admission of the charge averred in the indictment. (See United States v. Jones, decision of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California, found in 119 Federal Supplement 288; see also 5 Federal Rules Decisions, pages 66 to 67, and authorities there cited.) Indeed, the Memorandum of the Attorney General as quoted in the footnote appearing in 119 Federal Supplement 289 recognizes that the plea "may serve a legitimate purpose in a few extraordinary situations and where civil litigation is also pending." I can see no great difference between pending and potential litigation.

In the case at bar the attorneys for the defendants have stated in court that at least some of them face the hazard of treble damage actions under 15 U. S. C., Section 15.

The difficulty with this argument is that if the provision of 15 U. S. C., Section 16, that a final judgment or decree shall be prima facie evidence against a defendant in antitrust actions and the assertions of anticipated litigation are deemed to constitute an exceptional circumstance, then such an exceptional circumstance exists in practically every prosecution under 15 U. S. C., Section 1. Thus we are faced with a basic question as to whether an acceptance of a nolo contendere plea in a federal antitrust prosecution would violate the Congressional policy expressed in 15 U. S. C., Section 16.

[Decisions]

At least two antitrust prosecutions involving nolo contendere pleas have been before the Supreme Court of the United States. They are the Brotherhood of Carpenters v. United States, 330 U. S. 395, and United States v. Frankfort Distilleries [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,338], 324 U. S., page 293. In neither of those cases did the Supreme Court criticize the acceptance of nolo contendere pleas or indicate that it considered the acceptance of such pleas to be contrary to the Congressional intent.

In United States v. Standard Ultramarine and Color Company, United States District Court for the Southern District of New York [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,237], 137 Federal Supplement 167, Judge Weinfeld concluded that the acceptance of a nolo contendere plea in an antitrust prosecution would fail to carry out the Congressional purpose and would tend to diminish rather than increase respect for law and, accordingly, should not have the sanction of the Court except when special considerations are present.

In United States v. Cigarette Merchandisers Association, United States District Court for the Southern District of New York [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,188], 136 Federal Supplement 212, Judge Sugarman accepted a nolo contendere plea in an antitrust case where the situation was that the Government had simultaneously filed a companion civil action and hence the preservation of the rights given by Section 16 could be accomplished by the disposition of the civil suit.

In the Madison Oil cases nolo contendere pleas were accepted and the effect of those pleas in subsequent private litigation was given consideration by district courts. (See United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Company, District Court for the Western District of Wisconsin, 23 Federal Supplement 531; Twin Ports Oil Co. v. Pure Oil Co., District Court, Minnesota, 26 Federal Supplement 366; Barnsdall Refining Corporation v. Birnamwood Oil Co., District Court for the Eastern District of Wisconsin, 32 Federal Supplement 308.)

In the Twin Ports Oil Company case consideration was given to the legislative history of Section 5 of the Clayton Act and similar consideration was given to the same subject in the Standard Ultramarine case. I am inclined to agree with a statement of Judge Huxman of the Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit in his dissenting opinion in Ruth v. Eagle-Picher Company, 255 Federal Second 572, 578, when he said that:

> "When we seek support for our views in the legislative history of an act, it is not too difficult to find what we seek."

[Intent of Congress]

I have the utmost respect for the views of the courts who have considered this problem. My approach is perhaps somewhat different. We are confronted with a situation involving the following:

1. The plea of nolo contendere has always existed in the Federal Courts. (See Hudson v. United States and United States v. Norris that I have mentioned.)

2. When Congress passed Section 5 of the Clayton Act in 1914 it did not eliminate the plea of nolo contendere in antitrust cases nor did it change the effect of such a plea as then recognized by the courts.

3. Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure specifically permits a plea of nolo contendere when the consent of the court is obtained. This Rule became effective March 21, 1946, after the Rules of Criminal Procedure had been regularly reported to Congress in accordance with the Act of June 29, 1940, 18 U. S. C., 3771.

4. Pleas of nolo contendere have been accepted in a great number of antitrust prosecutions in the period elapsing between the original enactment of the Clayton Act and its amendment by the Act of July 7, 1955. (For example, see 10 Federal Rules Decisions 166; 5 Federal Rules Decisions, page 69.)

5. When Congress amended Section 5 of the Clayton Act in 1955, the provisions of Rule 11 and the records of nolo contendere pleas in antitrust prosecutions were within its knowledge.

To me the conclusion is inevitable that the intent of Congress has been to retain the plea of nolo contendere in antitrust cases and that the use of such a plea if permitted by the Court is not contrary to the public interest as declared by Congress. From this it follows that in an antitrust case you have the traditional basis for a nolo contendere plea because of the provisions of Section 5, as amended, and the potential treble damage actions. If the intent of Congress is that the public interest precludes the acceptance of nolo contendere pleas in antitrust cases, it can easily say so in clear and unmistakable language.

[Court's Discretion]

In view of my conclusion that Congressional legislation does not declare, even by inference, that the acceptance of nolo contendere pleas in antitrust cases is contrary to the public interest, I come to the question of what is the proper exercise of the Court's discretion in this case.

The defendants present what I believe to be an exceptional circumstance within my decision in the Colm case. Regrettably the docket in this District is such that public interest requires that everything be done which can properly be done to expedite the trial and disposition of lawsuits. In this case a lengthy trial is prophesied. The elimination of such a trial will make available court time for the handling of other litigation which has been long delayed.

[Effect of Plea]

The Government opposes the pleas upon the basis of the 1953 Memorandum of the Attorney General. At the same time the Government has come forward with no statement of aggravation which differentiates this prosecution from any other prosecution under the antitrust statutes. I am not at all in sympathy with the argument of the Government that a nolo contendere plea is a gentleman's plea or a whitecollar plea. So far as I am concerned, a nolo contendere plea is simply a plea of no contest. For the purposes of the case in which it is made, a plea of nolo contendere has all the effect of a plea of guilty. That is what the United States Supreme Court has said in both the Hudson and Norris cases that I have mentioned. I do not consider a nolo contendere plea as either a compromise plea or as an implied appeal for mercy.

The statement in the Memorandum of the Attorney General that "uncontrolled use of the plea has led to shockingly low sentences and insignificant fines which are no deterrent to crime" is a criticism not of the plea itself or of its legal effect but of the penalties imposed after acceptance of the plea. Matters which go in mitigation may properly be considered after a nolo contendere plea as well as after a plea of guilty. They should have no greater weight after one plea than after another.

[Acceptance of Plea in District]

In my study of this matter I have given concern to the practice of the United States District Court for the District of Colorado, and while my research may not be complete, I find that since 1940 nolo contendere pleas have been accepted in at least seven antitrust cases involving a great number of defendants. I have found no antitrust case in the District Court for the District of Colorado in which a tendered nolo contendere plea has been rejected.

[Fines]

One other matter should be mentioned. The defendants are all corporations. The only penalty which may be imposed is a fine. That fine may be just as heavy under a nolo contendere plea as under a guilty plea. From both legal and practical viewpoints, there is, under the circumstances of this case, no reason why the tendered pleas should not be accepted.

[Increased Maximum Fine]

One further fact remains to be considered. At the argument of the motions to dismiss it was contended that the indictment was duplicitous in that it charges a conspiracy which allegedly existed "for many years past, and continuing up to and including the date of the return of this indictment." The defendants pointed out that by the Act of July 7, 1955, 15 U. S. C., Section 1, was amended to increase the penalty from $5,000 to $50,000. Their argument in effect was that since the indictment covered acts both before and after the 1955 amendment, the indictment either charges two offenses or the Court could apply only the penalty existing before the 1955 amendment. The motions to dismiss were overruled. If nolo contendere pleas are accepted in this case it will stand admitted that the alleged conspiracy continued until the date of the indictment. If the defendants remain willing to plead nolo contendere with the knowledge that in imposing the sentence the Court will be governed by the provisions of the 1955 amendment pertaining to penalty, then I will accept such pleas.

Mr. Denious: Gates wishes to still persist in the motion, Your Honor. It wishes to plead nolo contendere.

The Court: All right. It is accepted as to Gates. How about Goodrich?

Mr. Holland: Your Honor, I didn't anticipate, as far as the U. S. Rubber Company, this would come up, and I wonder if Your Honor could defer it until I could call—I assume that we will go along with it.

The Court: If one of you is going to defer, I think all of you had better. I am just saying this, I am not deciding your legal rights; you all know what rights you have after a plea of nolo contendere. But I am just saying that as far as I am concerned, in imposing penalty I will consider that I am not governed by the law as it existed prior to the 1955 amendment.

Mr. Holland: On that basis I think U. S. Rubber will accept.

I think everyone feels we should have time to check with our head counsel, Your Honor.

The Court: I am willing to give you that because I don't want you local lawyers here in Denver to perhaps get in any hazard.

Mr. Holland: I think I stuck my neck out and I would like to pull it back in.

The Court: All right. How much time do you want on that?

Mr. John Shafroth: Tuesday. Early next week.

Mr. Holland: Monday is all right.

The Court: Let's set it up for 9:30 Tuesday morning.

Now, I want you to understand what I am saying. I am not saying what penalty I will impose. All I am saying is that so far as I am concerned, the limit is the fifty thousand dollars rather than the five. I hope you understand that.

Mr. Morrison Shafroth: You are reserving the legal rights of the parties?

[Statement of Participation]

The Court: Oh, yes. If you want to argue that that is an illegal sentence, you know the authorities which I would suppose would permit you to go to the Court of Appeals.

There is one other thing I might as well mention now. One trouble with these pleas is that you don't have the advantage of a trial and get the participation of the various defendants. I can't see any good purpose, if these pleas are accepted, in referring the matter to the already overburdened Probation Department, and I was going to suggest to counsel on both sides if the pleas are accepted I would like the Government, on each of the individual defendants, to supply me with a short—and I emphasize short—statement as to their ideas as to participation, relative participation, or whatever you wish to call it. Would the Government be willing to do that?

Mr. Hunter: Yes, we would, Your Honor.

The Court: All right. That is another matter which you might mention when you talk to your principals. That is the reason I mention it now.

This matter will go over until 9:30 next Tuesday morning. That is February 19. Court will be in recess.

[¶ 68,714] Vincent W. Kosuga v. Jack H. Kelly.

In the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division. No. 56 C 1502. Dated April 24, 1957.

Illinois and Sherman Antitrust Acts

Combinations and Conspiracies Under Federal and State Antitrust Laws—Contract of Sale—Agreement Not To Sell Product on Futures Market—Legality.—A provision of a contract under which a seller of onions agreed, as a condition of the sale, to merchandise the remainder of his onions in normal trade channels and not to deliver them on the futures market during the remainder of the current onion season did not constitute an illegal restraint of trade proscribed by the Sherman Antitrust Act or the Illinois antitrust law. Deliveries on the futures market may have temporary price upsetting consequences which may interfere with the purchaser's efficient and profitable disposition of the onions which he had purchased. The condition imposed by the purchaser and agreed to by the seller was a reasonable restriction to assure the purchaser the enjoyment of the legitimate fruits of his contract of purchase and to protect him from a possible derogation in the value of the property bought.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.760, 2339.15.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Antitrust Law Violations as Defenses—Suit on Contract—Where Alleged Violation of Antitrust Laws Is Collateral to Right Sued Upon. —In an action by a seller to recover from the purchaser the balance due on a contract for the sale of 50 carloads of onions, the purchaser's affirmative defense that the seller could not recover because he had agreed not to deliver the remainder of his onions on the futures market in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act and the Illinois antitrust law was stricken on the ground that the defense, even if established, would not bar the seller's suit to recover the unpaid balance of the purchase price. The contract of purchase was complete in itself and contained reciprocal considerations moving between the parties. The seller's agreement not to sell on the futures market was not an inherent part of the sale which was sought to be enforced. A judgment, if rendered for the seller, would not afford judicial aid to the enforcement of an allegedly illegal condition. The contract of sale was not inherently illegal so as to bring it within the rule that the courts will not exert their powers to enforce illegal contracts. Furthermore, the federal law invoked provides various sanctions in the event of violation, and it does not make uncollectibility of the purchase price for goods sold one of those sanctions. Also, the seller's agreement, even if regarded as illegal, would not insulate the purchaser from the obligation of paying the contract price. The claimed illegal agreement could be separated from the lawful promise for a lawful consideration and the latter agreement enforced.

Memorandum Opinion on Motion to Strike Affirmative Defenses

[Defenses]

MICHAEL L. IGOE, District Judge [In full text]: Complaint was filed September 11, 1956 under Section 1332, Title 28 of the United States Code to recover the balance of $37,342.80 due on a contract for the sale of 50 carloads of onions. Defendant answered, setting up as Affirmative Defenses, alleged violation of the Illinois Antitrust Law, (Jones Ill. Stats. Ann. Secs. 15.62, 15.66 and 15.67), the Federal Antitrust Act, (15 USC Sec. 1) and the Commodity Exchange Act (7 USC Sec. 13), on the ground that in consideration for the purchase of these 50 cars of onions, plaintiff had agreed not to deliver the remainder of his onions on the futures market. This condition it is asserted had as its object the manipulation, stabilization and if possible increase in onion market prices.

[Violations of Contract]

Defendant further alleges that if the agreement is legal, then plaintiff was guilty of a breach by delivering onions on the futures market, by selling futures contracts and selling actual onions below established prices. Defendant, for these alleged breaches, counterclaims for $75,000.00.

[Motion To Strike]

Plaintiff filed a motion to strike the Affirmative Defenses based upon alleged violations of the antitrust laws and the Commodity Exchange Act, and a reply denying the alleged breaches asserted in the counterclaim.

[Contract of Sale]

Presented for our decision is the motion to strike the defendant's Affirmative Defenses. The facts as admitted by the pleadings are:

Plaintiff owned actual onions in Chicago and in the country. On December 17, 1955 defendant, as one of several individuals, purchased 50 carloads of such onions for $960.00 per car or a total of $48,000.00, plus storage charges. The purchase agreement provided for an initial payment of $300.00 per car, a second payment of $200.00 per car due January 10, 1956 and the balance of $460.00 per car plus storage due when defendant ordered the cars out of storage. As a condition to this purchase, plaintiff agreed not to deliver any of his remaining onions on the futures market for the remainder of the season, but instead to merchandise such onions in normal commercial trade channels.

Defendant paid $12,500.00 on account of his purchase, and from time to time withdrew from storage and utilized 13 carloads of onions, but failed to make payment therefor as required. Significantly, subsequent to the purchases, the market price of onions progressively declined.

Onions are a perishable commodity which can be stored only for a reasonable period. On February 16, 1956, plaintiff advised that the onions purchased were showing deterioration, and requested defendant to take the onions and make full payment thereon. Defendant refused to accept the onions at that time, but acknowledged the validity and enforceability of his purchase agreement.

[Repudiation of Contract]

On March 9, 1956 defendant repudiated the agreement claiming it was illegal in violation of antitrust laws and the Commodity Exchange Act. Plaintiff, after notice, sold the 37 cars of onions remaining from defendant's purchase, and credited defendant with the amount realized in mitigation of damages.

[Instant Action]

This is an action to enforce payment for onions sold to and received by defendant, at a price that is not objected to an unreasonable or excessive. The contract of purchase was complete in itself and contains reciprocal considerations moving between the parties. The condition of non-delivery which is asserted as a violation of the antitrust laws and the Commodity Exchange Act is not an inherent part of the sale which is here sought to be enforced. Plaintiff does not seek to enforce that provision. A judgment, if rendered for the plaintiff, would not afford judicial aid to the enforcement of an allegedly illegal condition. In the present posture, our decision on the motion to strike is governed by the principles announced in Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co., 184 U. S. 540, 551; D. R. Wilder Mfg. Co. v. Corn Products Refining Co., 236 U. S. 165 172-3, Small Co. v. Lamborn Co., 267 U. S. 238; and Bruce's Juices, Inc. v. American Can Co. [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,553], 330 U. S. 743.

[Controlling Rule]

In the Wilder case the Supreme Court upheld the rejection of a defense of alleged violation of the antitrust laws when asserted in an action to recover the price of goods sold. There the purchase agreement contained conditions allegedly restrictive of competition. The court expressed the rule controlling in this proceeding on pages 172 and 173 as follows:

> "* * * the sale and the obligations which arose from it depended upon a distinct contract, with reciprocal considerations moving between the parties,—the receipt of the goods on the one hand, and the payment of the price on the other. And this is but a form of stating the elementary proposition that courts may not refuse to enforce an otherwise legal contract because of some indirect benefit to a wrongdoer which would be afforded from doing so, or some remote aid to the accomplishment of a wrong which might possibly result * * *"
> "The case therefore reduces itself to the question whether the contract of sale was inherently illegal so as to bring it within the also elementary rule that courts will not exert their powers to enforce illegal contracts or to compel wrongdoing. The only suggestion as to the intrinsic illegality of the sale results from the averments of the answer as to the offer of a percentage of profits upon the condition of dealing exclusively with the refining company for the following year, and the clause to the effect that the goods were bought by the manufacturing company for its own use, and not for resale. But we can see no ground whatever for holding that the contract of sale was illegal because of these conditions."

[Antitrust Enforcement]

We are further impelled to our conclusion by the fact that the federal laws invoked provide various sanctions in the event of violation, but do not make uncollectibility of the purchase price for goods sold one of those sanctions. The remedies provided by the Federal Antitrust Acts or the Commodity Exchange Act are exclusive, and do not afford defendant the affirmative defense here asserted: D. R. Wilder Mfg. Co. v. Corn Products Ref. Co. supra, Bruce's Juices, Inc. v. American Can Co. supra.

[Provisions Separable]

Furthermore, the non-delivery condition if regarded as illegal, would not insulate defendant from the obligation of paying the agreed price for goods purchased and received. The illegal condition or covenant in such circumstances would be separated from the lawful promise for a lawful consideration and the latter agreement enforced: Cincinnati etc. Packet Co. v. Bay, 200 U. S. 179, U. S. Hoffman Machinery Corp. v. Valeteria Cleaners, Inc. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,452], 143 F. Supp. 797 (D. C. Minn.).

[Illinois Act]

What we have said concerning the defense based on alleged violation of the Federal Antitrust Acts serves also to dispose of the defense of alleged violations of the Illinois Antitrust Law—if that state act could be said to be applicable. Defendant asserts that the transactions involved are in interstate commerce and therefore the question naturally arises whether the state antitrust law is even applicable.

[No Illegal Restraint of Trade]

Plaintiff also seeks to strike the Affirmative Defenses as insufficient in law by asserting that the non-delivery condition is not an unlawful restraint of trade or manipulative device. Plaintiff agreed, as a condition to this sale of onions, to merchandise the remainder of his onions in normal trade channels and not to deliver them on the futures market during the remainder of the current onion season. Deliveries on futures market may have temporary price upsetting consequences which may interfere with defendant's efficient and profitable disposition of the onions he had purchased. The condition imposed by defendant and agreed to by plaintiff was a reasonable restriction to assure defendant the enjoyment of the legitimate fruits of his contract of purchase, and to protect him from a possible derogation in the value of the property bought. This condition does not constitute an illegal restraint of trade proscribed in the Federal or Illinois antitrust laws: U. S. v. Addyston Pipe & Steel Co., 85 Fed. 271 (CA 6) Cincinnati etc. Packet Co. v. Bay, supra, D. R. Wilder Mfg. Co. v. Corn Products Ref. Co. supra.

[No Violation of Commodity Act]

Nor is the non-delivery condition violative of the provisions in the Commodity Exchange Act against manipulation of markets and commodity prices. Manipulation as contemplated under that act may be defined as the creation of an artificial price by planned and deliberate action. The devices commonly employed to achieve manipulation are deceit, trickery through the spread of false market and economic rumors, concealment of market position, the violation of express anti-manipulative controls set forth in the Commodity Exchange Act, or other forms of fraud: General Foods Corp. v. Brannan, 170 F (2d) 220, 224, 231.

Defendant does not allege that the non-delivery condition was intended to achieve an artificial price or that plaintiff utilized or agreed to any manipulative device in the sale or merchandising of his onions. The Affirmative Defenses do not allege a manipulation as contemplated by and in violation of the Commodity Exchange Act.

Fifty carloads of onions were sold on December 17, 1955 on terms and conditions admitted by the pleadings. Defendant, however, seeks to avoid payment by the drastic step of asserting that he was a participant with the plaintiff in a market rigging operation. He is placed in a peculiar position by also asserting that plaintiff did not comply with the illegal conditions involved.

It is obvious that this position was in no small part conceived after declines in market prices, made the purchase of onions unattractive and unprofitable. We will not lend our aid to the creation of windfall profits as thus contemplated.

[Motion Granted]

We find the agreement of purchase and sale of fifty carloads of onions to be valid and binding, and the Affirmative Defenses asserted to be insufficient in law. The plaintiff's motion to strike is granted. An appropriate order will be entered.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. No. 198—October Term, 1956. Docket No. 24370. Argued December 4, 1956. Decided May 15, 1957.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, ALEXANDER BICKS, Judge.

McGuire Act and New York Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade—Advertising, Offering for Sale, and Selling Below Fair Trade Prices—Noncontracting Dealer—Sales from Non-Fair Trade Jurisdiction to Fair Trade Jurisdiction—Applicability of Federal and State Fair Trade Acts.—A mail order house located in the District of Columbia cannot be enjoined from advertising, offering for sale, or selling a fair trader's products in New York below fair trade prices established under the New York Fair Trade Act. Neither the McGuire Act nor the New York Fair Trade Act authorizes the enforcement of fair trade prices against a retailer making resales or located in a non-fair trade jurisdiction. The fact that the retailer's owner was located in New York was irrelevant, and the retailer will not be treated as a mere dummy corporation for its New York parent. Also, New York contracts of the retailer were irrelevant.

In this 2 to 1 decision, one majority judge ruled that the McGuire Act and the New York act were inapplicable since the resales of the fair traded products took place in the District of Columbia, a non-fair trade jurisdiction. The place of resale was considered to be the place where the title to the products passed. The other majority judge ruled that the retailer was located in the District of Columbia and therefore beyond the reach of the New York Fair Trade Act. The exemption provided in the McGuire Act can be availed of only by the state that the McGuire Act designated as the state of resale, that is, the state where the retailer is located.

Before: CLARK, Chief Judge, and LUMBARD and WATERMAN,[1] Circuit Judges.

Masters Mail Order Company of Washington, D. C., Inc., appeals from an order, D. C. S. D. N. Y. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,503], 145 F. Supp. 57, under the New York Fair Trade (Feld-Crawford) Act, N. Y. General Business Law §§ 369-a to 369-e, enjoining it from selling, offering to sell, or advertising in New York certain trademarked appliances manufactured by General Electric Company at prices below those specified in the latter's resale price maintenance agreements with New York retailers. Reversed and action dismissed.

[Fair Trade Injunction]

CLARK, Chief Judge [In full text]: This is an appeal from a decision, D. C. S. D. N. Y. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,503], 145 F. Supp. 57, enjoining a mail order discount house in the District of Columbia from advertising, offering for sale, or selling plaintiff-manufacturer's products in New York below New York "fair trade" prices.[2] The action was brought under the New York Fair Trade (Feld-Crawford) Act, N. Y. General Business Law §§ 369-a to 369-e, and our jurisdiction rests on the diversity of citizenship of the parties. All the facts were stipulated in advance of trial.

[Parties]

Since the passage of the McGuire Act, 66 Stat. 632, 15 U. S. C. § 45(a)(1)-(5), the plaintiff, General Electric Company, has entered into numerous fair trade agreements with retailers in New York and other states and has systematically given notice of the agreements and the uniform minimum resale prices in effect to the 175,000 known retailers of its products. It has vigorously enforced the agreements, by lawsuits when necessary. The defendant is a retail store in the District of Columbia which sells General Electric appliances both over the counter and by mail order. Two-thirds of its sales are over the counter. It is a wholly owned subsidiary of Masters, Inc., a New York retail corporation, and has been controlled and closely supervised by the parent corporation at all relevant times. The parent is not a party here. In 1952 the parent was enjoined from violating the plaintiff's fair trade contracts and the following year it was twice fined for violating the injunction. That year the defendant was organized in Maryland and the following year its place of business was moved to the District of Columbia, where there are no fair trade laws. The last move was intended to permit the defendant to sell General Electric appliances to customers in fair trade states below fair trade prices by direct mail order, the defendant having been advised that such sales would be legal.

[Mail Order Sales]

Defendant has shipped General Electric appliances from its store to consumers in New York at prices below those set by the plaintiff with its signatory retailers. These sales were pursuant to orders received in the District of Columbia on order forms marked, "THIS ORDER IS SUBJECT TO ACCEPTANCE BY MASTERS MAIL ORDER COMPANY IN WASHINGTON, D. C." and "NO CHARGE FOR SHIPPING." Some of the orders were filled on a C.O.D. basis, but the great majority were filled pursuant to orders which were accompanied by prepayment of the purchase price. Each order blank bore the notation "SOLD TO" immediately preceding the purchaser's name, and as one of the terms it announced that the purchaser could return the article purchased for refund or exchange within thirty days of receipt by returning the article in its original condition and carton. In approximately five cases defendant refunded the purchase price upon the customer's return of the merchandise.

The order blanks were distributed by both the defendant in Washington and its parent, which kept them behind the appliance counter at its place of business in New York for distribution to New York customers who sought them or tried to buy General Electric appliances for less than fair trade prices. To mail requests for appliances below fair trade prices the New York parent store replied that the items could be purchased from the Washington subsidiary, and it enclosed copies of the mail order form of the defendant. Copies of the defendant's catalogue were printed by the parent in New York and sent to the defendant in the District of Columbia, whence they were mailed to prospective customers in fair trade states. And the parent distributed other advertising material concerning the defendant's bargains directly to New York consumers in New York. The appliances sold by the defendant were acquired in part from the parent in New York and in part through purchase from distributors located in the District of Columbia, including a division of General Electric Supply Company, a wholly-owned subsidiary of the plaintiff, which is one of seven franchised General Electric distributors in the District of Columbia.

[Trial Court Ruling]

The district court, relying heavily on the circumstances surrounding the formation of the defendant and its close supervision by the New York parent, held that the defendant advertised, offered for sale, and sold GE appliances in New York below the fair trade prices; that this violated New York's Feld-Crawford Act; and that the Feld-Crawford Act was sanctioned by the McGuire Act. Judge Bicks' reasoned opinion, reported at [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,503] 145 F. Supp. 57-64, is a full exposition of the arguments available for plaintiff's position and for the rather far-reaching injunction he issued. He distinguished two earlier district court cases upholding the legality of the defendant's operations in another fair trade jurisdiction on the ground that there no sales had been made within a fair trade state. Bissell Carpet Sweeper Co. v. Masters Mail Order Co. of Washington, D. C., D. C. D. Md. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,326], 140 F. Supp. 165, subsequently affirmed, 4 Cir. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,603], 240 F. 2d 684; Revere Camera Co. v. Masters Mail Order Co. of Washington, D. C., D. C. D. Md. [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,981], 128 F. Supp. 457. But we are constrained to agree with these decisions, which we think are not properly to be distinguished.

[McGuire Act]

Our first question is whether the Feld-Crawford Act, so applied, conflicts with the Sherman Antitrust Law's ban on enforcement of resale price maintenance agreements as to goods moving in interstate commerce. Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co., 220 U. S. 373. Although the McGuire Act carves some exceptions to this long-standing national policy against restraints on trade, we are "bound to construe them strictly, since resale price maintenance is a privilege restrictive of a free economy." United States v. McKesson & Robbins, Inc. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,368], 351 U. S. 305, 316.

Subsections (a)(2) and (3) of § 2 of the McGuire Act, 15 U. S. C. § 45(a)(2) and (3), are printed in the margin.[3] The last part of subsection (a)(2) restricts the exception for resale maintenance contracts to contracts governing resales in jurisdictions that have adopted "fair trade" as a policy. A contract made in a fair trade state, but governing a resale in a non-fair trade state, would be illegal by the terms of the subsection. Subsection (a)(3) creates an exception for enforcement actions only when the price-cutter is undercutting "prices prescribed in such contracts"—that is, the contracts described in the previous subsection. Therefore no enforcement action lies unless the resales in question occur in a fair trade state.

This was the construction given the statute by Judge Chesnut in Revere Camera Co. v. Masters Mail Order Co. of Washington, D. C., supra, D. C. D. Md. [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,981], 128 F. Supp. 457, 462, and by Judge R. Dorsey Watkins in Bissell Carpet Sweeper Co. v. Masters Mail Order Co. of Washington, D. C., supra, D. C. D. Md. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,326], 140 F. Supp. 165, 178; and see also the opinion of Judge Soper affirming the latter decision, 4 Cir. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,603], 240 F. 2d 684. This construction is supported by the legislative history of the McGuire Act, carefully detailed in these opinions.

Plaintiff protests that our reading of the statute will allow the District of Columbia to impose its policies on economic activities in New York. But the opposite construction will simply allow New York to dominate the economic activities of the District of Columbia (and other like free trade areas). Since Congress has left the regulation of this part of interstate commerce to the option of the individual states, it is inevitable that when a single transaction affects states with conflicting policies one state or the other must see its policies slighted. We have no clearer guide in choosing the dominant state than the language of the statute itself. The trial judge attempted to weigh the defendant's contacts in New York against its contacts in the District, but this approach has no warrant in the congressional language or legislative history.[4]

[3] "§ 45. Unfair methods of competition unlawful; prevention by Commission

"(2) Nothing contained in this section or in any of the Antitrust Acts shall render unlawful any contracts or agreements prescribing minimum or stipulated prices, or requiring a vendee to enter into contracts or agreements prescribing minimum or stipulated prices, for the resale of a commodity which bears, or the label or container of which bears, the trademark, brand, or name of the producer or distributor of such commodity and which is in free and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced or distributed by others, when contracts or agreements of that description are lawful as applied to intrastate transactions under any statute, law, or public policy now or hereafter in effect in any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia in which such resale is to be made, or to which the commodity is to be transported for such resale.

"(3) Nothing contained in this section or in any of the Antitrust Acts shall render unlawful the exercise or the enforcement of any right or right of action created by any statute, law, or public policy now or hereafter in effect in any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, which in substance provides that willfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale, or selling any commodity at less than the price or prices prescribed in such contracts or agreements whether the person so advertising, offering for sale, or selling is or is not a party to such a contract or agreement, is unfair competition and is actionable at the suit of any person damaged thereby."

[4] Its weakness from a realistic point of view is highlighted by the fact that here more than two-thirds of defendant's sales were made over the counter in its extensive three-story store in the District, while the remaining or mail-order sales were by no means limited to New York customers; witness the two federal cases in Maryland that we have cited which also involve this defendant.

From all that appears Congress was concerned with the place where resales occurred, rather than the place where the retailer's owner resided and exercised supervision over operations.

Nor do we think that advertisements and offers to sell are to be treated differently from sales themselves. The critical question is still the place of resale, and no enforcement action may be brought for advertising or offering goods for sale below the fair trade prices unless the ad or offer contemplated resales in a fair trade jurisdiction. There is a practical advantage to having all three stages of the seamless process of merchandising governed by the same law, and the wording of the McGuire Act suggests that the three are to be handled together. This was the conclusion of Judge Watkins in Bissell Carpet Sweeper Co. v. Masters Mail Order Co. of Washington, D. C., supra, D. C. D. Md. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,326], 140 F. Supp. 165, affirmed 4 Cir. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,603], 240 F. 2d 684, noted in 57 Col. L. Rev. 292; and we are in entire agreement with his comprehensive opinion. Hence an enforcement action under the New York statute is valid only if the resales occurred in New York.

[Place of Resale]

The parties disagree as to whether the defendant's order blanks were offers or only advertisements soliciting offers. Plaintiff views them as offers which were accepted when consumers in New York signed them and put them in the mail. Defendant contends that the consumers' actions were the real offers which the defendant accepted in the District. We need not resolve the dispute, since Judge Waterman and I are agreed that the place where the contract was made is not controlling. In my view the place where title passed is critical.

The intent of the parties governs the passage of title between them, although statutes and case law provide guides for ascertaining such intent. Here the predominant interest of both the seller and buyers was to take advantage of the absence of resale price maintenance legislation in the District of Columbia. The defendant's history and operations testify to its concern, and its various pieces of advertising brought home the same desire to New York consumers. For example, one of its order blanks announced "discounts on all the 'fair-traded' brands of merchandise that are being sold only at list price in 45 states." Since the parties had the power to determine for themselves where title would pass, they indubitably selected the District of Columbia, where their agreements would be enforceable, rather than New York, where they would not.

Where there is no contrary evidence, the fact that the seller pays the carrier suggests that title is intended to pass when the carrier delivers the goods to the buyer, Uniform Sales Act § 19, Rule 5; but only slight evidence of a contrary intent rebuts the presumption of this rule. Williston, Sales § 279b (Rev. Ed. 1948). Here the cost of transportation was being passed on to the mail order consumer in any event, so that little is to be inferred from the fact that the seller's catalogue price included the cost of transportation, instead of treating it as a separate item which the customer must also prepay. The customer's prepayment of the price is more evidence that title passed before the buyer received the goods, Madeirense Do Brasil S/A v. Stulman-Emrick Lumber Co., 2 Cir., 147 F. 2d 399, 402, certiorari denied 325 U. S. 861, and the vast bulk of mail order sales were thus prepaid.

But even the C.O.D. sales were made in the District of Columbia, we feel. C.O.D. customers, as well as customers who prepaid, placed their orders on blanks which proclaimed the advantages of sales in the District of Columbia; and they, too, if asked, would have expressed a desire to pass title in a place where it was legal. Nor would the defendant be prejudiced by passing title before payment, for it could retain a seller's lien, entitling it to keep possession of the goods until paid. See Ponder v. Beeler Motor Co., 186 Okla. 88, 96 P. 2d 65. Defendant's failure to pay the District of Columbia sales tax is irrelevant to the intent of the parties, since this fact was never communicated to purchasers. Under the defendant's arrangement for doing business, title passed in the District of Columbia. Revere Camera Co. v. Masters Mail Order Co. of Washington, D. C., supra, D. C. D. Md. [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,981], 128 F. Supp. 457, 462; Bissell Carpet Sweeper Co. v. Masters Mail Order Co. of Washington, D. C., supra, D. C. D. Md. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,326], 140 F. Supp. 165, 174, affirmed 4 Cir. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,603], 240 F. 2d 684.

[New York Act]

Quite apart from the McGuire Act, the same result is compelled by New York law. Sec. 369-b of New York's Feld-Crawford Act, N. Y. General Business Law,[5] cannot be distinguished from the Maryland Fair Trade Act, which the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit recently construed. Bissell Carpet Sweeper Co. v. Masters Mail Order Co. of Washington, D. C., supra, 4 Cir. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,603], 240 F. 2d 684. A unanimous court of appeals agreed with the two district judges earlier construing the Act that it covered only those advertisements and offers which referred to resales in Maryland. This narrow construction was adopted because the statute was in derogation of the common law and imposed a burden on interstate commerce—considerations which would weigh heavily with New York courts, as well, e.g., General Electric Co. v. R. H. Macy & Co. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,764], 199 Misc. 87, 95-96, 103 N. Y. S. 2d 440, 449, appeal dismissed 278 App. Div. 939, 105 N. Y. S. 2d 1003.

Moreover, it seems apparent that New York would apply the substantive law of the District of Columbia to the facts of this case. Whether it regarded the place where title passes as critical (to keep the Feld-Crawford Act consistent with the McGuire Act) or saw the retailer's location as controlling, the result would be the same here. In an action for unfair competition by a manufacturer against a New York retailer engaged in direct mail sales of fair trade items to out-of-state consumers the New York courts have applied New York law without discussing our present problem. Raxor Corp. v. Goody, Sup. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,462], 121 N. Y. S. 2d 882, affirmed 282 App. Div. 921, 125 N. Y. S 2d 643, affirmed [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,776] 307 N. Y. 229, 120 N. E. 2d 802, certiorari denied Goody v. Raxor Corp., 348 U. S. 863. The instant case is almost identical except that the retail store is located in the District of Columbia; and there is no reason to suspect that the New York courts, which have been scrupulous to apply principles of comity, would adopt a different conflicts rule here merely in order to govern all multi-state transactions by New York law, e.g., People ex rel. Kirkman v. Van Amringe, 266 N. Y. 277, 194 N. E. 754; Van Voorhis v. Brintnall, 86 N. Y. 18, 40 Am. Rep. 505. The fact that the defendant's owner is located in New York is as irrelevant under the Feld-Crawford Act as under the McGuire Act; the state judges will not distinguish between two mail order houses located in the District of Columbia solely because the owner of one resided in New York and the owner of the other lived in Florida.[6] That construction would invite serious enforcement problems, since service of process on the Florida owner cannot be made in New York on the mere fact of advertisement in New York; and the courts of Florida might refuse to entertain actions for unfair competition under the Feld-Crawford Act on grounds of public policy. See Note, 57 Col. L. Rev. 292, 296.

[Title Approach]

My brother Waterman criticizes use of the concept of title in determining the place of "resale" and suggests that we look instead to the situs of the retailer. The title approach seems required by the congressional language and the case law; in reality it adds precision to the statutory term by drawing upon precedents from the law of sales, e.g., Bissell Carpet Sweeper Co. v. Masters Mail Order Co. v. Washington, D. C., supra, D. C. D. Md. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,326], 140 F. Supp. 165, 172, note 12, where Judge Watkins relied on a state case involving passage of title in finding that the defendant's resales are made in the District of Columbia. I see no difficulty with this construction, but am convinced that the novel retailer-situs rule would introduce much uncertainty into the law. For example, it would be difficult to know how much paraphernalia a seller must have in a state to be "located" there. Similarly, it would be hard to fix the "location" of a large mail order house which has numerous warehouses

[5] "§ 369-b. Unfair competition defined and made actionable

"Wilfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale or selling any commodity at less than the price stipulated in any contract entered into pursuant to the provision of section three hundred sixty-nine-a, whether the person so advertising, offering for sale or selling is or is not a party to such contract, is unfair competition and is actionable at the suit of any person damaged thereby."

and retail outlets in both free trade and fair trade states.

The criticisms of the construction here employed are two: that it facilitates evasion of fair trade regulation and that it may create inconsistencies between the McGuire Act and the state fair trade laws. Obviously some manipulation is possible under both approaches. The one here adopted would permit no more latitude than the familiar doctrine that parties to a multi-state contract can agree as to which state's law will govern, provided the state selected has a direct and substantial relation to the transaction. Seeman v. Philadelphia Warehouse Co., 274 U. S. 403; 6 Corbin on Contracts § 1509 (1951). Of course the parties, under well recognized principles set forth in more detail in the footnote, are limited in their choice of law as to the passage of title, and cannot elect to be governed by the law of some jurisdiction with which they have no connection.[7] Consequently any fear that New York retailers and consumers can subject local sales to foreign fair trade laws is groundless. Inasmuch as Judge Watkins has already read the title concept into the federal and Maryland statutes in Bissell Carpet Sweeper Co. v. Masters Mail Order Co. of Washington, D. C., supra, D. C. D. Md. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,326], 140 F. Supp. 165, and the only possibly contrary authority is Raxor Corp. v. Goody, supra, where the law of the forum was applied without discussion, it seems most likely that uniformity will come about as the state courts read the title concept into their statutes to make them agree with the federal act from which their validity is derived. Congressional disapproval of Sunbeam Corp. v. Wentling, 3 Cir. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,739], 185 F. 2d 903, vacated [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,840] 341 U. S. 944, does not bear on the present controversy nor does it lend support to the retailer-situs construction.

[Reversed]

Because Judge Frank died before casting his final vote, his views on this case are not official; but it is reassuring that his memorandum and tentative vote agreed so closely with the views I have expressed in calling for reversal on both state and federal grounds and in suggesting that we might reverse on the "persuasive and exhaustive" district court opinions in Bissell Carpet Sweeper Co. v. Masters Mail Order Co. of Washington, D. C., supra, D. C. D. Md. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,326], 140 F. Supp. 165, and Revere Camera Co. v. Masters Mail Order Co. of Washington, D. C., supra, D. C. D. Md. [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,981], 128 F. Supp. 457. In accordance with these views the order of injunction must be reversed and the action must be dismissed on the merits.

[Concurring Opinion]

[Agree on Reversal]

WATERMAN, Circuit Judge (concurring): I concur in the result reached by Judge Clark. With him I hold that New York's Feld-Crawford Act is unenforceable against Masters Mail Order Company of Washington, D. C., Inc., the defendant here. Masters is located in the District of Columbia where there is no resale price maintenance statute, law, or public policy. The prices Masters receives for goods sold by it to New York purchasers, being goods shipped in interstate commerce, are, I believe, governed by the public policy of the District of Columbia, the state where Masters is located. That policy permits free-pricing. The public policy of New York that restrains free-pricing in favor of agreements of resale price maintenance I hold is inapplicable to retail transactions of sale made in interstate commerce by this District of Columbia retailer; for I believe that for the purpose of the McGuire Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 45(a) (1952), all such sales take place in the District of Columbia. I reach this conclusion from my reading of the McGuire Act and my understanding of the intent of Congress in passing that legislation. Hence, although Judge Clark and I agree in reversing the lower court, I differ somewhat from him in reaching that decision.

[McGuire Act]

In enacting the McGuire Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 45(a) (1952), the Congress indicated its intention to leave the adoption or rejection of resale price maintenance to the individual states. The states' rights basis of this legislation clearly appears in the preamble of the Act:

> "That it is the purpose of this Act to protect the rights of States under the United States Constitution to regulate their internal affairs and more particularly to enact statutes and laws, and to adopt policies, which authorize contracts and agreements prescribing minimum or stipulated prices for the resale of commodities and to extend the minimum or stipulated prices prescribed by such contracts and agreements to persons who are not parties thereto. It is the further purpose of this Act to permit such statutes, laws, and public policies to apply to commodities, contracts, agreements, and activities in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce."

To carry out this purpose, the McGuire Act provides that the applicable state law shall be that "* * * in effect in any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia in which such resale is to be made * * *" I think we must interpret this language in a way that will most effectively implement the intent of Congress to permit the individual states to adopt or reject "fair-trade" laws and then to enforce those laws in the event of their adoption. We should not interpret the language to permit the policy of more than one state to affect the transaction of sale; or to permit parties to the sale to "contract out" of the applicable state law or to "pick a state law" to suit their convenience. Since the place of resale is not defined by the Act, if we construe that phrase to mean the place where the seller of the goods is located, we obtain the certainty we seek consistent with the intent of Congress to preserve the rights of individual states to regulate in this field, and we do so by an interpretation clearly reasonable from the language of the Act.

[Proposed Amendment]

I find support for my position in the legislative history of the McGuire Act. During the debates in Congress preceding its enactment, Congressman Cole of Kansas offered an amendment allegedly designed to protect retailers located in fair-trade states from competition from outside those states, and to prevent "raids on the part of mail order houses and cut rate retailers and wholesalers in non-fair-trade states." 98 Cong. Rec. 4952 (1952). That amendment, insofar as here relevant, provided:

> "Whenever by contract or agreement described in subsection (2) a stipulated or minimum resale price may be established for a commodity in any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, where such a contract or agreement is lawful, it shall be an act of unfair competition, actionable at the suit of any person damaged thereby, to wilfully and knowingly, in interstate commerce (1) sell or (2) have transported for sale or resale or (3) deliver pursuant to a sale, or otherwise deliver, such commodity in any such State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, where such a contract or agreement is lawful, at less than the price or prices so established in such contract or agreement." 98 Cong. Rec. 4952 (1952) (Emphasis added.)

This amendment was vigorously opposed by Congressman Patman of Texas, who pointed out that a retailer located in a free-pricing jurisdiction like Texas would be prevented from selling to nearby customers who resided in a fair-trade state at less than the fair-trade prices maintained in the latter jurisdiction. 98 Cong. Rec. 4953 (1952). Such interference with the pricing policy of a retailer located in a free-pricing jurisdiction would be "entirely contrary to the [States' right] concept we have in advocating the McGuire bill." The Cole Amendment, he pointed out, would place "a burden upon the merchants in those States where they have no fair-trade law."

The Cole Amendment was rejected by the House of Representatives, which passed the McGuire Act in its present form. 98 Cong. Rec. 4956 (1952). However, in addition to criticism such as that of Congressman Patman, many Congressmen apparently opposed the Cole Amendment because it created a federal cause of action. See, e.g., remarks of Congressman Harris, of Arkansas, 98 Cong. Rec. 4954 (1952). Hence the defeat of that Amendment can be explained on several grounds. Nevertheless, the absence of the controversial phrase, "(3) deliver pursuant to a sale, or otherwise deliver," quoted above, is support for my belief that the Congress intended that a retailer should be governed only by the fair-trade law of the jurisdiction in which he is located.[1]

[Supporting Court Decisions]

I also find authority for my position in court decisions. Prior to the passage of the McGuire Act, the Third Circuit had held that a resale by a retail mail order house located in Pennsylvania was not exempt from the Sherman Act, and therefore not within the reach of the Pennsylvania fair-trade law, if the resale was to a customer residing outside Pennsylvania. Sunbeam Corp. v. Wentling [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,739], 185 F. 2d 903 (3rd Cir. 1950). When Congress created the McGuire Act, it indicated that one of its express purposes was to "overrule" the Wentling decision, and to permit the individual states to apply their fair-trade laws to interstate shipments such as those involved in Wentling. See H. R. Rep. 1437, 82d Cong., 2d Sess. 6 (1952). And subsequent to the passage of the McGuire Act several courts have held that interstate shipments are within the reach of the fair-trade law of the state where the seller is located, thereby implying that the resale contemplated by the McGuire Act takes place in that state. See, e.g., General Electric Co. v. Masters, Inc. (Raxor Corp. v. Goody) [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,776], 307 N. Y. 229, 120 N. E. 2d 802 (1954); cert. denied, 348 U. S. 863; Sunbeam Corp. v. MacMillan [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,451], 110 F. Supp. 836 (D. Md. 1953).

To also permit the state of ultimate destination where the consumer resides to apply its fair-trade law to such interstate transactions as those now before us would logically require a holding that under the McGuire Act a resale can take place in two jurisdictions. It is my belief that the Congress did not intend that New York State can enforce its Feld-Crawford Act both against resident sellers, as has been done in Raxor Corp. v. Goody, and also against a nonresident seller as by the decision below. For such an anomalous result I find no authority in the language or history of the McGuire Act. In fact, its somewhat equivocal legislative history tends to support the opposite conclusion, that the seller is subject to the applicable law of but one state. See 98 Cong. Rec. 4952-54 (1952); Revere Camera Co. v. Masters Mail Order Co. [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,981], 128 F. Supp. 457, 463 (D. Md. 1955); Bissell Carpet Sweeper Co. v. Masters Mail Order Co. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,326], 140 F. Supp. 165, 170-78 (D. Md. 1956), aff'd [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,603], 240 F. 2d 684 (4th Cir. 1957).

[State Fair Trade Act]

In view of my understanding of the McGuire Act, I do not find that the New York Feld-Crawford Act has any applicability to the situation before us here. Congress, in passing the McGuire Act, exempted resale price maintenance agreements from the coverage of the federal antitrust laws by permitting the individual states to enact fair-trade legislation. But that exemption can be availed of only by the state that the McGuire Act designates as the state of resale, i.e., the state where the retailer is located. Hence the New York Feld-Crawford Act, in my judgment, cannot be enforced against this defendant, located in the District of Columbia, on the facts in this case; and, as pointed out by Judge Clark, the fact that the defendant is owned by a resident of New York State does not make that Act any more applicable to it than if the defendant were owned by a resident of some other state.

[Summary of Views]

And I agree with Judge Clark that the New York contacts of the defendant stressed by the trial court also are irrelevant to our problem of construing the McGuire Act. Nor do I see any reason for treating the defendant as a mere dummy corporation for its New York parent. The defendant conducts an extensive retail business in Washington and must be regarded as a separate corporate entity selling the plaintiff's merchandise in that jurisdiction.

[1] This phrase was separable from the provisions of the Cole Amendment providing for a federal cause of action. Being so separable, it could easily have been inserted in the McGuire Act which leaves enforcement to the several states. It is a fair conclusion, therefore, that in situations where the transaction is in interstate commerce Congress did not intend to permit the state in which the goods are delivered to be able to enforce its local resale price maintenance statute.

Judge Clark interprets the language of the McGuire Act to make the resale price maintenance statute, if any, of the state where the title passes to goods sold in interstate commerce the only state statute applicable to the transaction. Such an interpretation of that Act permits sellers and buyers to "pick their own law," despite the law of the state where one or both of them may be located.

Clearly a sale or contract of sale can be made in one place and passage of title to the goods being sold may occur elsewhere. Moreover, the place where, or the time when, the title passes can be arranged at the will of the parties. Thus under the approach adopted by Judge Clark it would be possible, despite Raxor v. Goody, supra, for a seller located in a fair-trade jurisdiction to avoid the application of the fair-trade law of that state by arranging for title to pass in a non-fair-trade jurisdiction where the buyer was located. Or by agreement of the parties, even though both seller and buyer reside in the same or in different fair-trade jurisdictions, title to the goods being sold can be arranged to pass in a free pricing jurisdiction if the jurisdiction chosen has a direct and substantial relation to the transaction.

Judge Clark would point out that if my interpretation of the McGuire Act is adopted it will be difficult in future cases "to know how much paraphernalia a seller must have in a state to be 'located' there." Surely, realistic criteria for determining the location of a retailer will logically develop as the future cases may require that development. I would here hold only that this defendant-retailer is located within the District of Columbia and therefore beyond the reach of the fair trade law of New York. That is the issue before us to decide.

[Dissenting Opinion]

[Injunction Proper]

LUMBARD, Circuit Judge (dissenting):

I dissent for the reasons so well stated by Judge Bicks below, [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,503] 145 F. Supp. 57 (S. D. N. Y. 1956). The sales complained of took place in New York and New York may prohibit them. Accordingly the district court had the power and the duty to enjoin these New York sales, offers to sell and advertising.

[Evasion of State Law]

Masters, Inc. of New York has frequently been before the New York courts for violation of the Feld-Crawford Act. In 1952, Masters, Inc. was enjoined from selling General Electric appliances below fair-traded prices [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,382], 122 N. Y. S. 2d 14 (Sup. Ct. N. Y. 1952), and in 1953 was fined twice for violating the injunction. Not long thereafter, it set up in the District of Columbia (the nearest Metropolitan area without Fair Trade laws) a store which was separately incorporated, although wholly owned and controlled by Masters, Inc.

Despite the formal corporate separation, Masters, Inc. used the facilities of both the New York and Washington stores to exploit the New York market.[1] Thus, Masters, Inc. widely advertised that although it could not sell General Electric appliances at its New York store, it could and would sell them by mail order from Washington, D. C. When customers sought to buy the appliance at the New York store, they were again informed that the appliances could be obtained at the Washington store and order blanks were provided in New York; moreover the advertising mailed by Masters Mail Order of Washington, D. C., although posted in Washington, was prepared in New York from the mailing lists and other facilities of the New York office.

It seems to me that it would be difficult to imagine a clearer case of evasion of the New York law. Regardless of how we ought to treat the wholly independent out-of-state mail order house, it seems to me, with all due deference to my brethren, that that is not the case before us. Insofar as the sales in question are concerned, the many contacts with New York establish that for all practical purposes the Masters organization is in the same position as a New York seller with an out-of-state warehouse and office staff. If we ignore that, and look only to such easily arranged formalities as separate incorporation, title passage and where the article is mailed, we merely facilitate the emasculation of fair trade by any discount house large enough to be able to afford such arrangements.[2] These formalities may be material in other contexts, but they should not be given controlling significance here.

[1] Masters Mail Order of Washington, D. C. did most of its business in across the counter sales, but I think that that is immaterial to the issues before us since our concern is only with the substantial mail-order sales to the New York market.

[Congressional Policy]

We must not forget that Congress has twice indicated—the second time despite strong opposition—that the states are to be allowed to prevent price-competition among those selling branded products in the home market. See H. R. Rep. No. 1516, 82d Cong. 2d Sess. (1952). This was to avoid damage to the good will of the manufacturer in the eyes of local consumers and to protect local small businessmen against the price-cutting powers of the large firms. See id. at 12, 10. The defendant's activities have frustrated and will continue to frustrate both purposes in the New York market unless they are enjoined.[3]

[2] Stress on title passage seems to me to be particularly unfortunate, for that would allow even a wholly in-state retailer to evade his state's fair trade law when selling to an out-of-state consumer by merely arranging that title pass in a free-trade state with some relevant contacts.

[3] Bissell Carpet Sweeper Co. v. Masters Mail Order Co. of Washington, D. C. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,326], 140 F. Supp. 165 (D. C. Md. 1956), aff'd [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,603] 240 F. 2d 684 (4 Cir. 1957) does not seem to me to be persuasive authority for a contrary result as to the McGuire Act since that dealt primarily with the Maryland statute. Nor is the decision of much assistance in construing the Feld-Crawford Act, for despite the similarity of language between the Maryland and New York acts, the New York legislature and the New York courts have already firmly indicated an intent to protect the home market as much as possible. See Raxor Corp. v. Goody [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,776], 307 N. Y. 229 (1954), cert. denied, 348 U. S. 863 (1954) and Eastman Kodak Co. v. Masters, Inc. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,351], 153 N. Y. S. 2d 433 (Sup. Ct. N. Y. 1956). Moreover, in Bissell we do not have the many contacts by the seller with the fair trade state which make the transactions before us sales in New York for all practical purposes.

Final Judgment

HERLANDS, District Judge [In full text]: The judgment of this Court entered June 6, 1955 dismissing the complaint in this action having been reversed by the United States Supreme Court on June 11, 1956, and that Court having remanded the action to this Court for further proceedings not inconsistent with its opinion; and the defendant without waiting for a further order of this Court having cancelled and terminated the resale price maintenance contracts covering its brand products which it had heretofore entered into with wholesalers;

In the Supreme Court of Indiana. November Term, 1956. No. 29,327. Filed May 22, 1957.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Marion County. Honorable HEZZIE B. PIKE, Judge.

Indiana Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade—Constitutionality of Indiana Fair Trade Act—Nonsigner Provision—Delegation of Legislative Power—Legislative Power To Fix Prices—Indiana Constitution. —The nonsigner provision of the Indiana Fair Trade Act was held unconstitutional on the ground that private persons are delegated the power to fix prices binding upon persons who have not signed fair trade contracts. The Indiana Constitution provides that the legislative authority of the State shall be vested in the Indiana General Assembly.

According to the majority opinion, in this 4 to 1 decision, "The General Assembly has no right to abdicate its legislative power to private persons, nor could it even delegate to a governmental agency the power to find what might be a reasonable price without proper safeguards and procedural due process."

However, according to a concurring opinion, in which two of the majority justices concurred, the legislature does not have the power to fix the prices at which general commodities of trade may be sold in Indiana, and, therefore, the legislature cannot lawfully delegate such authority to a governmental agency, even with proper "safeguards and procedural due process."

Also, it was stated in the majority opinion that "By the Fair Trade Act, the General Assembly has removed the ban of the common law, as well as the acts concerning restraints of trade and monopolies which prohibited vertical price fixing by agreements or contract[s] between buyers and sellers, but he who seeks to take advantage of the Fair Trade Act will have to base his action on a breach of his contract, or a breach of contract made for his benefit, or on a tortious inducement of a breach of such a contract."

EMMERT, Justice [In full text]: This is an appeal from a judgment entered for failure of appellant to amend and plead over after a demurrer had been sustained to its complaint.

Appellant, a Michigan corporation, alleged by its complaint it manufactured carpet sweepers, which had thereon its trade-mark "Bissell Carpet Sweeper Company," which were sold in open competition in Indiana "with merchandise in the same general class produced by others"; that appellee was engaged in the retail business in the city of Indianapolis; that appellant had entered into voluntary contracts with certain retailers including H. P. Wasson & Co., pursuant to the Indiana Fair Trade Act which established minimum prices for its carpet sweepers throughout the state; that the appellee did not execute any "such contract to establish such minimum resale prices," but that prior to the filing of the complaint appellant gave written notice to the appellee that such contracts were in existence, but that appellee wilfully and knowingly offered for sale and did sell the carpet sweepers at less than the minimum prices established by appellant's contract, and that the sale did not come within any of the exceptions provided for in § 5 of the Fair Trade Act. The demurrer for want of facts questioned the constitutional powers of the General Assembly to prohibit the appellee from selling Bissel Carpet Sweepers at less than the price established by the appellant with its contract retailers.

[Indiana Fair Trade Act]

The Fair Trade Act, Ch. 17 of the 1937 Acts (§ 66-301 to 66-309, Burns' 1951 Replacement), is limited to commodities using a trade-mark, brand or name, of a producer or distributor, and sold in free and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced or distributed by others. Section 66-302, Burns' 1951 Replacement, declares valid contracts between a seller and a buyer, or a series of contracts between successive sellers and buyers for sale at wholesale or retail, requiring the ultimate retailers to contract not to sell the commodities at less than the fair trade price established by the original seller. A could sell to B with B contracting he would not sell at retail below the price fixed by A, or with B contracting that if he sold to retailer C he would require of C a contract not to sell at retail below the price fixed by A, or if C sold to D for resale, he would require of D a similar provision for the benefit of A, who would fix the minimum retail price. Thus, the fair trade price required of the ultimate retailer could be established by contract, or a series of subsequent contracts for the benefit of the first seller establishing the fair trade price. The ultimate retailer would be bound because of his contract, and not because a statute said he should be bound when he did not consent.

[Sherman Act]

The price fixing authorized by this section is somewhat similar to the factual situation in Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Park & Sons Co. (1911), 220 U. S. 373, 31 S. Ct. 376, 55 L. Ed. 502. The Court, in an opinion by Mr. Justice Hughes, summarized the contracts by saying they provided "a system of interlocking restrictions by which the complainant seeks to control not merely the prices at which its agents may sell its products, but the prices for all sales by all dealers at wholesale or retail, whether purchasers or sub-purchasers, and thus to fix the amount which the consumer shall pay, eliminating all competition." (220 U. S. at 399.) The Court held the contracts were an invalid restraint of trade both at common law and under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act of July 2, 1890.

[State Power]

It is within the power of the General Assembly to change the common law rule in Indiana, and to except fair trade price fixing by contracts between buyers and sellers from the various provisions of the restraint of trade acts of this state.

[Schwegmann Decision]

The Miller-Tydings Act of 1937 (15 U. S. C. A. § 1) amended the Sherman Anti-Trust Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act to make lawful price fixing contracts in interstate commerce if they were lawful in intrastate commerce. In Schwegmann Bros. v. Calvert Distillers Corp. (1951) [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,823], 341 U. S. 384, 71 S. Ct. 745, 95 L. Ed. 1035, it was held price fixing by compulsion was not validated by the Act. The Court clearly noted the distinction by the following language:

> "* * * If a distributor and one or more retailers want to agree, combine, or conspire to fix a minimum price, they can do so if state law permits. Their contract, combination, or conspiracy—hitherto illegal—is made lawful. They can fix minimum prices pursuant to their contract or agreement with impunity. When they seek, however, to impose price fixing on persons who have not contracted or agreed to the scheme, the situation is vastly different. That is not price fixing by contract or agreement; that is price fixing by compulsion. That is not following the path of consensual agreement; that is re-

The appellant Bissell bases its cause of action on § 6 of the Fair Trade Act, which states:

> "Wilfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale or selling any commodity at less than the price stipulated in any contract entered into pursuant to the provisions of this act [§§ 66-301—66-309], whether the person so advertising, offering for sale or selling is or is not a party to such contract, is unfair competition and is actionable at the suit of any person damaged thereby." Section 66-306, Burns' 1951 Replacement [Acts 1937, ch. 17, § 6, p. 53].

The complaint specifically alleges the appellee Shane was not a party to any contract to fix the retail price. It fails to allege from whom Shane purchased the sweepers or when they were purchased. For all that was alleged, Shane could have purchased them in Michigan where fair trade price fixing is illegal. Shakespeare Co. v. Lippman's Tool Shop Sporting Goods Co. (1952) [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,303], 334 Mich. 109, 54 N. W. 2d 268; Argus Cameras v. Distributors (1955) [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,151], 343 Mich. 54, 72 N. W. 2d 152. Appellant's position is that wilfully and knowingly selling and offering for sale Bissell's sweepers at prices less than fixed by Bissel after notice of the contracts to which Shane was not a party entitled Bissel to relief.[2]

[Legislative Policy]

We are not at liberty to substitute our judgment for that of the General Assembly as to whether price fixing is good or bad for the economic life of the state. Conceivably, in a time of depression the benefits might outweigh the disadvantages, while the converse may be true in a time of prosperity or inflation. But the Indiana Constitution on separation of powers and the vesting of the right to enact laws in the General Assembly have the same meaning whatever may be the business or economic conditions of the State.

[Utility Rates]

The right to fix a utility rate, which is price fixing for the service, is a legislative act. State ex rel. Evansville etc. Lines v. Rawlings (1951), 229 Ind. 552, 99 N. E. 2d 597, and authorities therein cited. After the Legislature has enacted that the rates be just and reasonable, it can delegate to an administartive commission the duty of finding as a fact what charge would be just and reasonable, but the commission does not make a law. The law operates on the facts found by the commission under proper standards and after a hearing. The rate is legislative in character because it makes a rule for the future, and binds both the utility and the users of its services whether they consent or not. Prentis v. Atlantic Coast Line Co. (1908), 211 U. S. 210, 29 S. Ct. 67, 53 L. Ed. 150; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Railroad Comm. (1911), 175 Ind. 630, 643, 95 N. E. 364; In re Northwestern Indiana Tel. Co. (1930), 201 Ind. 667, 684, 171 N. E. 65. Both the Legislature and the commission exercise a sovereign power of government.

[Delegation of Legislative Authority]

A fortiori, § 66-306, Burns' 1951 Replacement, is broad enough to vest a legislative power to fix prices in private persons. But the Constitution says "The Legislative authority of the State shall be vested in the General Assembly . . ." Article 4, Section 1. The power to legislate or to exercise a legislative function cannot be delegated to a non-governmental agency or person. Tucker v. State (1941), 218 Ind. 614, 697, 698, 35 N. E. 2d 270.[3] Nor can

A. § 45, 1956 Supp.) made lawful in interstate commerce state fair trade price fixing imposed by state law on persons not parties to a contract if the restriction be valid under state law. See Resale Price Maintenance by Carl H. Fulda (1954), 21 U. of Chicago Law Rev. 175-211. For review of state decisions see Bates, Constitutionality of State Fair Trade Acts (1957), 32 Ind. L. "We will not sell sweepers bearing Bissell's trade-marked model names at less than the applicable Fair Trade minimum retail prices at the time of such sales. (See other side for present price list. Such Fair Trade minimum retail prices are subject to change by Bissell at its election). (This paragraph does not apply any place where Fair Trade agreements are not permitted by law.)

[3] ". . . but it is unthinkable that the Legislature may have discretion to vest a part of the sovereign power in some agency outside the government, as set up and established by the Constitution." Tucker v. State (1941), 218 Ind. 614, 697, 35 N. E. 2d 270.

the Legislature delegate its law making power to a governmental officer, board, bureau or commission. Langenberg v. Decker (1892), 131 Ind. 471, 479, 31 N. E. 190, 16 L. R. A. 108; Blue v. Beach (1900), 155 Ind. 121, 133, 56 N. E. 89, 50 L. R. A. 64; Sarlls, Clerk v. State ex rel. Trimble (1929), 201 Ind. 88, 110, 166 N. E. 270, 67 A. L. R. 718; Edwards v. Housing Authority of City of Muncie (1939), 215 Ind. 330, 339, 19 N. E. 2d 741; Financial Aid Corp. v. Wallace (1939), 216 Ind. 114, 120, 33 N. E. 2d 472; Hollingsworth v. State Board of Barber Examiners (1940), 217 Ind. 373, 377, 28 N. E. 2d 64; Town of Kirklin v. Everman (1940), 217 Ind. 683, 693, 29 N. E. 2d 206. We are not concerned with a statute which places upon an official a duty to execute a law made by the Legislature, or where the law fixes a reasonable and fair rate, price or charge and delegates to a governmental agency the power to find as a fact what is reasonable and fair under proper standards. See Albert v. Milk Control Board of Ind. (1936), 210 Ind. 283, 300, 200 N. E. 688.

Section 66-306, Burns' 1951 Replacement, goes far beyond the codes of fair competition authorized by the National Industrial Act of 1933 (15 U. S. C. 703). In Schechter Corp. v. United States (1935) [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,072], 295 U. S. 495, 55 S. Ct. 837, 79 L. Ed. 1570, 97 A. L. R. 947, a Code of Fair Competition for the Live Poultry Industry in the Metropolitan Area of New York was held unconstitutional because Congress could not abdicate its law making power to a trade association or to the President. No standards were prescribed for any trade, industry or activity. It laid down no rules for administrative fact finding. Mr. Justice Cardozo noted this was "delegation running riot." Section 6 of the Fair Trade Act has no requirement for any governmental action by any public officer to establish a coercive price binding on any seller covered by the act.

The decision in Old Dearborn Co. v. Seagram Corp. (1936) [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,141], 299 U. S. 183, 57 S. Ct. 139, 81 L. Ed. 109, 106 A. L. R. 1476, has been cited in other states for the proposition that fair trade acts do not attempt legislative price fixing by private persons. Section 1 of the Illinois Act was similar to § 2 of the Indiana Act and authorized parties to contract for vertical price fixing from the original seller to the ultimate retailer. Concerning this part of the Illinois Act the court said:

> "* * * It is clear that this section does not attempt to fix prices, nor does it delegate such power to private persons. It permits the designated private persons to contract with respect thereto. It contains no element of compulsion but simply legalizes their acts, leaving them free to enter into the authorized contract or not as they may see fit. Thus far, the act plainly is not open to objection; and none seems to be made." (299 U. S. at 192.)[4]

In the Dearborn Case, supra, the court carefully excluded any determination of the validity of the Illinois statute under the Fourteenth Amendment in a case where the retailer purchased the goods in ignorance of the fair trade contract.[5] From an examination of the facts as stated in this opinion, and the opinion by the Supreme Court of Illinois in Seagram Corp. v. Old Dearborn Co. (1936), 363 Ill. 610, 2 N. E. 2d 940, the retailer, the Old Dearborn Co., purchased

[4] The court recognized the general rule the owner of property has the right to sell it at a price he will accept.

"First. In respect of the due process of law clause, it is contended that the statute is a price-fixing law, which has the effect of denying to the owner of property the right to determine for himself the price at which he will sell. Appellants invoke the well-settled general principle that the right of the owner of property to fix the price at which he will sell it is an inherent attribute of the property itself, and as such is within the protection of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. Tyson & Brother v. Banton, 273 U. S. 418, 429; Wolff Co. v. Industrial Court, 262 U. S. 522, 537; Ribnik v. McBride, 277 U. S. 350; Williams v. Standard Oil Co., 278 U. S. 235; New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann, 285 U. S. 262. These cases hold that, with certain exceptions, which need not now be set forth, this right of the owner cannot be denied by legislative enactment fixing prices and compelling such owner to adhere to them. But the decisions referred to deal only with legislative price fixing. They constitute no authority for holding that prices in respect of 'identified' goods may not be fixed under legislative leave by contract between the parties. The Illinois Fair Trade Act does not infringe the doctrine of these cases." Old Dearborn Co. v. Seagram Corp. (1936) [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,141], 299 U. S. 183, 191, 192, 57 S. Ct. 139, 81 L. Ed. 109, 106 A. L. R. 1476.

[5] "We are not called upon to determine the case of one who has made his purchase in ignorance of the contractual restriction upon the selling price . . ." Old Dearborn Co. v. Seagram Corp. (1936) [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,141], 299 U. S. 183, 193, 57 S. Ct. 139, 81 L. Ed. 109, 106 A. L. R. 1476.

the whiskey from a wholesaler knowing the wholesaler was required to obtain fair trade contracts for its sales to retailers.[6] The Supreme Court said, "Here, the restriction, already imposed with the knowledge of appellants, ran with the acquisition and conditioned it." (299 U. S. at 194.) Although the opinion did not take note of it, the Old Dearborn Co., in fact was committing a tort by inducing a breach of a distributor's contract to Seagram Corp.[7] 4 Restatement, Torts § 766. See also Prosser, Handbook of the Law of Torts (1941), Ch. 20, § 104.

[Inducement To Breach Contract]

It is within the power of the Legislature to declare such inducement to breach a contract unfair competition and actionable. In so far as § 66-306, Burns' 1951 Replacement, authorizes this, it is constitutional. The duty breached was not one created by the legislative act of two parties to a contract fixing a price binding upon every retailer of the goods whether or not he knew he was inducing a breach of the contract, or whether or not he purchased the goods from one under no contract obligation to require a fair trade contract from the retailer. Under the particular facts in the Old Dearborn Co. case the court held the Old Dearborn Co. could not complain that the Fourteenth Amendment prohibited the injunction against it.

[Abdication of Power]

But in the appeal at bar the complaint and the contracts fail to show anything more than attempted legislative price fixing by a contract between the manufacturer and various retailers in the State of Indiana, with no allegation that the appellee Shane ever entered into a contract to sell the sweepers at fair trade prices, or that it induced the breach of contract between Bissell and another party, or that Shane did not acquire the goods in some state, such as Michigan, where such fair trade contracts are held in restraint of trade and void. The complaint rests upon the naked proposition that private parties by contract can make a law binding upon everyone who retails the goods manufactured by Bissell. It is urged that the Fair Trade Act does no more than give an additional property right in a trade-mark. But if this is to be done, it must be accomplished pursuant to the Indiana Constitution. The General Assembly has no right to abdicate its legislative power to private persons, nor could it even delegate to a governmental agency the power to find what might be a reasonable price without proper safeguards and procedural due process.[8]

[Title of Act]

It is not necessary here to decide what might be proper subjects for legislative price fixing under the Indiana Constitution. And in view of the reasoning of this opinion, it becomes unnecessary to determine whether the construction of § 6 of the Fair Trade Act (§ 66-306, Burns' 1951 Replacement) urged by Bissell would be without the title of the Act,[9] and therefore void under § 19 of Article 4 of the Indiana Constitution.[10]

[6] The contracts between Seagram and its distributors provided: "Third. Distributor will require from each Retailer to whom he may sell any such beverages a written agreement, upon forms furnished by the Owner [Seagram], that such Retailer in turn will not resell, advertise, or offer for sale the said beverages below minimum prices stipulated from time to time by Owner for resale thereof to Consumers." Printed Record, Sup. Ct. of U. S. pp. 18-19.

[8] "The vast expansion of this field of administrative regulation in response to the pressure of social needs is made possible under our system by adherence to the basic principles that the legislature shall appropriately determine the standards of administrative action and that in administrative proceedings of a quasi-judicial character the liberty and property of the citizen shall be protected by the rudimentary requirements of fair play. These demand 'a fair and open hearing,'—essential alike to the legal validity of the administrative regulation and to the maintenance of public confidence in the value and soundness of this important governmental process. Such a hearing has been described as an 'inexorable safeguard.'" Chief Justice Hughes in Morgan v. United States (1938), 304 U. S. 1, 14, 15, 58 S. Ct. 773, 775, 82 L. Ed. 1129, 1130, 1131.

[9] The title is: "An act to protect trade-mark owners, producers, distributors and the general public against injurious and uneconomic practices in the distribution of competitive commodities bearing a distinguishing trade-mark, brand or name, through the use of voluntary contracts establishing minimum resale prices and providing for refusal to sell unless such minimum resale prices are observed."

[10] "* * * But if any subject shall be embraced in an act, which shall not be expressed in the title, such act shall be void only as to so much thereof as shall not be expressed in the title." Section 19, Art. 4, Constitution of Indiana.

By the Fair Trade Act, the General Assembly has removed the ban of the common law, as well as the acts concerning restraints of trade and monopolies which prohibited vertical price fixing by agreements or contract between buyers and sellers, but he who seeks to take advantage of the Fair Trade Act will have to base his action on a breach of his contract, or a breach of contract made for his benefit, or on a tortious inducement of a breach of such a contract. This the complaint did not do, and the demurrer was properly sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

BOBBITT, J. concurs specially with separate opinion in which ACHOR, C. J., and ARTERBURN, J., concur.

LANDIS, J., dissents with opinion.

Opinion Concurring in Part

[Delegation of Power—Right To Fix Prices]

BOBBITT, Justice.

I concur in the result of Judge Emmert's opinion and with his reasoning as it pertains to the fixing of prices by contract between buyers and sellers who are parties to such contracts.

However, I do not concur in his reasoning pertaining to certain provisions of Section 6 of the Fair Trade Act.

The following statement appears in Judge Emmert's opinion:

> "The General Assembly has no right to abdicate its legislative power to private persons, nor could it even delegate to a governmental agency the power to find what might be a reasonable price without proper safeguards and procedural due process."

I do not want to be understood as concurring in, or lending any support to, the inference which must, in my opinion, necessarily be drawn from this language, that the Legislature has the power to delegate to a State Agency, Board or Commission, the authority to fix the price of carpet sweepers or any other commodity of trade or commerce on the open market.

In my opinion the Legislature does not have the power to fix the price at which carpet sweepers may be sold in Indiana, and it must follow that it cannot lawfully delegate such authority to a governmental agency, even with proper "safeguards and procedural due process." Dept. of Financial Institutions v. Holt, etc. (1952), 231 Ind. 293, 303-304, 108 N. E. 2d 629.

It is, of course, true, as stated in the opinion, that the fixing of a utility rate is a legislative act; and that the Legislature can, and does, delegate to an administrative commission the authority to fix public utility rates within the bounds of certain standards set by the Legislature. However, it does not follow that the source of such power also furnishes the authority to fix standards for, and delegate to, an administrative commission the authority to fix prices for general commodities of trade and commerce.

The Legislature derives its power to fix and regulate utility rates from the fact that such businesses are affected with a public interest and their property is devoted to public use. Such power is inherent in the State and is an attribute of sovereignty, having its origin in the police power.

The supervision and regulation of public utilities by the Legislature is designed to supply the missing element of competition which protects the public from excessive charges in competitive businesses. Public Service Commission v. Indiana Bell Telephone Co. (1955), 235 Ind. 1, 130 N. E. 2d 467, 481. Such reason for supervision and regulation (price fixing) is not present where there is open competition in a business such as the manufacture and sale of carpet sweepers.

The right of an individual to engage in a lawful business and to fix the price at which he disposes of his own property is a part of his inalienable right to "liberty and the pursuit of happiness", and is guaranteed by both our State and Federal Constitution.[1]

[Public Policy]

The lack of constitutional power of the Legislature to fix prices by law or delegate such power must be, in this case, distinguished from the right of the Legislature to broaden the contracting powers of individuals and corporations thus permitting them to enter into multiple agreements to fix prices. At common law such contracts were against public policy because they were considered monopolistic and in restraint of trade. The Legislature determines the public policy of the State, and in the exercise of this power it may, by statute, modify or change the rule at common law and enlarge the scope of contractual powers of individuals and corporations.

[1] See Vol. 32, No. 2, p. 127, Ind. L. J. (1957), for a comprehensive discussion of the Constitutionality of State Fair Trade Acts.

I would affirm the judgment of the trial court.

ACHOR, C. J. and ARTERBURN, J. CONCUR.

Dissenting Opinion

LANDIS, Justice.

I cannot agree with the opinion of the court written by Emmert, J., which holds the Fair Trade Law of Indiana is an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power and an infringement of due process in violation of Article 4, § 1 and Article 1, § 12 of the Indiana Constitution.

[Federal and State Constitutions]

The opinion, in my view, means that we have one theory of separation of powers and due process under the Federal Constitution and a different and distinct doctrine of separation of powers and due process under the Indiana Constitution.

The language employed in the two constitutional documents is identical for our purposes, the Constitution of the United States and of Indiana providing respectively as to the separation of legislative powers: "All legislative powers * * * shall be vested in a congress,"[1] and "The Legislative authority * * * shall be vested in the General Assembly."[2, 3] (Italics added.) Similarly, the expressions "due process of law" under the U. S. Constitution[4] and "due course of law" under the Indiana Constitution[5] have been considered of like import and used interchangeably.[6]

[Dr. Miles Case]

To consider the authorities cited in the opinion of the court, we note the court first places reliance on the 1911 decision of Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Park & Sons Co. (1911), 220 U. S. 373, 31 S. Ct. 376, 55 L. Ed. 502, which held the restrictive contracts there involved to be an illegal restraint of trade under the common law and the Sherman Anti-Trust Act of 1890. Everyone concedes the early conflict between Fair Trade and restraint of trade, and similarly everyone now concedes that such conflict was removed by the Miller-Tydings Act of 1937[7] (at least as to contract-signers) as to matters in inter-state commerce. The Indiana Fair Trade Act of 1937[8] similarly amended the Indiana Anti-Trust Act of 1897[9] so as to remove the conflict with restraint of trade within the state.

Any application of the Dr. Miles case, supra, to the case before us has therefore been removed by statute.

[Schwegmann Case]

The next case relied upon in the opinion of the court has similarly been rendered ineffective and inapplicable by a subsequent statute. It is Schwegmann Bros. v. Calvert Corp. (1951) [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,823], 341 U. S. 384, 71 S. Ct. 745, 95 L. Ed. 1035, (hereinafter referred to as the first Schwegmann case) which decided that Fair Trade contracts with non-signer provisions were in violation of federal anti-trust laws, since the Miller-Tydings Act of 1937 providing exemption from anti-trust laws did not apply to non-signer contract provisions. This statutory deficiency of the Miller-Tydings Act was shortly afterwards remedied by the McGuire Act of 1952[10] specifically exempting Fair Trade agreements from federal anti-trust laws as to both signers and non-signers, and the opinion of the court in the case at bar concedes this in a footnote.[11] In considering the first Schwegmann case, supra, it should also be noted that such case did not specifically discuss any constitutional questions.[12]

The unquestioned landmark case in the federal courts on the constitutionality of the Fair Trade is Old Dearborn Co. v. Seagram Corp. (1936) [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,141], 299 U. S. 183, 57 S. Ct. 139, 81 L. Ed. 109, 106 A. L. R. 1476, which involved the Fair Trade Act of Illinois.

In that case appellee Seagram, a Delaware corporation, was a wholesale dealer in alcoholic beverages in Illinois. Appellant operated four retail liquor stores in Chicago, but did not purchase any of the whiskey in controversy from appellee. Appellant's charter powers included sales at both wholesale and retail.

In the Old Dearborn case the challenge was directed against § 2 of the Illinois act which provided that wilfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale, and selling any commodity at less than stipulated in any contract made under the act, whether the person doing so is or is not a party to the contract, shall constitute unfair competition, giving rise to a right of action in favor of anyone damaged thereby. In Old Dearborn there was no contractual liability shown on the part of appellant, and the U. S. Supreme Court in a unanimous opinion by Mr. Justice Sutherland upheld the constitutionality of the Illinois Fair Trade Act, as against the contentions that the act violated due process and was an unlawful delegation of legislative power.

The majority opinion in the case before us attempts to distinguish the facts of Old Dearborn from the case at bar.

The evidence in Old Dearborn indicated the Old Dearborn Company purchased some of the whiskey in controversy from persons under Fair Trade contract with others, and also purchased whiskey from persons not signatories to such contracts.[13] Any attempted distinction from the case at bar on this point is inconclusive as it did not appear in the case before us, where appellee Shane obtained the merchandise in question.

The observation of the majority in the case before us that, although the U. S. Supreme Court "did not take note of it" Old Dearborn in fact "was committing a tort by inducing a breach of a distributor's contract to Seagram Corporation" is an attempted limitation of Old Dearborn upon a basis that did not sufficiently impress the U. S. Supreme Court for it to express itself on the subject. Not only did Old Dearborn procure whiskey from contract signers and non-signers, so as to preclude any possibility of an induced breach of contract as to the latter, but even as to the former we cannot arbitrarily say there was a tort committed by Old Dearborn. Before we can conclude ex parte that Old Dearborn committed torts in inducing breaches of contract not at issue in that case, we should note that there are many situations where a defendant may be legally privileged to induce a breach of contract and thus not be answerable in tort.[14]

The majority's attempted limitation of Old Dearborn to cases of contractual liability or inducing a tort is a strained construction of the case and entirely unwarranted.

[Schechter Case]

The N. R. A. Schechter case[15] relied on in the majority opinion, and decided by the U. S. Supreme Court prior to the Old Dearborn, did not involve Fair Trade and is inapplicable to the question of delegation of powers under the facts before us in this case.

[Second Schwegmann Case]

The next case in the federal courts involving Fair Trade after Old Dearborn is Schwegmann Bros. v. Calvert Corp., supra, (the first Schwegmann case) which has been previously treated. It was superseded by the McGuire Act passed in 1952 (excepting Fair Trade agreements from federal antitrust laws as to both signers and non-signers), and thereafter the second Schwegmann case[16] upheld the validity of the McGuire Act and the Fair Trade Act with non-signer provisions as against the contentions that they violated due process and unlawfully delegated legislative power to private individuals.

As stated in the second Schwegmann case at pp. 791, 792 of 205 F. 2d:

> "Whatever weakening effect on Old Dearborn may have been caused by Schwegmann's [the first Schwegmann case's] frank characterization of State fair trade statutes as involving price fixing against non-signers is more than off-set, it seems to us, by the weakening also of the broad concept against the validity of legislative price fixing assumed in Old Dearborn. For 'the well-settled general principle that the right of the owner of property to fix the price at which he will sell it is an inherent attribute of the property itself, and as such is within the protection of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment'. [Citing Old Dearborn and other U. S. Supreme Court cases.]"

In connection with the test of whether an illegal fixing of prices had occurred, the court cited the case of Nebbia v. New York (1934), 291 U. S. 502, at p. 539, 54 S. Ct. 505, at p. 517, 78 L. Ed. 940, at p. 958, 89 A. L. R. 1469, at p. 1484, where the court said:

> "* * * Price control, like any other form of regulation, is unconstitutional only if arbitrary, discriminatory, or demonstrably irrelevant to the policy the legislature is free to adopt, and hence an unnecessary and unwarranted interference with individual liberty."

In determining whether there was an arbitrary, discriminatory, and unlawful price fixing or price control under the Fair Trade Act in question, the court in the second Schwegmann case concluded at p. 792 of 205 F. 2d:

> "The * * * legislature has defined with particularity the type of commodity with respect to which fair trade prices may be established and enforced; namely, 'a commodity which bears, or the label or container of which bears, the trade mark, brand, or name of the producer of the commodity and which is in fair and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced by others'. It was, we think, within the province of the legislature to assume that economic laws constitute a sufficient restraint against capricious or arbitrary price fixing by the producer. As pointed out long ago by Louis D. (later Mr. Justice) Brandeis, the producer 'establishes his price at his peril—the peril that if he sets it too high, either the consumer will not buy or, if the article is, nevertheless, popular, the high profits will invite even more competition'. We agree with the learned District Judge that Old Dearborn still controls and, further, that, if it is to be overruled, that can be done only by the Supreme Court."

[Fair Trade Policy]

I do not believe this is the place for a prolonged discussion of whether Fair Trade appears to us to be good or bad for the economic or social life of the state.

Briefly stated, however, the proponents of Fair Trade contend that although it might appear at first blush that price cutting by a retailer is not harmful to a manufacturer, there is respectable opinion to the contrary—that the maintenance of a fair margin of profit encourages the retailer to offer a standard product of good quality to the public rather than to endeavor to substitute a sub-standard, or inferior product in an effort to meet price-cutting competition; that this, in time, affects the public.

The opponents of Fair Trade say that while in the bleak days of the 1930's there might have been some justification for Fair Trade, it is totally unnecessary in the prosperous inflation of the later 1940's and 1950's, and that unrestrained price-cutting by competing retailers is to the benefit of the general public. The two schools of thought on the subject have thus developed into keen controversy through the years. A sharp cleavage of views, in fact, has developed within departments of the U. S. government. The Federal Trade Commission, for example, has allegedly opposed resale price maintenance, while the Department of Commerce has apparently favored it, concluding "the case against Fair Trade is more theoretical than real." Committees of Congress have submitted divergent reports pro and con on the matter, and the debate appears still to be going on.

The opponents of Fair Trade, including some text writers and law journal contributors, ask, however, that we enter the argument of economics and decide in the light of present day conditions against the wisdom of Fair Trade legislation, and thus hold it unconstitutional. However, I do not believe we can have one constitution in fair weather and an entirely different constitution in foul. The court does not sit as a super-legislature to weigh the propriety of legislation, nor to decide whether it expressly offends the public welfare. The legislative power has limits, but state legislatures have power to experiment with new techniques and use their own standard of the public welfare so long as specific constitutional prohibitions are not violated.[17]

And as to legislative policy, we should note that while numerous changes have been made in Congressional legislation in recent years affecting Fair Trade, in Indiana, however, no single amendment to the Fair Trade Act has been made since it was enacted some twenty years ago, but the legislation remains in exactly the form in which it was passed at that time. As stated in a recent case [18] at p. 211 of 106 A. 2d:

> "The question before us is not the wisdom of this legislation; it is whether the situation presents a reasonable necessity for the protection of the public welfare, and whether the means bear a reasonable relation to the end sought. * * * And if these questions are fairly debatable, the legislative judgment must control."

[Decision of Federal Court]

Before concluding this opinion I think we should also observe that the U. S. District Court for the Southern District of Indiana has recently held the Fair Trade Act of Indiana with non-signer provisions is valid and constitutional as against the contentions that it violates due process and is an unlawful delegation of legislative powers,[19] and under the Indiana decisions that determination is highly persuasive upon this court.[20]

[State Rulings]

And not only is it the law in the federal courts that the Fair Trade Acts are not invalid as violating due process or being an unlawful delegation of legislative power in restricting prices, but the rule is followed in a majority of state courts.[21]

[Conclusion]

If we are to have any certainty in the law, I do not believe constitutional principles should bend according to the winds of prosperity or adversity, nor should we attempt to engraft into the Indiana Constitution a different concept of due process and separation of powers from what those identical principles have been interpreted to mean under the Constitution of the United States.

I would reverse the judgment.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia. Civil Action No. 1868. Filed May 6, 1957.

West Virginia Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade—Constitutionality of West Virginia Fair Trade Act—Nonsigner Provision—Title of Fair Trade Act—West Virginia Constitution.—Section 6 of the West Virginia Fair Trade Act, insofar as it applies sanctions to persons who have not signed fair trade contracts, is void since it brings an object into the Act which is not only not expressed in the title, but which is the plain antithesis of the title in violation of the West Virginia Constitution, which requires that every act of the legislature must bear a title expressive of its objects. The purpose expressed in the title of the Act is restrictive within itself because the title describes and limits the method whereby the purpose of the Act is to be attained. The legislature having described that method in the title as one which is to be employed "through the use of voluntary contracts establishing minimum resale prices and providing for refusal to sell unless such minimum resale prices are observed," a provision in the body of the Act which authorizes the employment of means exactly opposite to those described in the title cannot be said to be within the scope of the title or even germane to the title. However, the court rejected contentions that the West Virginia Fair Trade Act is void because it was not reenacted after the passage of the Miller-Tydings or McGuire Act, and that the Act, as applied to nonsigners, is not a proper or legitimate exercise of the police power of the state, and hence an invasion of property rights without due process of law.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3085, 3258.

For the defendant: William R. Laird, III, and Pat R. Hamilton.

[Fair Trade Action]

BEN MOORE, District Judge [In full text]: This is a civil action instituted by plaintiff for the purpose of obtaining an injunction against defendant to prevent retail sales by defendant of plaintiff's trade-marked products at less than the resale prices fixed by plaintiff in contracts with other retailers.

Plaintiff must prevail if at all by reason of the provisions of West Virginia's so-called "Fair Trade Act."

[Defenses]

Defendant's answer raises the question of whether or not the West Virginia Statute is constitutional. It is further alleged that defendant [plaintiff] has no standing in a court of equity because of its having in various ways allegedly permitted to be made, and connived with other dealers in making other sales of its products in West Virginia at cut rates. This defense is of course factual and needs to be inquired into only if the vital constitutional issue is decided adversely to defendant.

[West Virginia Act]

The title of the West Virginia Fair Trade Act which the legislature had before it when the act was passed is as follows:

> "An Act to protect trade-mark owners, producers, distributors and the general public against injurious and uneconomic practices in the distribution of competitive commodities bearing a distinguishing trade-mark, brand or name, through the use of voluntary contracts establishing minimum resale prices and providing for refusal to sell unless such minimum resale prices are observed." W. Va. Laws 1937, c. 123.

This title is followed by the text of the act, which reads:

> "Section 1. The following terms, as used in this act, are hereby defined as follows:
> "(a) 'Commodity' means any subject of commerce.
> "(b) 'Producer' means any grower, baker, maker, manufacturer, bottler, packer, converter or processor.
> "(c) 'Wholesaler' means any person selling a commodity other than a producer or retailer.

"(d) 'Retailer' means any person selling a commodity to consumers for use.

"(e) 'Person' means an individual, a corporation, a partnership, an association, a joint-stock company, a business trust or any unincorporated organization.

"Sec. 2. No contract relating to the sale or resale of a commodity which bears, or the label or container of which bears, the trade-mark, brand, or name of the producer or distributor of such commodity and which commodity is in free and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced or distributed by others shall be deemed in violation of any law of the state of West Virginia by reason of any of the following provisions which may be contained in such contract:

"(a) That the buyer will not resell such commodity at less than the minimum price stipulated by the seller.

"(b) That the buyer will require of any dealer to whom he may resell such commodity an agreement that he will not, in turn, resell at less than the minimum price stipulated by the seller.

"(c) That the seller will not sell such commodity:

"(1) to any wholesaler, unless such wholesaler will agree not to resell the same to any retailer unless the retailer will in turn agree not to resell the same except to consumers for use and at not less than the stipulated minimum price, and such wholesaler will likewise agree not to resell the same to any other wholesaler unless such other wholesaler will make the same agreement with any wholesaler or retailer to whom he may resell; or

"(2) to any retailer, unless the retailer will agree not to resell the same except to consumers for use and at not less than the stipulated minimum price.

"Sec. 3. For the purpose of preventing evasion of the resale price restrictions imposed in respect of any commodity by any contract entered into pursuant to the provisions of this act (except to the extent authorized by the said contract):

"(a) The offering or giving of any article of value in connection with the sale of such commodity;

"(b) The offering or the making of any concession of any kind whatsoever (whether by the giving of coupons or otherwise) in connection with any such sale; or

"(c) The sale or offering for sale of such commodity in combination with any other commodity, shall be deemed a violation of such resale price restriction, for which the remedies prescribed by section six of this act shall be available.

"Sec. 4. No minimum resale price shall be established for any commodity, under any contract entered into pursuant to the provisions of this act, by any person other than the owner of the trade-mark, brand or name used in connection with such commodity or by a distributor specifically authorized to establish said price by the owner of such trade-mark, brand or name.

"Sec. 5. No contract containing any of the provisions enumerated in section two of this act shall be deemed to preclude the resale of any commodity covered thereby without reference to such contract in the following cases:

"(a) In closing out the owner's stock for the bona fide purpose of discontinuing dealing in any such commodity and plain notice of the fact is given to the public; provided the owner of such stock shall give to the producer or distributor of such commodity prompt and reasonable notice in writing of his intention to close out said stock, and an opportunity to purchase such stock at the original invoice price, plus any transportation, storage or other legitimate or regular costs.

"(b) When the trade-mark, brand or name is removed or wholly obliterated from the commodity and is not used or directly or indirectly referred to in the advertisement or sale thereof;

"(c) When the goods are altered, second-hand, damaged, defaced, or deteriorated and plain notice of the fact is given to the public in the advertisement and sale thereof, such notice to be conspicuously displayed in all advertisements and to be affixed to the commodity;

"(d) But nothing contained in this article shall apply to sales by executors, administrators, receivers or assignees under a voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors, trustees in bankruptcy or by any one acting under judicial process.

"Sec. 6. Wilfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale or selling any commodity at less than the price stipulated in any contract entered into pursuant to the provisions of this act, whether the person so advertising, offering for sale or selling is or is not a party to such contract, is unfair competition and is actionable at the suit of any person damaged thereby.

"Sec. 7. This act shall not apply to any contract or agreement between or among producers, except as provided in subdivision (c) of section two of this act, or between or among wholesalers or between or among retailers as to sale or resale prices.

"Sec. 8. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provisions to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

"Sec. 9. All acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed to the extent of such inconsistency.

"Sec. 10. This act may be known and cited as the 'Fair Trade Act.'" W. Va. Laws 1937, c. 123, §§ 1-10.

[Nonsigner]

Defendant was not a party to any contract with plaintiff establishing fair trade prices for plaintiff's products. It is not disputed that defendant has engaged in the sale of plaintiff's products at prices below the so-called "fair trade" prices stipulated in contracts made by plaintiff with one or more retailers of its products in West Virginia.

[Constitutionality—Grounds]

Defendant takes the position that the provision of section 6 of the act making actionable sales of fair trade merchandise at less than the prices stipulated in certain contracts, insofar as it is made applicable to a person not a party to such contract, is unconstitutional. He asserts three grounds in support of this contention.

(1) That to make fair trade acts applicable to non-signers of contracts is not a proper or legitimate exercise of the police power of the state, and hence an invasion of property rights without due process of law.

(2) That the West Virginia Fair Trade Act, being enacted in 1937, was void at the time of its enactment because contrary to the federal statute known as the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. Defendant concedes that had the West Virginia Fair Trade Act been reenacted after the passage of the Miller-Tydings Act and the McGuire Act, legalizing in their federal aspects the making of such contracts as are described in the West Virginia Fair Trade Act, the objection here asserted would be without force; but contends that such reenactment was necessary to give it scope after the federal barrier was removed, and that without such reenactment the act is still void because of unconstitutionality in its inception.

(3) That the form of the act violates a mandatory provision of the Constitution of West Virginia which requires that every act of the legislature must bear a title expressive of its objects; the exact language being as follows:

"No act hereafter passed, shall embrace more than one object, and that shall be expressed in the title. But if any object shall be embraced in an act which is not so expressed, the act shall be void only as to so much thereof, as shall not be so expressed. . . ." W. Va. Const. Art. VI, § 30.

[State Police Power]

Defendant's first contention is effectively answered by reference to the case of Old Dearborn Distributing Co. v. Seagram Distillers Corp. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,141], 299 U. S. 183 (1936). This case dealt specifically with a non-signer provision of a state fair trade law, and it was held there that such a law does not infringe the doctrine of the previous decisions of the Supreme Court dealing with legislative price fixing; does not violate due process of law as an unlawful delegation of power to private persons to control the disposition of property of others; is not arbitrary, unfair, or unreasonable; and does not deny equal protection of the law. No argument is advanced which would take this case out of the orbit of the Dearborn case. I therefore reject this contention of defendant.

[Reenactment]

As to the second ground, it may be noted that courts are not unanimous in their conclusion as to the necessity for reenactment of a statute, ineffective when passed because in conflict with federal law, but subsequently made effective by federal legislation. There is language in the case of State v. Miller, 66 W. Va. 436, 66 S. E. 522 (1909), which supports defendant's argument; and this case has been cited as authority for a point of view similar to defendant's in the case of Graden Robinson Stores v. Oneida Limited, 209 Ga. 613, 75 S. E. 2d 161 (1953). However, the language in the Miller case was obviously dictum, and has moreover been criticized and rejected by the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals in State of West Virginia v. Adams Express Co., 219 F. 794 (4th Cir. 1915). I conclude that the weight of authority, as well as the better reasoning, supports the view that it was unnecessary that the West Virginia Legislature reenact the state's fair trade act after its provisions had been legalized in their interstate aspect by the Miller-Tydings Act and the McGuire Act.

Defendant's third contention is much more serious.

The question of whether the title to the West Virginia Fair Trade Act is broad enough to support inclusion in the act of the non-signer provision has not been passed on by the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia; nor have I been able to find an instance in which a federal court has spoken as to a similar act so titled.

[Titles of Other Fair Trade Laws]

I have caused a search to be made in the library of the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia to determine the extent and character of fair trade legislation nationally. From the data there available it has been ascertained that all the states but three have enacted Fair Trade Laws. These three states are, Missouri, Texas and Vermont. The laws enacted have all contained the non-signer provision. Sixteen other states have titles either exactly the same or similar in effect to the title of the West Virginia Act; that is, the titles speak of providing fair trade protection "through the use of voluntary contracts." These are Alabama, Delaware, Idaho, Indiana, Kansas, Maryland, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, North Caroline, Oklahoma, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Utah and Wyoming. Florida's Fair Trade Act was originally so entitled, but after it was held by the Supreme Court of that state to be unconstitutional because of the restrictive title, it was reenacted with a broader title. It has since been held unconstitutional on other grounds.

Four states have fair trade acts with titles similar to the title of West Virginia's Fair Trade Act, except that the title concludes with the phrase, "and for other purposes," or words of like effect. These are, Arizona, Arkansas, Georgia and Nevada.

Twenty states (and now Florida also) have fair trade acts which do not specify in the title that the protection of fair trade practices is to be accomplished "through the use of voluntary contracts." These are, Colorado, Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Mississippi, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia and Washington. One of these states (New York), has since reenacted the statute without any title.

Two states, Connecticut and Wisconsin, provide no titles whatever for their fair trade acts, and it is therefore assumed that the constitutions of those states do not so require.

Information relative to the California Fair Trade Act was not available at the library.

[Decisions]

In only five instances has it been found that the constitutionality of a fair trade act has been challenged because of failure of its title to conform to constitutional requirements. Three cases are cited by plaintiff in support of constitutionality, and two by defendant against constitutionality.

One of the cases cited by plaintiff is that of Goldsmith v. Meade Johnson & Co. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,232], 176 Md. 682, 7 A. 2d 176 (1939). The original fair trade act of the state of Maryland (1935) contained no restrictive words in its title limiting its application to "voluntary contracts." However, the original act included the standard non-signer provisions. In 1937 the Maryland legislature passed a new fair trade act entitled as follows:

> "An Act to repeal Chapter 212 of the Acts of 1935, codified as Sections 105, 106, 107, 108, 109 and 110, respectively, of Article 83 of Flack's 1935 Supplement of the Annotated Code of Public General Laws of Maryland, title 'Sales and Notices,' sub-title 'Fair Trade Act', and to substitute therefor, for the purpose of correcting, clarifying and amplifying the Act so repealed, ten (10) sections, to be added to said Article and bear the same sub-title, to follow immediately after Section 104, and to be known as Sections 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113 and 114, respectively, to protect trade-mark owners, producers, distributors and the general public against injurious and uneconomic practices in the distribution of competitive commodities bearing a distinguishing trade-mark, brand or name, through the use of voluntary contracts establishing minimum resale prices and providing for refusal to sell unless such minimum resale prices are observed." Md. Laws 1937, C. 239.

In deciding the Goldsmith case the Court pointed out that the later act made reference to the sections of the code containing the original act, and concluded that the later act disclosed as its purpose the "correcting, clarifying, and amplifying" of the Act of 1935. These considerations were given some weight in sustaining the constitutionality of the act.

The other case cited by plaintiff from a state the title of whose fair trade act contains the restrictive phrase "through the use of voluntary contracts" is that of Klein v. National Pressure Cooker Co., [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,378], 31 Del. Ch. 459, 64 A. 2d 529 (1949). Unquestionably this case fully supports plaintiff's argument. However, very little is said by the court in explanation of its conclusion that "the words 'through the use of voluntary contracts' merely described the method by which the protection of the price cutting is to be obtained" is reached.

A third case cited by plaintiff, Weco Products Co. v. Sam's Cut-Rate [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,080], 296 Mich. 190, 295 N. W. 611 (1941), is not applicable, since the Michigan Fair Trade Act has a title which does not contain the restrictive words, "through the use of voluntary contracts."

The case of McGraw Electric Company v. Lewis and Smith Drug Company [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,954], 159 Neb. 703, 68 N. W. 2d 608 (1955), cited by defendant dealt with a fair trade act bearing the same title as the West Virginia Fair Trade Act. Here again the court, though reaching a conclusion exactly opposite to that of the Delaware court, gave no substantial reasons for such a conclusion. The court merely said that "it is to be observed that the title to the Act refers to fixation of minimum prices 'through the use of voluntary contracts'. It does not express or carry a suggestion of a purpose to subject third parties to such contracts. Other reasons for this conclusion need not be discussed."

Only the Supreme Court of the state of Florida, in the case of Bristol-Myers Company v. Webb's Cut-Rate Drug Co., Inc. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,217], 137 Fla. 508, 188 So. 91 (1939), has exhaustively discussed reasons for holding unconstitutional a fair trade act containing a non-signer provision, but restrictively titled as is West Virginia's Fair Trade Act. That court reasoned as follows:

"The first part of the title states that it is for the purpose of protecting trade-mark owners, producers, distributors and the public. The next portion states that these persons are thereby protected against injurious and uneconomic practices in the distribution of competitive commodities bearing a distinguishing trade-mark, brand or name. Then it proceeds to say how this protection is to be enforced, and the method is stated thus: 'Through the use of voluntary contracts establishing minimum resale prices and providing for refusal to sell unless such minimum prices are observed.' Appellant contends that the clause just quoted means that resale prices which shall be binding on all retailers, those who do not contract as well as those who do, are to be thus established by the resale prices set forth in the contracts which may be voluntarily entered into by those retailers who see fit to execute such contracts. But this is not, to our minds, the plain and obvious meaning of the language used; quite the contrary. The meaning contended for by the appellant may have been that which was in the mind of the draftsman of the Act, but the actual language used would convey an entirely different meaning to the ordinary mind. The significance of the word 'voluntary' is well understood by the average man, be he legislator or plain citizen. Such a person, reading the title to this act, would conclude that it applied only to those retailers who entered into voluntary contracts with trade-mark owners."

[West Virginia Rulings]

It has been held many times by the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia that "the language of the title" of an act of the legislature "should be construed in its most comprehensive and liberal sense favorable to the validity of the act;" that only where it is "manifest that the contents of the act are not within the title" should the act be declared invalid; and that "all doubt will be resolved in favor of the constitutionality of the statute." It has been said that the test of sufficiency is whether the title "will convey to persons interested in the actual subject matter enough information to provoke the reading of the act," and that "so long as the title fairly reflects the purpose of the act, it is not necessary to descend to particulars in the title." See State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 125, 18 S. E. 470

(1893); City of Wheeling ex rel. Carter v. American Casualty Co., 131 W. Va. 584, 48 S. E. 2d 404 (1948); Sypolt v. Shaffer, 130 W. Va. 310, 43 S. E. 2d 235 (1947); State v. Thompson, 80 W. Va. 698, 93 S. E. 810 (1917).

On the other hand, it has been made equally clear by decisions of the same court that in cases where the act itself flatly contradicts what its title imports it must be stricken down under the constitutional mandate. In the case of Stewart v. Tennant, 52 W. Va. 559, 44 S. E. 223 (1903), at page 569, one of the greatest of West Virginia Judges, Brannon, in discussing the constitutional provision concerning clear titling of acts of the legislature says:

"The purpose of this provision, as declared by the courts, is to prevent the enactment of laws, in a clandestine and stealthy manner, by compelling a statement in the title of the act, of its aim and purpose, to the end that the public, as well as members of the legislature may conveniently and certainly know the character of pending legislation. But for this provision, omnibus bills could be put through the legislature, carrying all kinds of measures, concealed in all forms, and neither legislator nor the public could, with any degree of certainty, fully know their contents. . . ."

"although the courts construe this provision, in cases not within the mischiefs sought to be remedied by it, so as to sustain legislation, they rigidly enforce it in all cases falling within those mischiefs, and it makes no difference how meritorious the act may be. If the constitutional provision has been disregarded in the passage of it, it cannot be sustained."

In State v. Cordi, 103 W. Va. 23, 136 S. E. 505 (1927), the title to the act under question was: "An Act for the protection of sheep, lambs, goats, kids and other property and providing compensation to the owner for the destruction, loss or injury by dogs for any sheep, lambs, goats, kids and other property and providing for damages to persons by dogs and also providing for taxation and protection and making dogs property and fixing punishment for any violation of this act." The part of the statute attacked declared it to be unlawful for any "unnaturalized foreign-born resident of this state to own, keep or permit to remain upon any premises under his control a dog of any kind within this state . . ." . It was held that the challenged portion was void because it could not be considered by any fair intendment as having "a necessary and proper connection with the title."

The case of Bedford Corporation v. Price, 112 W. Va. 674, 166 S. E. 380 (1932), dealt with a statute titled as follows:

"AN ACT to amend and re-enact sections six, seven, and ten of article nine of chapter eleven and section eighteen of article six of chapter eleven of the official code of West Virginia, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-one, relating to tax levies and collections."

One section of the act provided for the collection and payment of municipal taxes, and allowed a discount for payment on or before a certain date. In an opinion holding this section of the act unconstitutional Judge Maxwell, speaking for the court, said:

"No person, whether public official or private citizen, upon reading the said title would have received the slightest intimation that the pending bill proposed to make drastic changes with reference to the collection of municipal taxes. . . . The constitutional provision that an act shall not embrace more than one object and that shall be expressed in the title (Constitution, Article VI, section 30) does not render it necessary that the title shall descend to particulars, but it does require that the title shall be broad enough to give a fair and reasonable index to all purposes of the act."

Plaintiff cites the case of Lemon v. Rumsey, 108 W. Va. 242, 150 S. E. 725 (1925) as authority for the proposition that Section 6 of the West Virginia Fair Trade Act is within the scope of the act's title. This case involved an act of the legislature bearing the following title: "An act providing for the control and eradication of the plant disease commonly known as 'apple rust' in the several counties of the State." The act itself provided among other measures for the eradication of "apple rust," for the destruction of diseased red cedar trees, which were declared to be a public nuisance. Suit was brought to enjoin destruction of plaintiff's red cedar trees. The court held that the part of the act challenged by the plaintiff was valid, since it was merely one of the means selected to attain the end set forth in the title.

The distinction between the constitutional question posed in Lemon v. Rumsey and that in the case we are now considering is sharply apparent. There the title expressed a broad purpose; and the act provided for the means through which that purpose as expressed in the title was to be accomplished. Here the purpose expressed in the act is restrictive within itself, in that the title describes and limits the method whereby the purpose is to be attained. The legislature having described that method in the title as one which is to be employed "through the use of voluntary contracts establishing minimum resale prices and providing for refusal to sell unless such minimum resale prices are observed," a provision in the body of the act which authorizes the employment of means exactly opposite to those described in the title can hardly be said to be within the scope of the title, or even germane to it. Certainly no person reading the title would expect to find on reading the act that instead of the protection to trade-mark owners being secured through the use of voluntary contracts it is accomplished instead by establishing sanctions applicable also to merchants who have not signed contracts. This is a perfect instance for the application of the well known maxim that "expressio unius est exclusio alterius."

[Nonsigner Provision Void]

I am sensible of the seriousness of any court's action in declaring an act of a state legislature unconstitutional. This is all the more apparent when the court which speaks is a federal rather than a state court. However, as I have said there has been no determination of the question here presented by the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, which would otherwise serve as a guide. In such a situation, I find no other course open than to follow what I believe to be the plain mandate of the West Virginia Constitution. In my opinion Section 6 of the West Virginia Fair Trade Act, insofar as it applies sanctions to nonsigners of contracts, brings an object into the act which is not only not expressed in the title, but which is the plain antithesis of the title.

The nonsigner provision of the act is therefore, in my opinion, void. Plaintiff's action must be dismissed.

Counsel for the defendant will submit an appropriate order for entry.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. September Term, 1956; April Session, 1957. No. 11685. Dated May 23, 1957.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois. Eastern Division. HOFFMAN, District Judge.

Illinois Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade—Enforcement of Fair Trade Prices—Injunctive Relief—Federal Court Actions—Proof of Jurisdictional Amount.—A United States District Court did not have jurisdiction of a fair trade enforcement action for injunctive relief since the fair trader failed to prove, in this diversity of citizenship case, that the matter in controversy exceeded the sum or value of $3,000. There was no evidence that the monetary value of the damage or injury to the fair trader's good will, sustained or threatened by the defendants' acts, exceeded this amount. In the instant type of action, it is improper, in the absence of evidence of the amount of damage sustained or threatened, to look at evidence of what was spent in building good will and then, if the amount be substantial, to surmise that the amount of loss is $3,000 or more. The defendants' acts did not prevent the fair trader from using its good will in the conduct of its business. The damage to the fair trader's good will caused or threatened by the defendants' acts was the subject of controversy; therefore, the fair trader had to prove facts showing what, if any, curtailment of business and consequent loss have been or are likely to result from the defendants' acts.

Reversing a judgment of the U. S. District Court, Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, 1955 Trade Cases ¶ 68,213; for a prior opinion of the U. S. Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, see 1955 Trade Cases ¶ 68,004.

Before MAJOR, FINNEGAN and SCHNACKENBERG, Circuit Judges.

[Fair Trade Injunction]

SCHNACKENBERG, Circuit Judge [In full text]: Defendants appeal from a judgment of the district court, entered December 5, 1955, which permanently enjoined them from offering for sale or selling Seagram products at less than the prices stipulated by plaintiff from time to time under the Illinois Fair Trade Act[1] and in accordance with contracts made pursuant thereto.

[Trial Court Proceedings]

Based upon plaintiff's amended complaint, which defendants answered, the district court, after hearing evidence, on July 2, 1954 granted a preliminary injunction, having found that action necessary to preserve the status quo. We affirmed. [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,004] 221 F. 2d 815; certiorari denied, 350 U. S. 828.

On final hearing of the case, the district court heard additional evidence and, by stipulation, also considered the evidence heard on the motion for preliminary injunction.

[Amended Complaint]

The amended complaint alleges that plaintiff is a Delaware corporation and a citizen of that state, and defendants are citizens and residents of the state of Illinois. It expressly alleges that this is a suit between citizens of different states, and the matter in controversy herein, exclusive of interest and costs, exceeds the sum of $3,000.

It further appears therefrom that plaintiff is the sole authorized Illinois distributor of Seagram beverages, which it sells under the trademarks, brands and names of the producers thereof, and that defendants are engaged in the retail liquor business in Illinois. Plaintiff has expended in Illinois over $500,000 in advertising Seagram products, having sold large quantities thereof in that state.

It is also charged that plaintiff executed fair trade contracts, in accordance with the Illinois Fair Trade Act, with large numbers of retailers in Illinois, and announced stipulated retail prices of Seagram products, that notice thereof was given to defendants and that they continued advertising, offering for sale or selling of Seagram products at less than the stipulated prices, to the irreparable damage of the good will and business of the plaintiff, that, unless defendants are enjoined, plaintiff will suffer further irreparable damage in a decrease in its sales and others dealing in said products will fail to comply with its fair trade contracts, all to the great damage and financial loss of plaintiff.

[Federal Jurisdiction]

Federal jurisdiction was challenged by defendants, both in their answer and by a motion made at the time of the final hearing on the merits. They now argue that plaintiff failed to establish federal jurisdiction in that no competent evidence was introduced to prove that the matter in controversy, exclusive of interest and costs, exceeded the sum of $3,000.

1. Plaintiff in such a case must carry throughout the litigation the burden of showthat it is properly in court. KVOS, Inc. v. Associated Press, 299 U. S. 269. If its allegations of jurisdictional facts are challenged by its adversary in any appropriate manner, it must support them by competent proof. McNutt v. General Motors Corp., 298 U. S. 178, 189.

[Evidence]

In an attempt to sustain its burden, plaintiff succeeded in introducing, over the objection of defendants as to its competency, evidence which, plaintiff contends, tended to prove the value of its good will in the Seagram products. Its witness Teece testified that "for the past two or three years, in excess of $3,000,000 was spent by plaintiff in Illinois advertising, as well as promotion, and outdoor signs." Thereon the district court made a finding of fact that the matter in controversy, exclusive of interest and costs, exceeds the sum of $3,000. It thereupon concluded that it had jurisdiction.

[Old Dearborn Co. Case]

In Old Dearborn Co. v. Seagram Corp. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,141], 299 U. S. 183, which upheld the constitutionality of the Illinois Fair Trade Act, the court, at 195, referred to section 2 of the act which reads:

"Section 2. Wilfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale or selling any commodity at less than the price stipulated in any contract entered into pursuant to the provisions of section 1 of this Act, whether the person so advertising, offering for sale or selling is or is not a party to such contract, is unfair competition and is actionable at the suit of any person damaged thereby."

It said that section 2 "interferes only when he [purchaser of the commodity] sells with the aid of the good will of the vendor; and it interferes then only to protect that good will against injury". At 198, it added:

"* * * the sole purpose of the present law is to afford a legitimate remedy for an injury to the good will which results from the use of trade-marks, brands or names, * * *." (Italics supplied.)

The district court did not note that, when the $3,000 requisite for jurisdiction[2] is challenged in an action brought in a federal court for the protection of a right belonging to plaintiff, there is an important distinction between two classes of diversity cases.

[Classes of Diversity Cases]

In one class (which we shall call class A), a plaintiff charges wrongful acts by a defendant, or by several defendants acting jointly, which have, or will, injure or damage a right for which plaintiff seeks protection. In such a case, if plaintiff shows that the alleged injury or damage caused or threatened by a defendant, or by several defendants acting jointly, amounts to at least $3,000, the federal court has jurisdiction.

In the other class of diversity cases (which we shall call class B), a plaintiff charges wrongful acts by a defendant, or by several defendants acting jointly, which, if not prevented, will completely deny or destroy the right for which plaintiff seeks protection. In such a case, if plaintiff shows that the right is worth at least $3,000, the federal court has jurisdiction.

This distinction is made apparent by cases to which we now refer.

Class A.

In McNutt v. General Motors Corp., 298 U. S. 178, General Motors sued in a federal district court to restrain the enforcement of an Indiana act providing for the regulation of the business of purchasing contracts arising out of retail installment sales, on the ground that the act was invalid. Although the complaint, to show federal jurisdiction, set forth the net worth of General Motors' business in Indiana covered by the act and other facts tending to prove the value of its right to carry on that business in that state, the court, at 181, said:

"Respondent [General Motors] invokes the principle that jurisdiction is to be tested by the value of the object or right to be protected against interference. * * * But in the instant case, the statute does not attempt to prevent respondent from conducting its business. There is no showing that it cannot obtain a license and proceed with its operations. The value or net worth of the business which respondent transacts in Indiana is not involved save to the extent that it may be affected by the incidence of the statutory regulation. The object or right to be protected against unconstitutional interference is the right to be free of that regulation. The value of that right may be measured by the loss, if any, which would follow the enforcement of the rules prescribed. The particular allegations of respondent's bill as to the extent or value of its business throw no light upon that subject. They fail to set forth any facts showing what, if any, curtailment of business and consequent loss the enforcement of the statute would involve. The bill is thus destitute of any appropriate allegation as to jurisdictional amount save the general allegation that the matter in controversy exceeds $3,000. That allegation was put in issue and the record discloses neither finding nor evidence to sustain it."

In KVOS, Inc. v. Associated Press, 299 U. S. 269, Associated Press sued in a federal district court to enjoin the proprietor of a radio station from pirating news gathered by Associated Press for use of its members. The district court held that the jurisdictional requirement now under consideration had not been met, and dismissed the suit. The Court of Appeals disagreed and held that Associated Press had shown the requisite fact of jurisdiction. The Supreme Court reversed the Court of Appeals, pointing out, at 278, that the only attempt by Associated Press to show jurisdiction by competent proof was an affidavit to the effect that payments made by newspaper members for news sold to them by Associated Press were upwards of $8,000 per month, "* * * 'which is being imperiled and jeopardized by the acts of defendant * * * and said sum greatly exceeds the sum of Three Thousand Dollars, exclusive of interest and costs, and complainant is in danger of losing said memberships and payments if defendant's practices in respect to pirating said news is not enjoined.'" The Supreme Court, at 279, in rejecting this attempt to show jurisdiction, said "no intimation is given of the character or extent of the damage they [the members] would suffer by such withdrawal. The respondent having failed to support the allegations as to amount in controversy the District Court should have dismissed the bill."

Class B.

In Gibbs v. Buck, 307 U. S. 66, a class suit was filed by and on behalf of the members of a society against the Florida attorney general and others charged with the enforcement of a state act directed at organizations like the society. The complaint charged that the act was unconstitutional and deprived complainants of rights without due process of law and without equal protection of the laws, etc. By a motion to dismiss, the defendants urged that the complaint affirmatively showed that the jurisdictional amount of $3,000 was not involved. The court, at 74, said:

"The essential matter in controversy here is the right of the members, in association through the Society, to conduct the business of licensing the public performance for profit of their copyrights. This method of combining for contracts is interdicted by the Florida statute. It is not a question of taxation or regulation but prohibition. Under such circumstances, the issue on jurisdiction is the value of this right to conduct the business free of the prohibition of the statute. * * *" (Italics supplied.)

After pointing out the facts in the complaint relating to the value of this right, the court, at 75, said:

"* * * From these facts, the finding of the District Court that the matter in controversy—the value of the aggregate rights of all members to conduct their business through the Society—exceeds $3,000 in value is fully supported." (Italics supplied.)

The court pointed out that the test was different in the McNutt and Associated Press cases, supra, stating, at 75:

"McNutt v. General Motors Acceptance Corp. differs. There the State of Indiana had passed an act regulating, not prohibiting, the business of the Acceptance Corporation. The right for which protection was sought was the right to be free of regulation. It was to be measured by the loss, if any, following enforcement of regulation. This was not alleged or proved. In KVOS, Inc. v. Associated Press, relief was sought to enjoin alleged pirating, by radio, of news furnished by the Associated Press to its members. The right for which protection was sought was 'the right to conduct those enterprises free of' interference. On the issue of the value of this right, it was deposed only that the Associated Press received more than $8,000 per month for news in the territory served by the broadcasting station and was in danger of losing the payments. The Associated Press was a nonprofit corporation, operated without the purpose of profiting from its services to members and equitably dividing the expenses among them. The damage in the Associated Press case was to its members and this was not shown. Neither was it alleged or proved that any member threatened to withdraw or to reduce its payments."

In Brotherhood v. Pinkston, 293 U. S. 96, a widow, for the purpose of protecting her right to future participation in a fund from which she was entitled to receive a pension in monthly payments during her lifetime as long as she remained unmarried, brought a suit in a federal district court which dismissed the suit on the ground that the requisite amount of $3,000 was not involved. The Supreme Court, at 99, treated the value of the widow's interest in the fund as the test of jurisdiction. It pointed out that her life expectancy was shown to bring the value of the future pension installments to a sum in excess of $3,000 despite the contingency of her remarriage. The court held that federal jurisdiction existed.

In Berryman v. Board of Trustees of Whitman College, 222 U. S. 334, a college sued in a federal circuit court to enjoin the collection of taxes on its property on the ground that a perpetual contract of exemption from taxation involved the amount essential to sustain federal jurisdiction, where the contract right exceeded in value that amount, although the current taxes assessed and levied were less than that sum. The defendants challenged jurisdiction. The Supreme Court held that the lower court had jurisdiction because the value of the thing at issue, the contract right, exceeded in value the then jurisdictional requirement of $2,000. It pointed out that the claimed exemption covered, not only a current tax of $946.32, but extended to all future taxes.

[Record—Instant Action]

In the record before us there is no evidence that the monetary value of the damage or injury to plaintiff's good will, sustained or threatened by defendants' acts, exceeds $3,000. It appears that its witness Lind was about to furnish evidence which might have been relevant on that point. He was general counsel for plaintiff and he was permitted, over objection, to testify that in a price war in the liquor market "our product is subject to loss, and our business has been injured, because we can measure it, because we can see what happens to us in every jurisdiction where there is a price break." (Italics supplied.) The measure to which he referred was not otherwise identified or produced in court. Whether the measure was accurate we do not know. Lind's reference to it indicates that he, a lawyer and business man acquainted with plaintiff's affairs, recognized that the injury claimed to result to plaintiff's business in a price break was susceptible of pecuniary measurement which could be adduced in an effort to prove jurisdiction. On that issue competent evidence of the character and extent of the damage to good will would have been relevant.

Defendants' acts did not prevent plaintiff from using its good will in the conduct of its business. The damage to plaintiff's good will caused or threatened by defendants' acts is the subject of controversy in this case. Plaintiff has failed to prove any facts showing what, if any, curtailment of business and consequent loss have been or are likely to result from defendants' acts. McNutt v. General Motors Corp., 298 U. S. 178, 181.

[Cost of Good Will]

It is improper, in the absence of evidence of the amount of damage sustained or threatened, to look at the evidence of what was spent in building good will and then, if the amount be substantial, to surmise that the amount of the loss is $3,000 or more. Yet this is, in effect, the method by which the district court, in stating its theory of this action, reached the conclusion that it had jurisdiction.[3] A similar method of reasoning was disapproved by the Supreme Court in KVOS v. Associated Press, 299 U. S. 269, at 276:

> "* * * Dealing with the petitioner's insistence that the amount in controversy was not shown to exceed three thousand dollars the court [Court of Appeals] held * * * that 'The several millions of dollars here alleged to be invested in the Association's business * * * may well be damaged to the extent of $3,000 by the pirating practices described.' After referring to the character and scope of the respondent's activities the court states:
> 'It is obvious that the business of gathering and distributing to members, before profitable publication, could conceivably be damaged to the extent of $3,000 by the misappropriation and premature publication of the news material. To hold otherwise would warrant the inference that no corporation could be damaged by a wrongful attack on its business, when that business happened to be run at no profit or at a loss. Also, we are unable to hold irrational the claim that the piracy caused a $3,000 damage to the Association's quasi property right in the news.' "

(Italics supplied except word "before".) and at 277:

> "* * * The complaint contains nothing to the purpose save the general statement that the damage to which the respondent is being subjected is in excess of three thousand dollars and the amount involved is in excess of that sum. * * * But where the allegations as to the amount in controversy are challenged by the defendant in an appropriate manner, the plaintiff must support them by competent proof. * * *" and at 279:

> "* * * the allegation of possible damage * * * is wholly inadequate, because

[3] The following colloquy occurred.

"The Court: The theory of this action—I am not deciding the motion, but in this practice of the defendant here, as alleged in the complaint, a loss will result, and a loss probably has resulted because of the advertisement, and because of the cut in prices, that is substantially the position of the plaintiff, is it?

"Mr. Kohn [plaintiff's attorney] Yes.

"Mr. Schultz [defendants' attorney] This Court has no jurisdiction unless they can prove damage of $3,000 or more."

* * * no intimation is given of the character or extent of the damage * * *. The respondent having failed to support the allegations as to amount in controversy the District Court should have dismissed the bill."

[Lack of Jurisdiction]

It is apparent that the district court erred in holding that the matter in controversy herein exceeds the sum of $3,000. The district court had no jurisdiction of this case. Illinois' courts are open to plaintiff.

[Prior Adjudication]

2. On the record before us, we are not concerned with the principle of res judicata. Neither in this court nor in the district court did plaintiff urge that principle applied to the district court's finding in favor of its jurisdiction, as contained in its order for the issuance of a preliminary injunction.

In Murrell v. Stock Growers' Nat. Bank of Cheyenne, 74 F. 2d 827, at 832, the court said:

"A party may waive his right to assert the conclusiveness or bar of a judgment under the doctrine of res judicata."

To the same effect, see 50 C. J. S. 15 and 398.

Not only was the rule of res judicata not relied on by plaintiff in the district court, but that court proceeded to determine anew that it had jurisdiction, when it conducted the hearing which culminated in the judgment from which the present appeal was taken. Several circumstances make this clear. It was stipulated by counsel that all the testimony taken on the hearing for a preliminary injunction should be used on the final hearing of the case. This included testimony of Lind and Teece, which in large part was offered to establish jurisdiction. The remarks of the district judge indicate that he felt that his ruling on jurisdiction at the preliminary hearing was correct and that he was ruling the same way upon the final hearing. He thereupon made a finding of fact that the matter in controversy herein, exclusive of interest and costs, exceeds the sum of $3,000 and he entered a conclusion of law that the court had jurisdiction of the subject matter of the action.

In plaintiff's brief it is frankly stated:

"Upon defendants' appeal from the preliminary injunction entered in this cause, this Court held that the District Court's finding of fact that federal jurisdiction existed was supported by the evidence (221 F. 2d 815, 819). After the trial on the merits the same finding was made upon the same evidence. * * *" (Italics supplied.)

These circumstances show that no one contended in the final hearing that the court's order for a preliminary injunction barred it from making, nor that it did not make, an independent adjudication on the matter of jurisdiction at the time of the final hearing.[4] We, therefore, have a right on this appeal to review the correctness of the latter decision.

For the reasons hereinabove set forth the judgment of the district court is reversed.

Judgment Reversed.

[Dissenting Opinion]

FINNEGAN, Circuit Judge, Dissenting. Actually this is an action by Seagram Distillers Corp. to enjoin the multiple defendants from advertising, offering for sale or selling Seagram products at less than the prices stipulated from time to time in accordance with the Fair Trade contracts entered into by Seagram-Distillers Corporation in the State of Illinois. A preliminary injunction was granted below and we affirmed that restraining order. [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,004] 221 F. 2d 815. After our remand the parties stipulated in the district court:

"Plaintiff is, and at all times mentioned in the complaint has been engaged throughout the United States and Illinois, in the business of dealing in, selling and distributing alcoholic beverages of standard quality produced by Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Ltd., Joheph E. Seagram & Sons, Inc., and corporations affiliated with said corporations. Said bevarages (sometimes hereinafter referred to as 'Seagram products') include Seagram's V. O., Seagram's Seven Crown Blended Whiskey and Seagram Ancient Bottle Gin, and are sold in various sized bottles, the labels or containers of which bear the trade-marks, brands or names of Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Ltd., Joseph E. Seagram & Sons,

Inc. or of corporations affiliated with said corporation, which are the producers thereof. Each of the beverages is, and during all of the times mentioned in the complaint was, in free, fair and open competition with commodities of the same general class, produced by others, and sold and distributed throughout Illinois. Plaintiff herein has for several years prior to the dates mentioned in the complaint expended large sums of money in advertising Seagram products and during the past several years plaintiff expended for such purpose an amount in excess of Five Hundred Thousand Dollars ($500,000.00) in Illinois alone, and the trade-marks, brands or names under which Seagram products are sold have become widely and favorably known to the trade and public generally in Illinois and plaintiff has sold large quantities of each of said products in Chicago and throughout Illinois.

"Plaintiff is and continuously, since long prior to the dates mentioned in the complaint, has been the sole person authorized by the producers of Seagram products to sell and distribute said products in Illinois, and has during all of said time made sales of said products to various wholesale distributors throughout Illinois.

"Plaintiff has executed so-called Fair Trade contracts with large numbers of retailers of alcoholic bevarages in Illinois. A copy of the form of said executed contracts is attached hereto as Exhibit A."

That, in my judgment, is not merely an ineffectual stipulation to confer jurisdiction on the district court, but rather a stipulation of the matter in controversy. Plaintiff's vice-president, Teece, in charge of Central Division of Seagram-Distillers Corporation testified in substance during the preliminary injunction hearings that his company spent in excess of $300,000 for advertising promotion and outdoor signs in Illinois, all in connection with Seagram products. Use of that first record was authorized by order of this court based on the parties' agreement.

Plaintiff brought this action to protect good will manifested under paragraph 3 of the stipulation, quoted above. But I refrain, for the purposes of this dissent from reaching other points raised by defendant's appeal which incidently are far more serious than the short treatment accorded them by the majority.

[Value of Right Protected]

Under 28 U. S. C. § 1332 "The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of all civil actions where the matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of $3,000 exclusive of interest and costs, and is between: (1) Citizens of different States . . ." "By matter in dispute," Mr. Justice Field wrote in Smith v. Adams, 130 U. S. 167, 175 (1889) "is meant the subject of litigation, the matter upon which the action is brought and issue is joined, and in relation to which, if the issue be one of fact, testimony is taken. It is conceded that the pecuniary value of the matter in dispute may be determined, not only by the money judgment prayed, where such is the case, but in some cases by the increased or diminished value of the property directly affected by the relief prayed . . ." Starting with Glenwood Light Co. v. Mutual Light Co., 239 U. S. 117 (1915) there is a line of decisions in various federal courts, permitting "the jurisdictional amount to be calculated on the basis of the property right which is being injured." John B. Kelly v. Lehigh Nav. Coal Co., 151 F. 2d 743, 746 (8th Cir. 1945); First English L. Church v. Evangelical L. Synod, 135 F. 2d 701 (10th Cir. 1953); Purcell v. Summers, 126 F. 2d 390 (4th Cir. 1942). And several of the district judges in our own circuit have thought that in Fair Trade cases the jurisdictional amount is measured by the value of the right to be protected. See e. g. Calvert Distillers Corp. v. Rosen [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,547], 115 F. Supp. 146 (D. C. Ill. 1953).

McNutt v. General Motors, etc., Corp., 298 U. S. 178 (1936) rests upon an attack directed at a regulatory statute. There General Motors sought to restrain enforcement of an Indiana Act regulating the business of purchasing contracts arising out of retail installment sales. In the case before us we are not dealing with state taxation or its regulatory authority but with an alleged invasion by the defendants of a right asserted by plaintiff. If the plaintiff's alleged right fails because of some defect in the Illinois Fair Trade Act that is something else and should be faced. But to stop short and reverse this case on the mechanical basis of a tenuous determination of the jurisdictional dollar sign is an approach I refuse to pursue.

Federal Trade Commission Act

Unfair Practices—Misrepresentation—Medicinal or Curative Properties—Shoe Insert—Validity of Federal Trade Commission Order.—A Federal Trade Commission order prohibiting a manufacturer of a shoe insert from (1) advertising that its insert has a special effect on the cuboid bone of the foot and on other related bones or that its insert is a scientific device, and from (2) making general claims (concerning "balance," "balancer," "improved health," "better posture," "poise," "improvement of stance," "elimination of foot fatigue," and "better foot action") as to the value of its insert was upheld by the United States Supreme Court on an appeal from a judgment of a Court of Appeals affirming the order insofar as it prohibited the making of technical claims but not affirming the order insofar as it prohibited the making of the general claims. The Court of Appeals had held that the general claims as to the value of the insert were within the legitimate field of "puffing" and that doctors' opinions and their few case histories of failures of the device did not overcome the manufacturer's proof of frequent successful use by customers. Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act

Price Discrimination—Individual Purchase Discounts—Cumulative Discounts—Rebates—Legality.—A Federal Trade Commission order prohibiting a manufacturer of automotive parts from discriminating in prices in the sale of its products to purchasers buying under warehouse distributors' sales agreements and purchasers buying under authorized distributors' agreements was affirmed. Under a warehouse distributor's sales agreement, the manufacturer was bound to pay a 20 per cent discount off the current distributor's prices on each factory purchase and 10 per cent on each warehouse purchase. Under an authorized distributor's agreement, a purchaser was allowed a 10 per cent discount and a "performance rebate" of 3 per cent if his accumulated annual purchases were between $3,000 and $6,000, and 5 per cent if such purchases were over $6,000. The two classes of customers competed with each other in the trade areas in which they mutually operated.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Acquisitions of Stock or Assets—Stock Acquisition—Vertical Integration (Supplier Corporation's Acquisition of Stock in Customer Corporation)—Applicability of Prohibition to Holding and Use of Stock—Tendency to Create Monopoly (Reasonable Probability Test)—Relevant Market—Intent.—A chemical company's acquisition, holding, and use of 23 per cent of the stock of an automobile manufacturer, which resulted in a reasonable probability (at the time of suit) of the creation of a monopoly, violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act, as it existed prior to its amendment in 1950. The section, prior to such amendment, applied to an acquisition by a supplier corporation of the stock of a customer corporation, that is, it applied to vertical acquisitions as well as to horizontal acquisitions. Also, Section 7, prior to amendment, was applicable not only to the acquisition of stock but also to the holding and subsequent use of the acquired stock. While the section is designed to arrest the creation of trusts, conspiracies, and monopolies in their incipiency, the word "incipiency" connotes not only the time when the stock is acquired but any time when the acquisition threatens to ripen into a prohibited effect. The statutory policy of fostering free competition is furthered when no supplier has an advantage over his competitors from an acquisition of his customer's stock likely to have the effects condemned by the statute.

The chemical company's commanding position as a supplier of automobile finishes and fabrics to the automobile manufacturer was achieved because its acquisition of the automobile manufacturer's stock, and the consequent close intercompany relationship between the two manufacturers, led to the insulation of most of the automobile manufacturer's market from free competition, with the resultant likelihood, at the time of suit, of the creation of a monopoly of a line of commerce. The bounds of the relevant market, the determination of which is a necessary predicate to a finding of a violation of the Clayton Act because the threatened monopoly must be one which will substantially lessen competition within the area of effective competition, were not coextensive with the total market for finishes and fabrics, but were coextensive with the automobile industry, the relevant market for automobile finishes and fabrics. The market affected was substantial, and there was a likelihood that competition might be foreclosed in a substantial share of that market. The substantiality of a relevant market comprising the automobile industry was undisputed, and the substantiality of the automobile manufacturer's share of that market was fully established. Furthermore, the evidence established that the acquisition was not made solely for investment purposes and that the bulk of the chemical company's production had always supplied the largest part of the requirements of the automobile manufacturer. The chemical company's commanding position was promoted by its stock interest and was not gained solely on competitive merit. It purposely employed its stock to pry open the automobile manufacturer's market to entrench itself as the primary supplier of finishes and fabrics to the automobile manufacturer. It was not requisite to the proof of the violation to show that a restraint or monopoly was intended.

Mr. Justice Brennan delivered the opinion of the Court [In full text]:

This is a direct appeal under § 2 of the Expediting Act[1] from a judgment of the District Court for the Northern District of Illinois,[2] dismissing the Government's action brought in 1949 under § 15 of the Clayton Act.[3] The complaint alleged a violation of § 7 of the Act[4] resulting from the purchase by E. I. du Pont de Nemours and Company in 1917-1919 of a 23% stock interest in General Motors Corporation. This appeal is from the dismissal of the action as to du Pont, General Motors and the corporate holders of large amounts of du Pont stock, Christiana Securities Corporation and Delaware Realty & Investment Company.[5]

[Primary Issue]

The primary issue is whether du Pont's commanding position as General Motors' supplier of automotive finishes and fabrics was achieved on competitive merit alone, or because its acquisition of the General Motors' stock, and the consequent close intercompany relationship, led to the insulation of most of the General Motors' market from free competition, with the resultant likelihood, at the time of suit, of the creation of a monopoly of a line of commerce.

[Clayton Act, Section 7]

The first paragraph of § 7, pertinent here, provides:

> "That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce, where the effect of such acquisition may be to substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to restrain such commerce in any section or community, or tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce."[6]

[4] This action is governed by the Clayton Act as it was before the 1950 amendments, which by their terms are inapplicable to acquisitions prior to 1950. 64 Stat. 1125, 15 U. S. C. § 18.

[5] The amended complaint also alleged violation of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. 26 Stat. 209, as amended, 50 Stat. 693, 15 U. S. C. §§ 1, 2. In view of our determination of the case, we are not deciding the Government's appeal from the dismissal of the action under the Sherman Act.

[6] 38 Stat. 731, 15 U. S. C. (1946 ed.) § 18.

Section 7 is designed to arrest in its incipiency not only the substantial lessening of competition from the acquisition by one corporation of the whole or any part of the stock of a competing corporation, but also to arrest in their incipiency restraints or monopolies in a relevant market which, as a reasonable probability, appear at the time of suit likely to result from the acquisition by one corporation of all or any part of the stock of any other corporation. The section is violated whether or not actual restraints or monopolies, or the substantial lessening of competition, have occurred or are intended. Acquisitions solely for investment are excepted, but only if, and so long as, the stock is not used by voting or otherwise to bring about, or in attempting to bring about, the substantial lessening of competition.

[Vertical Acquisitions]

We are met at the threshold with the argument that § 7 before its amendment applied only to an acquisition of the stock of a competing corporation, and not to an acquisition by a supplier corporation of the stock of a customer corporation—in other words, that the statute applied only to horizontal and not to vertical acquisitions. This is the first case presenting the question in this Court. International Shoe Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 280 U. S. 291, and Thatcher Mfg. Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 272 U. S. 554, involved corporate acquisitions of stock of competitors.

During the 35 years before this action was brought, the Government did not invoke § 7 against vertical acquisitions. The Federal Trade Commission has said that the section did not apply to vertical acquisitions. See F. T. C. Report on Corporate Mergers and Acquisitions, 168 (1955). Also, the House Committee considering the 1950 revision of § 7 stated that ". . . it has been thought by some that this legislation [the 1914 Act] applies only to the so-called horizontal mergers. . . ." H. R. Rep. No. 1191, 81st Cong., 1st Sess. 11. The House Report adds, however, that the 1950 amendment was purposed ". . . to make it clear that the bill applies to all types of mergers and acquisitions, vertical and conglomerate as well as horizontal. . . ." (Italics added.)

This Court has the duty to reconcile administrative interpretations with the broad anti-trust policies laid down by Congress. Cf. Automatic Canteen Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,503], 346 U. S. 61, 74. The failure of the Commission to act is not a binding administrative interpretation that Congress did not intend vertical acquisitions to come within the purview of the Act. Accord, Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. v. Jackson, 353 U. S. 325, —.

[Scope of Clayton Act]

The first paragraph of § 7, written in the disjunctive, plainly is framed to reach not only the corporate acquisition of stock of a competing corporation, where the effect may be substantially to lessen competition between them, but also the corporate acquisition of stock of any corporation, competitor or not, where the effect may be either (1) to restrain commerce in any section or community, or (2) tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce. The amended complaint does not allege that the effect of du Pont's acquisition may be to restrain commerce in any section or community but alleges that the effect was ". . . to tend to create a monopoly in particular lines of commerce . . . ."

Section 7 contains a second paragraph dealing with a holding company's acquisition of stock in two or more corporations.[7] Much of the legislative history of the section deals with the alleged holding company evil.[8] This history does not aid in interpretation because our concern here is with the first paragraph of the section. There is, however, pertinent legislative history which does aid and support our construction.

Senator Chilton, one of the Senate managers of the bill, explained that the House conferees insisted that to prohibit just the acquisitions where the effect was "substan-

[7] This paragraph provides:

"No corporation shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of two or more corporations engaged in commerce where the effect of such acquisition, or the use of such stock by the voting or granting of proxies or otherwise, may be to substantially lessen competition between such corporations, or any of them, whose stock or other share capital is so acquired, or to restrain such commerce in any section or community, or tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce." 38 Stat. 731, 15 U. S. C. (1946 ed.) § 18.

[8] See, e. g., S. Rep. No. 698, 63d Cong., 2d Sess. 13; H. R. Rep. No. 627, 63d Cong., 2d Sess. 17.

tially" to lessen competition would not accomplish the designed aim of the statute, because "a corporation might acquire the stock of another corporation, and there would be no lessening of competition, but the tendency might be to create monopoly or to restrain trade or commerce." "Therefore," said Senator Chilton, "there was added . . . the following: 'Or to restrain such commerce in any section or community or tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.'"[9] This construction of the section, as embracing three separate and distinct effects of a stock acquisition, has also been recognized by a number of federal courts.[10]

[Violation—Test]

We hold that any acquisition by one corporation of all or any part of the stock of another corporation, competitor or not, is within the reach of the section whenever the reasonable likelihood appears that the acquisition will result in a restraint of commerce or in the creation of a monopoly of any line of commerce. Thus, although du Pont and General Motors are not competitors, a violation of the section has occurred if, as a result of the acquisition, there was at the time of suit a reasonable likelihood of a monopoly of any line of commerce. Judge Maris correctly stated in Transamerica Corp. v. Board of Governors [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,536], 206 F. 2d 163, 169:

> "A monopoly involves the power to . . . exclude competition when the monopolist desires to do so. Obviously, under Section 7 it was not necessary . . . to find that . . . [the defendant] has actually achieved monopoly power but merely that the stock acquisitions under attack have brought it measurably closer to that end. For it is the purpose of the Clayton Act to nip monopoly in the bud. Since by definition monopoly involves the power to eliminate competition a lessening of competition is clearly relevant in the determination of the existence of a tendency to monopolize. Accordingly, in order to determine the existence of a tendency to monopoly in . . . any . . . line of business the area or areas of existing effective competition in which monopoly power might be exercised must first be determined. . . ."

Appellees argue that there exists no basis for a finding of a probable restraint or monopoly within the meaning of § 7 because the total General Motors market for finishes and fabrics constituted only a negligible percentage of the total market for these materials for all uses, including automotive uses. It is stated in the General Motors brief that in 1947 du Pont's finish sales to General Motors constituted 3.5% of all sales of finishes to industrial users, and that its fabrics sales to General Motors comprised 1.6% of the total market for the type of fabric used by the automobile industry.

[Relevant Market]

Determination of the relevant market is a necessary predicate to a finding of a violation of the Clayton Act because the threatened monopoly must be one which will substantially lessen competition "within the area of effective competition."[11] Substantiality can be determined only in terms of the market affected. The record shows that automotive finishes and fabrics have sufficient peculiar characteristics and uses to constitute them products sufficiently distinct from all other finishes and fabrics[12] to make

S. C. (1946 ed.) § 14. (Emphasis added.)

[12] For example, the following is said as to finishes in the du Pont brief:

"The largest single finish item which du Pont sells to General Motors is a low-viscosity nitrocellulose lacquer, discovered and patented by du Pont and for which its trademark is 'Duco'.

"The invention and development of 'Duco' represented a truly significant advance in the art of paint making and in the production of automobiles; without 'Duco' mass production of automobiles would not have been possible.

"By the early 1920's the need for better finishing materials for automobiles had become urgent. . . . The varnish method then used in finishing automobiles was described in detail at the trial by automobile pioneers. . . . Finishing an automobile with varnish required an intolerably long time—up to 3 or 4 weeks—to apply the numerous coats needed. When the finish was complete, its longest life expectancy was less than a year, and often it began to peel off before the car was delivered. . . ."

them a "line of commerce" within the meaning of the Clayton Act. Cf. Van Camp & Sons Co. v. American Can Co., 278 U. S. 245.[13] Thus, the bounds of the relevant market for the purposes of this case are not coextensive with the total market for finishes and fabrics, but are coextensive with the automobile industry, the relevant market for automotive finishes and fabrics.[14]

[Substantiality of Relevant Market]

The market affected must be substantial. Standard Fashion Co. v. Magrane-Houston Co., 258 U. S. 346, 357. Moreover, in order to establish a violation of § 7 the Government must prove a likelihood that competition may be "foreclosed in a substantial share of . . . [that market]."[15] Both requirements are satisfied in this case. The substantiality of a relevant market comprising the automobile industry is undisputed. The substantiality of General Motors' share of that market is fully established in the evidence.

General Motors is the colossus of the giant automobile industry. It accounts annually for upwards of two fifths of the total sales of automotive vehicles in the nation.[16] In 1955 General Motors ranked first in sales and second in assets among all United States industrial corporations[17] and became the first corporation to earn over a billion dollars in annual net income.[18] In 1947 General Motors' total purchases of all products from du Pont were $26,628,274, of which $18,938,229 (71%) represented purchases from du Pont's Finishes Division. Of the latter amount purchases of "Duco"[19] and the thinner used to apply "Duco" totaled $12,224,798 (65%), and "Dulux"[20] purchases totaled $3,179,225. Purchases by General Motors of du Pont fabrics in 1948 amounted to $3,700,000, making it the largest account of du Pont's Fabrics Division. Expressed in percentages, du Pont supplied 67% of General Motors' requirements for finishes in 1946 and 68% in 1947.[21] In fabrics du Pont supplied 52.3% of requirements in 1946, and 38.5% in 1947.[22] Because General Motors accounts for almost one-half of the automobile industry's annual sales, its requirements for automotive finishes and fabrics must represent approximately one-half of the relevant market for these materials. Because the record clearly shows that quantitatively and percentagewise du Pont supplies the largest part of General Motors' requirements, we must conclude that du Pont has a substantial share of the relevant market.

[Holding and Use of Stock]

The appellees argue that the Government could not maintain this action in 1949 because § 7 is applicable only to the acquisition

Du Pont's Director of Sales since 1944, Nickowitz, testified as to fabrics sold to automobile manufacturers as follows:

"Q. Now, over the years, isn't it true that speaking generally du Pont has followed the policy in selling its fabrics to the automobile field of undercutting its competitors in price? You don't try to sell it on a lower price than that quoted by any other competitor, do you?

"A. Well, we don't know. We go in and we bid based on our costs. Now, in the automotive industry, we have a different situation than you do in the furniture trade, for example, where you have an established price.

"You see, in the automobile industry, each manufacturer uses a different construction. They all have their own peculiar ideas of what they want about these fabrics. Some want dyed backs, and some want different finishes, so you don't have any standard prices in the automobile industry." (Emphasis added.)

And see extended discussions in the opinion of the trial court, as to finishes, 126 F. Supp., at 288-292, as to fabrics, id., at 296-300.

[14] The General Motors brief states:
"If the market for these products were solely or mainly the General Motors Corporation, or the automobile industry as a whole, General Motors' volume and present share of the automobile industry might constitute a market large enough for the Government to rely on."

of stock and not to the holding or subsequent use of the stock. This argument misconceives the objective toward which § 7 is directed. The Clayton Act was intended to supplement the Sherman Act.[23] Its aim was primarily to arrest apprehended consequences of inter-corporate relationships before those relationships could work their evil, which may be at or any time after the acquisition, depending upon the circumstances of the particular case. The Senate declared the objective of the Clayton Act to be as follows:

> ". . . Broadly stated, the bill, in its treatment of unlawful restraints and monopolies, seeks to prohibit and make unlawful certain trade practices which, as a rule, singly and in themselves, are not covered by the Act of July 2, 1890 [the Sherman Act], or other existing anti-trust acts, and thus, by making these practices illegal, to arrest the creation of trusts, conspiracies, and monopolies in their incipiency and before consummation. . . ." S. Rep. No. 698, 63d Cong., 2d Sess. 1. (Emphasis added.)

"Incipiency" in this context denotes not the time the stock was acquired, but any time when the acquisition threatens to ripen into a prohibited effect. See Transamerica Corp. v. Board of Governors [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,536], 206 F. 2d 163, 166. To accomplish the congressional aim, the Government may proceed at any time that an acquisition may be said with reasonable probability to contain a threat that it may lead to a restraint of commerce or tend to create a monopoly of a line of commerce.[24] Even when the purchase is solely for investment, the plain language of § 7 contemplates an action at any time the stock is used to bring about or in attempting to bring about the substantial lessening of competition.[25]

Prior cases under § 7 were brought at or near the time of acquisition. See, e. g., International Shoe Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 280 U. S. 291; V. Vivaudou, Inc. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 54 F. 2d 273; Federal Trade Comm'n v. Thatcher Mfg. Co., 5 F. 2d 615, rev'd in part on another ground, 272 U. S. 554; United States v. Republic Steel Corp. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,071], 11 F. Supp. 117; Vanadium-Alloys Steel Co., 18 F. T. C. 194. None of these cases holds, or even suggests, that the Government is foreclosed from bringing the action at any time when a threat of the prohibited effects is evident.

[Probability of Restraint]

Related to this argument is the District Court's conclusion that 30 years of nonrestraint negated "any reasonable probability of such a restraint" at the time of the suit.[26] While it is, of course, true that proof of a mere possibility of a prohibited restraint or tendency to monopoly will not establish the statutory requirement that the effect of an acquisition "may be" such restraint or tendency,[27] the basic facts found by the District Court demonstrate the error of its conclusion.[28]

[Position as Supplier]

The du Pont Company's commanding position as a General Motors supplier was not achieved until shortly after its purchase of a sizable block of General Motors stock in 1917.[29] At that time its production for the automobile industry and its sales to General Motors were relatively insignificant. General Motors then produced only about 11% of the total automobile production and its requirements, while relatively substantial, were far short of the proportions they assumed as it forged ahead to its present place in the industry.

[Period Prior to Acquisition]

At least 10 years before the stock acquisition, the du Pont Company, for over a century the manufacturer of military and commercial explosives, had decided to expand its business into other fields. It forsaw the loss of its market for explosives after the United States Army and Navy decided in 1908 to construct and operate their own plants. Nitrocellulose, a nitrated cotton, was the principal raw material used in du Pont's manufacture of smokeless powder. A search for outlets for this raw material uncovered requirements in the manufacture of lacquers, celluloid, artificial leather and artificial silk. The first step taken was the du Pont purchase in 1910 of the Fabrikoid Company, then the largest manufacturer of artificial leather, reconstituted as the du Pont Fabrikoid Company in 1913.

The expansion program was barely started, however, when World War I intervened. The du Pont Company suddenly found itself engulfed with orders for military explosives from foreign nations later to be allies of the United States in the war, and it had to increase its capacity and plant facilities from 700,000 to 37,000,000 pounds per month at a cost exceeding $200,000,000. Profits accumulated and ultimately amounted to $232,000,000. The need to find postwar uses for its expanded facilities and organization now being greater than ever, du Pont continued its expansion program during the war years, setting aside $90,000,000 for the purpose. In September 1915, du Pont bought the Arlington Works, one of the nation's two largest celluloid companies. In June 1916, the Fairfield Rubber Company, producers of rubber-coated fabrics for automobile and carriage tops, was taken over by du Pont Fabrikoid. In March 1917, purchase was made of Harrison Brothers and Company, manufacturers of paint, varnish, acids and certain inorganic chemicals used in paint manufacture. Shortly afterwards, Harrison absorbed Beckton Chemical Company, a color manufacturer, and, also in 1917, the Bridgeport Wood Finishing Company, a varnish manufacturer.

Thus, before the first block of General Motors stock was acquired, du Pont was seeking markets not only for its nitrocellulose, but also for the artificial leather, celluloid, rubber-coated goods, and paints and varnishes in demand by automobile companies. In that connection, the trial court expressly found that ". . . reports and other documents written at or near the time of the investment show that du Pont's representatives were well aware that General Motors was a large consumer of products of the kind offered by du Pont," and that John J. Raskob, du Pont's treasurer and the principal promoter of the investment, "for one, thought that du Pont would ultimately get all that business . . . ."[30]

[Stock Acquisition]

The Company's interest in buying into General Motors was stimulated by Raskob and Pierre S. du Pont, then du Pont's president, who acquired personal holdings of General Motors stock in 1914. General Motors was organized six years earlier by William C. Durant to acquire previously independent automobile manufacturing companies—Buick, Cadillac, Oakland and Oldsmobile. Durant later brought in Chevrolet, organized by him when he was temporarily out of power, during 1910-1915, and a bankers' group controlled General Motors. In 1915, when Durant and the bankers deadlocked on the choice of a Board of Directors, they resolved the deadlock by an agreement under which Pierre S. du Pont was named Chairman of the General Motors Board, and Pierre S. du Pont, Raskob and two nominees of Mr. du Pont were named neutral directors. By 1916, Durant settled his differences with the bankers and resumed the presidency and his controlling position in General Motors. He prevailed upon Pierre S. du Pont and Raskob to continue their interest in General Motors' affairs, which both did as members of the Finance Committee, working closely with Durant in matters of finances and operations and plans for future expansion. Durant persistently urged both men and the "Wilmington people, as he called it,"[31] to buy more stock in General Motors.

Finally, Raskob broached to Pierre S. du Pont the proposal that part of the fund earmarked for du Pont expansion be used in the purchase of General Motors stock. At this time about $50,000,000 of the $90,000,000 fund was still in hand. Raskob foresaw the success of the automobile industry and the opportunity for great profit in a substantial purchase of General Motors stock. On December 19, 1917, Raskob submitted a Treasurer's Report to the du Pont Finance Committee recommending a purchase of General Motors stock in the amount of $25,000,000. That report makes clear that more than just a profitable investment was contemplated. A major consideration was that an expanding General Motors would provide a substantial market needed by the burgeoning du Pont organization. Raskob's summary of reasons in support of the purchase includes this statement: "Our interest in the General Motors Company will undoubtedly secure for us the entire Fabrikoid, Pyralin [celluloid], paint and varnish business of those companies, which is a substantial factor." (Italics added.) [32]

This thought, that the purchase would result in du Pont's obtaining a new and substantial market, was echoed in the Company's 1917 and 1918 annual reports to stockholders. In the 1917 report appears: "Though this is a new line of activity, it is one of great promise and one that seems to be well suited to the character of our organization. The motor companies are very large customers of our Fabrikoid and Pyralin as well as paints and varnishes." (Italics added.) The 1918 report says: "The consumption of paints, varnishes and fabrikoid in the manufacture of automobiles gives another common interest."

[Investment]

This background of the acquisition, particularly the plain implications of the contemporaneous documents, destroys any basis for a conclusion that the purchase was made "solely for investment." Moreover, immediately after the acquisition, du Pont's influence growing out of it was brought to bear within General Motors to achieve primacy for du Pont as General Motors' supplier of automotive fabrics and finishes.

[Purchase Policy]

Two years were to pass before du Pont's total purchases of General Motors stock brought its percentage to 23% of the outstanding stock and its aggregate outlay to $49,000,000. During that period, du Pont and Durant worked under an arrangement giving du Pont primary responsibility for finances and Durant the responsibility for operations. But J. A. Haskell, du Pont's former sales manager and vice-president, became the General Motors vice-president in charge of the operations committee. The trial judge said that Haskell ". . . was willing to undertake the responsibility of keeping du Pont informed of General Motors affairs during Durant's regime . . . ." [33]

Haskell frankly and openly set about gaining the maximum share of the General Motors market for du Pont. In a contemporaneous 1918 document, he reveals his intention to "pave the way for perhaps a more general adoption of our material," and that he was thinking "how best to get cooperation [from the several General Motors Divisions] whereby makers of such of the low priced cars as it would seem possible and wise to get transferred will be put in the frame of mind necessary for its adoption [du Pont's artificial leather]."

Haskell set up lines of communication within General Motors to be in a position to know at all times what du Pont products and what products of du Pont competitors were being used. It is not pure imagination to suppose that such surveillance from that source made an impressive impact upon purchasing officials. It would be understandably difficult for them not to interpret it as meaning that a preference was to be given to du Pont products. Haskell also actively pushed the program to substitute Fabrikoid artificial leathers for genuine leather and sponsored use of du Pont's Pyralin sheeting through a liaison arrangement set up between himself and the du Pont sales organization.

Thus sprung from the barrier, du Pont quickly swept into a commanding lead over its competitors, who were never afterwards in serious contention. Indeed, General Motors' then principal paint supplier, Flint Varnish and Chemical Works, early in 1918 saw the handwriting on the wall. The Flint president came to Durant asking to be bought out, telling Durant, as the trial judge found, that he "knew du Pont had bought a substantial interest in General Motors and was interested in the paint industry; that . . . [he] felt he would lose a valuable customer, General Motors." [34] The du Pont Company bought the Flint Works and later dissolved it.

In less than four years, by August 1921, Lammot du Pont, then a du Pont vice-president and later Chairman of the Board of General Motors, in response to a query from Pierre S. du Pont, then Chairman of the Board of both du Pont and General Motors, "whether General Motors was taking its entire requirements of du Pont products from du Pont," was able to reply that four of General Motors' eight operating divisions bought from du Pont their entire requirements of paints and varnishes, five their entire requirements of Fabrikoid, four their entire requirements of rubber cloth, and seven their entire requirements of Pyralin and celluloid. Lammot du Pont quoted du Pont's sales department as feeling that "the condition is improving and that eventually satisfactory conditions will be established in every branch, but they wouldn't mind seeing things go faster." Pierre S. du Pont responded that "with the change of management at Cadillac, Oakland and Olds [Cadillac was taking very little paints and varnishes, and Oakland but 50%; Olds was taking only part of its requirements for fabrikoid], I believe that you should be able to sell substantially all of the paint, varnish and fabrikoid products needed." He also suggested that "a drive should be made for the Fisher Body business. Is there any reason why they have not dealt with us?"

[34] 126 F. Supp., at 267.

Fisher Body was stubbornly resistant to du Pont sales pressure. General Motors, in 1920, during Durant's time, acquired 60% stock control of Fisher Body Company. However, a voting trust was established giving the Fisher brothers broad powers of management. They insisted on running their own show and for years withstood efforts of high-ranking du Pont and General Motors executives to get them to switch to du Pont from their accustomed sources of supply. Even after General Motors obtained 100% stock control in 1926, the Fisher brothers retained sufficient power to hold out. By 1947 and 1948, however, Fisher resistance had collapsed, and the proportions of its requirements supplied by du Pont compared favorably with the purchases by other General Motors Divisions.

In 1926, the du Pont officials felt that too much General Motors business was going to its competitors. When Pierre S. du Pont and Raskob expressed surprise, Lammot du Pont gave them a breakdown, by dollar amounts, of the purchases made from du Pont's competitors. This breakdown showed, however, that only Fisher Body of the General Motors divisions was obtaining any substantial proportion of its requirements from du Pont's competitors.

Competitors did obtain higher percentages of the General Motors business in later years, although never high enough at any time substantially to affect the dollar amount of du Pont's sales. Indeed it appears likely that General Motors probably turned to outside sources of supply at least in part because its requirements outstripped du Pont's production, when General Motors proportion of total automobile sales grew greater and the company took its place as the sales leader of the automobile industry. For example, an undisputed Government exhibit shows that General Motors took 93% of du Pont's automobile Duco production in 1941 and 83% in 1947.

[Use of Stock Holding]

The fact that sticks out in this voluminous record is that the bulk of du Pont's production has always supplied the largest part of the requirements of the one customer in the automobile industry connected to du Pont by a stock interest. The inference is overwhelming that du Pont's commanding position was promoted by its stock interest and was not gained solely on competitive merit.

We agree with the trial court that considerations of price, quality and service were not overlooked by either du Pont or General Motors. Pride in its products and its high financial stake in General Motors' success would naturally lead du Pont to try to supply the best. But the wisdom of this business judgment cannot obscure the fact, plainly revealed by the record, that du Pont purposely employed its stock to pry open the General Motors market to entrench itself as the primary supplier of General Motors' requirements for automotive finishes and fabrics.[35]

[35] The du Pont policy is well epitomized in a 1926 letter written by a former du Pont employee, J. L. Pratt, when a General Motors vice-president and member of the Executive Committee, to the general manager of a General Motors Division:

"I am glad to know that your manufacturing, chemical and purchasing divisions feel they would be in better hands possibly by dealing with du Pont than with local companies. From a business standpoint no doubt your organization would be influenced to give the business, under equal conditions, to the local concerns. However, I think when General Motors divisions recognize the sacrifice that the du Pont Company made in 1920 and 1921, to keep General Motors Corporation from being put in a very bad light publicly—the du Pont Company going to the extent of borrowing $35,000,000 on its notes when the company was entirely free of debt, in order to prevent a large amount of General Motors stock being thrown on the open market—they should give weight to this which in my mind more than overbalances considera-

Similarly, the fact that all concerned in high executive posts in both companies acted honorably and fairly, each in the honest conviction that his actions were in the best interests of his own company and without any design to overreach anyone, including du Pont's competitors, does not defeat the Government's right to relief. It is not requisite to the proof of a violation of § 7 to show that restraint or monopoly was intended.

[Test of Violation]

The statutory policy of fostering free competition is obviously furthered when no supplier has an advantage over his competitors from an acquisition of his customer's stock likely to have the effects condemned by the statute. We repeat, that the test of a violation of § 7 is whether at the time of suit there is a reasonable probability that the acquisition is likely to result in the condemned restraints. The conclusion upon this record is inescapable that such likelihood was proved as to this acquisition. The fire that was kindled in 1917 continues to smolder. It burned briskly to forge the ties that bind the General Motors market to du Pont, and if it has quieted down, it remains hot, and, from past performance, is likely at any time to blaze and make the fusion complete.[36]

[Equitable Relief]

The judgment must therefore be reversed and the cause remanded to the District Court for a determination after further hearing of the equitable relief necessary and appropriate in the public interest to eliminate the effects of the acquisition offensive to the statute. The District Courts, in the framing of equitable decrees, are clothed "with large discretion to model their judgments to fit the exigencies of the particular case." International Salt Co. v. United States [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,635], 332 U. S. 392, 400-401.

The motion of the appellees Christiana Securities Company and Delaware Realty and Investment Company for dismissal of the appeal as to them is denied. It seems appropriate that they be retained as parties pending determination by the District Court of the relief to be granted.

It is so ordered.

MR. JUSTICE CLARK, MR. JUSTICE HARLAN and MR. JUSTICE WHITTAKER took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

[Dissenting Opinion]

MR. JUSTICE BURTON, whom MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER joins, dissenting.

In June 1949, the United States brought this civil action in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois under § 4 of the Sherman Act and § 15 of the Clayton Act to enjoin alleged violations of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, and § 7 of the Clayton Act. The amended complaint, insofar as pertinent to the issues here, alleged that du Pont and General Motors have been engaged, since 1915, in a combination and conspiracy to restrain and monopolize interstate trade, and that du Pont's acquisition of General Motors' stock had the effect of restraining trade and tending to create a monopoly. In brief it was alleged that, by means of the relationship between du Pont and General Motors, du Pont intended to obtain, and did obtain, an illegal preference over its competitors in the sale to General Motors of its products, and a further illegal preference in the development of chemical discoveries made by General Motors. Appellees denied the charges.

The trial of these issues took nearly seven months. The District Court heard 52 wit-tion of local conditions. In other words, I feel that where conditions are equal from the standpoint of quality, service and price, the du Pont Company should have the major share of General Motors divisions' business on those items that the du Pont Company can take on the basis of quality, service and price. If it is possible to use the product from more than one company I do not think it advisable to give any one company all of the business, as I think it is desirable to always keep a competitive situation, otherwise any supplier is liable to grow slack in seeing that you have the best service and price possible.

"I have expressed my own personal sentiments in this letter to you in order that you might have my point of view, but I do not wish to influence your organization in any way that would be against your own good judgment, keeping in mind that above all the prime consideration is to do the best thing for Delco-Light Company, and that considerations in regard to the du Pont Company or other concerns are secondary, and I am sure this is your feeling."

[36] The potency of the influence of du Pont's 23% stock interest is greater today because of the diffusion of the remaining shares which, in 1947, were held by 436,510 stockholders; 92% owned no more than 100 shares each, and 60% owned no more than 25 shares each. 126 F. Supp., at 244.

nesses, including most of the principal actors, and received over 2,000 exhibits. The evidence contained in the 8,283-page transcript of record covers in minute and intimate detail the facts bearing on the Government's charge that du Pont, by coercion, agreement, control or influence, had interfered unlawfully with General Motors' purchasing and manufacturing policies. On the basis of this evidence, the District Court found that the Government had failed to prove its case and, specifically, that (a) du Pont did not control General Motors, (b) there had been "no limitation or restraint upon General Motors' freedom to deal freely and fully with competitors of du Pont" or upon its "freedom . . . to deal with its chemical discoveries," and (c) after 30 years in which no such restraint had resulted, there was no "basis for a finding that there is or has been any reasonable probability of such a restraint within the meaning of the Clayton Act." [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,905] 126 F. Supp. 235, 335.

The Government's basic contention in this Court is that du Pont violated §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act in that, by means of its alleged control of General Motors, it obtained an unlawful preference with respect to General Motors' purchases of materials. In the closing pages of its brief, and for a few minutes in its oral argument, the Government added the assertion that du Pont had violated § 7 of the Clayton Act in that its stock interest in General Motors "has been used to channel General Motors' purchases to du Pont."

This Court, ignoring the Sherman Act issues which have been the focal point of eight years of litigation, now holds that du Pont's acquisition of a 23% stock interest in General Motors during the years 1917-1919 violates § 7 of the Clayton Act because "at the time of suit [in 1949] there [was] a reasonable probability that the acquisition [was] likely to result in the condemned restraints." Ante, p. 17. In reaching this conclusion, the Court holds (1) that § 7 of the Clayton Act applies to vertical as well as horizontal stock acquisitions; (2) that in determining whether the effect of the stock acquisition is such as to constitute a restraint within § 7, the time chosen by the Government in bringing the action is controlling rather than the time of the acquisition itself; and (3) that § 7 is violated when, at the time of suit, there is a reasonable probability that the stock acquisition is likely to result in the foreclosure of competitors of the acquiring corporation from a substantial share of the relevant market.

In applying these principles to this case, the Court purports to accept the carefully documented findings of fact of the District Court. Actually, it overturns numerous well-supported findings of the District Court by now concluding that du Pont did not purchase General Motors' stock solely for investment; that du Pont's stock interest resulted in practical or working control of General Motors; that du Pont has used or might use this "control" to secure preferences in supplying General Motors with automobile finishes and fabrics; that the relevant market includes only automobile finishes and fabrics; and that there was, even at the time of suit in 1949, a reasonable probability that du Pont's competitors might be foreclosed from a substantial share of this relevant market.

The Court's decision is far reaching. Although § 7 of the Clayton Act was enacted in 1914—over 40 years ago—this is the first case in which the United States or the Federal Trade Commission has sought to apply it to a vertical integration.[1] Likewise, this appears to be the first case in which it ever has been argued that § 7 is applicable to a stock acquisition which took place many years before.[2] The Court, in accepting both of these contentions, disregards the language and purpose of the statute, 40 years of administrative practice, and all the precedents except one District Court decision. The sweeping character of the Court's pronouncement is further evident from the fact that to make its case the Court requires no showing of any misuse of a stock interest—either at the time of acquisition or subsequently—to gain preferential treatment from the acquired corporation. All that is required, if this case is to be our guide, is that some court in some future year be persuaded that a "reasonable probability" then exists that an advantage over competitors in a narrowly construed market may be obtained as a result of the stock interest. Thus, over 40 years after the enactment of the Clayton Act, it now becomes apparent for the first time that § 7 has been a sleeping giant all along. Every corporation which has acquired a stock interest in another corporation after the enactment of the Clayton Act in 1914, and which has had business dealings with that corporation is exposed, retroactively, to the bite of the newly discovered teeth of § 7.

[2] Transamerica Corp. v. Board of Governors [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,536], 206 F. 2d 163 (C. A. 3d Cir. 1953), involved a series of stock acquisitions over many years, some of which took place at about the time of suit.

For the reasons given below, I believe that the Court has erred in (1) applying § 7 to a vertical acquisition; (2) holding that the time chosen by the Government in bringing the action is controlling rather than the time of the stock acquisition itself; and (3) concluding, in disregard of the findings of fact of the trial court, that the facts of this case fall within its theory of illegality.

[Application of Section 7 to Vertical Acquisition]

Section 7 of the Clayton Act, quoted in full in the Appendix, post, pp. 48-49, does not make unlawful all intercorporate acquisitions and mergers.[3] It does not apply to acquisitions of physical assets.[4] It applies only to certain acquisitions of stock, and even then with important exceptions. The first paragraph of § 7, which is the statutory provision primarily involved in this case, provides—

> "That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce, where the effect of such acquisition may be to substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to restrain such commerce in any section or community, or tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce." 38 Stat. 731-732, 15 U. S. C. (1946 ed.) § 18.

This paragraph makes unlawful only those intercorporate stock acquisitions which may result in any of three effects: (1) substantially lessen competition between the acquiring and the acquired corporations; (2) restrain commerce in any section or community; or (3) tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce. The Government concedes that General Motors and du Pont have never been in competition with each other. Since the substantially lessen competition clause applies only to acquisitions involving competing corporations (generally referred to as horizontal acquisitions), that clause concededly is not applicable to this case. The questions before us are whether the other unlawful effects, namely, restraint of commerce in any section or community and tendency to create a monopoly of any line of commerce, are applicable to this case, and, if so, whether the 1917-1919 acquisition of General Motors' stock by du Pont resulted or may result in either of those unlawful effects.

Section 7 never has been authoritatively interpreted as prohibiting the acquisition of stock in a corporation that is not engaged in the same line of business as the acquiring corporation. Although the language of the Act is ambiguous, the relevant legislative history, administrative practice, and judicial interpretation support the conclusion that § 7 does not apply to vertical acquisitions.

The report of the House Committee on the Judiciary, presented by Representative Clayton, stated emphatically that the provisions relating to stock acquisitions by corporations, which originally appeared as § 8 of the bill, were intended to eliminate the evils of holding companies. H. R. Rep. No. 627, 63d Cong., 2d Sess. 17. Although a "holding company" was defined as "a company that holds the stock of another company or companies," the one "evil" referred to was that a holding company "is a means of holding under one control the competing companies whose stocks it has thus acquired." (Italics supplied.) Ibid. Two minority statements appended to the House Report evidence a similar understanding that the provisions of the bill were limited to competing corporations. Id., Pt. 2, p. 6; Pt. 3, p. 8. The substance of the House Report was adopted by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary in its report on the bill. S. Rep. No. 698, 63d Cong., 2d Sess. 13, 43, 46.

[3] Section 7 of the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 731, 15 U. S. C. (1946 ed.) § 18, was amended in 1950 so as to broaden its application, 64 Stat. 1125, 15 U. S. C. § 18. The amendments, by their terms, were inapplicable to acquisitions made before 1950. Thus this case is governed by the original language of § 7 and not by § 7, as amended.

[4] One of the earliest rulings of the Federal Trade Commission was that § 7 did not prohibit asset acquisitions. 1 F. T. C. 541-542. The primary purpose of the 1950 amendments was to bring asset acquisitions within § 7. Proponents of the 1950 amendments asserted on several occasions that the omission of asset acquisitions in the original Clayton Act had been inadvertent. See, e. g., 96 Cong. Rec. 16443. However, the legislative history of the Clayton Act demonstrates that the purpose of § 7 was to prevent the formation of holding companies and certain evils peculiar to stock acquisitions, particularly the secrecy of ownership. See 51 Cong. Rec. 9073, 14254, 14316, 14420, 14456; H. R. Rep. No. 627, 63d Cong., 2d Sess. 17; S. Rep. No. 698, 63d Cong., 2d Sess. 13.

The extensive debates on the bill in each House of Congress contain many detailed discussions of the provisions relating to intercorporate stock acquisitions. These discussions are devoid of any suggestion that the provisions were to apply to vertical acquisitions.[5] On the contrary, these provisions of the bill were repeatedly described as prohibiting the acquisition of stock of competing companies.[6] The one specific reference to a vertical acquisition during the entire debate on these provisions ended with a flat statement by Senator Reed to the effect that the bill as then written (containing the tendency toward monopoly clause but not the restraint of commerce clause) would not prevent a steel manufacturing corporation from acquiring stock in an ore producing corporation, a classic type of vertical integration.[7] A reading of the legislative history of the bill leaves the distinct impression that intercorporate relationships between buyers and sellers which resulted in noncompetitive preferences were intended to be dealt with exclusively by the provision forbidding interlocking directorates (§ 8 of the Clayton Act), if not covered by the specific prohibitions of certain price discriminations (§ 2), and of certain exclusive selling or leasing contracts (§ 3).[8]

Forty years of administrative practice provide additional support for this view. Neither the Department of Justice nor the Federal Trade Commission, the two principal enforcing agencies, has brought any action under old § 7 (other than the instant case) that has not involved a stock acquisition in allegedly competing corporations. The Federal Trade Commission repeatedly has declared its understanding that § 7, prior to its amendment in 1950, applied only to competing corporations.[9] In a recent report it stated without qualification:

> "While the 1914 act applied solely to horizontal mergers, the 1950 act applies not only to horizontal acquisitions but to vertical and conglomerate acquisitions

[5] The remarks of Senator Chilton relied on by the majority, ante, p. 3, do not indicate that he thought that § 7 was applicable to vertical acquisitions. His statements indicate merely that he thought that the restraint and monopoly clauses of § 7 were not entirely synonymous with the substantially lessen competition clause.

[6] See, e. g., 51 Cong. Rec. 9270-9271 (Representative Carlin); id., at 9554 (Representative Barkley); id., at 14254-14255 (Senator Cummins); id., at 14313 (Senator Reed); id., at 15856-15861 (Senator Walsh); id., at 15940 (Senator Nelson); id., at 16001 (Senator Chilton); id., at 16320 (Representative Floyd).

[7] 51 Cong. Rec. 14455. Senator Reed had offered an amendment to the first paragraph of § 7 which would have prevented a corporation from acquiring stock in another corporation engaged in the same line of business. This was an attempt to stiffen the bill in order to relieve the Government from proving that competition had been substantially lessened by the acquisition, an element of proof which he, Senator Cummins, and others thought would be quite difficult. See 51 Cong. Rec. 14254-14255, 14419-14420. Senator Chilton asked Senator Reed whether his amendment would prevent a corporation engaged in the manufacture of steel from acquiring stock in a corporation engaged in the production of iron ore. Senator Reed replied that his amendment would not bar such an acquisition, but that neither would the bill as written:

"But I call the Senator's attention to the fact that if the illustration he uses would not be covered by the language of my amendment it certainly would not be covered by the language I seek to amend. His argument would go as much against that, and even more than against my amendment. I do not claim that this will stop everything. I claim that it will be a long step in that direction." Id., at 14455.

No one disputed Senator Reed's interpretation of § 7.

[8] See, e. g., the statement by Representative Carlin, one of the managers of the bill in the House, to the effect that the interlocking directorate provision contained in § 8 would prevent a director of a corporation which supplied railroads with materials from becoming a railroad director and, in effect, "buy[ing] supplies from himself." 51 Cong. Rec. 9272.

[9] See, e. g., F. T. C., Ann. Rep. for Fiscal Year 1929, 6-7, 60, where the Commission stated that it could take no corrective action under the Clayton Act against large consolidations in the food industry "even though the consolidation was effected through the acquisition or exchange of capital stock," because "most of these consolidations and acquisitions were of corporations engaged in the distribution of allied but noncompetitive products." See also, F. T. C., Ann. Rep. for Fiscal Year 1927, 13-15; Statement by Chief Counsel Kelley in Hearings before a Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary on H. which might substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly." F. T. C., Report on Corporate Mergers and Acquisitions (May 1955), 168, H. R. Doc. No. 169, 84th Cong., 1st Sess.

Beginning in 1927, the Federal Trade Commission included in its annual recommendations to Congress a request that § 7 be amended to remedy its inadequacies. This result was achieved in 1950. 64 Stat. 1125, 15 U. S. C. § 18. As the Court recognizes in its opinion, ante, p. 3, n. 6, one of the reasons for amending § 7 in 1950 was, in the words of the House Report on the amendments, "to make it clear that the bill applies to all types of mergers and acquisitions, vertical and conglomerate as well as horizontal . . . ." H. R. Rep. No. 1191, 81st Cong., 1st Sess. 11. Forty years of established administrative practice, acquiesced in and recognized by Congress, is persuasive evidence of the proper scope of § 7. Federal Trade Commission v. Bunte Bros., Inc. [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,098], 312 U. S. 349, 351-352.

The cases cited by the Court, with the one exception of Ronald Fabrics Co. v. Verney Brunswick Mills, Inc., CCH 1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,514 (D. C. S. D. N. Y. 1946),[10] do not support the Court's conclusion that § 7 applies to a vertical acquisition. In Aluminum Co. of America v. Federal Trade Commission, 284 F. 401 (C. A. 3d Cir. 1922), the Aluminum Company, which previously had had a monopoly of all sheet aluminum produced in the United States, acquired control through an intermediary corporation of a competing sheet aluminum company established in 1916. A divestiture order of the Federal Trade Commission was upheld, the court holding that the stock acquisition substantially lessened competition and tended to create a monopoly of the sheet aluminum business. In United States v. New England Fish Exchange, 258 F. 732 (D. C. Mass. 1919), two holding companies which had acquired the stock of virtually all the wholesale fish dealers trading on the New England Fish Exchange, which handled about 95% of all the ground fish sold in interstate commerce in the United States, were held to have violated the provisions of § 7. Each of these cases was concerned with the acquisition of directly competing corporations—not vertical acquisitions. Statements in the opinions, not essential to the decisions, merely stand for the proposition that the restraint and monopoly clauses of § 7 are not entirely synonymous with the substantially lessen competition clause.

Assuming that the three unlawful effects mentioned in § 7 are not entirely synonymous with each other,[11] such an assumption does not require the conclusion that § 7 was intended to apply to vertical acquisitions as well as to horizontal acquisitions. Corporations engaged in the same business activity in different areas do not necessarily "compete" with each other so that their combination would substantially lessen competition between them, even though their combination might result in a restraint of commerce or a tendency toward monopoly violative of § 7. Such a possibility was presented in Transamerica Corp. v. Board of Governors [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,536], 206 F. 2d 163 (C. A. 3d Cir. 1953), where a banking corporation through a series of transactions acquired stock in 48 local banking corporations, most of which were located in communities in which no other bank was acquired. A divestiture order of the Board was reversed on the ground that the Board had not proved that the acquisitions of these banks in five western States either substantially lessened competition or tended to create a monopoly.

Finally, this Court has twice construed old § 7 as applying only to stock acquisitions involving competing corporations. In Inter-

[10] In the Ronald Fabrics case, a rayon converter alleged that a competing corporation had restrained commerce by acquiring control of a source of supply of rayon. The District Court held that this allegation stated a cause of action under § 7 of the Clayton Act.

[11] A minority in the Senate, led by Senators Cummins and Walsh, sought to strike out the "tend to create a monopoly" language of § 7. 51 Cong. Rec. 14314-14316, 14319, 14459-14461. They argued that this language was superfluous because the creation of a monopoly always substantially lessened competition, and because the Sherman Act contained similar language, and that there was a danger that the language would be considered as an implied repeal of the Sherman Act. The failure of these efforts to eliminate the tendency toward monopoly clause (the restraint of commerce clause had not been added to § 7 at this time) indicates that the tendency toward monopoly clause was not intended to be limited to situations already encompassed by the substantially lessen competition clause. Similarly, the remarks of Senator Chilton, quoted by the Court from 51 Cong. Rec. 16002, ante, pp. 4-5, indicate that he thought the tendency toward monopoly and restraint of commerce clauses added something. But I find no evidence that what they did add included vertical acquisitions.

national Shoe Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 280 U. S. 291 (1930), the Court held that the acquisition of the fifth largest shoe manufacturing company by the largest shoe manufacturer did not violate either the substantially lessen competition clause or the restraint of commerce clause of § 7 because the pre-existing competition between the two corporations was insubstantial, and because the acquired corporation was in a precarious financial condition. Substantial pre-existing competition was said to be a requisite for violation of either clause of § 7. 280 U. S., at 298, 303. An even more direct holding is found in Thatcher Mfg. Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 272 U. S. 554 (1926), where this Court affirmed that portion of the lower court's decree which had allowed Thatcher, a milk bottle manufacturer, to retain the assets of Woodbury, a bottle manufacturer specializing in condiment and whiskey bottles, on the ground that the acquisition did not violate any of the three clauses of § 7 since Thatcher was not in competition with Woodbury. 272 U. S., at 560, affirming in part and reversing in part Federal Trade Commission v. Thatcher Mfg. Co., 5 F. 2d 615 (C. A. 3d Cir. 1925). These holdings apparently will be overruled sub silentio by today's decision.

The legislative history, administrative practice, and judicial interpretation of § 7 provide the perspective in which the Government's present assertion that § 7 applies to vertical acquisitions should be viewed. Seen as a whole, they offer convincing evidence that § 7, properly construed, has reference only to horizontal acquisitions. I would so hold. However, even if the opposite view be accepted, the foregoing views of the enforcing agencies and the courts are material to a proper consideration of the other issues which must then be reached.

II.

[Time Controlling Bringing of Action]

In this case the Government is challenging, in 1949, a stock acquisition that took place in 1917-1919. The Court, without advancing reasons to support its conclusion, holds that in determining whether the effect of the stock acquisition is such as to violate § 7, the time chosen by the Government in bringing its suit is controlling rather than the time of the acquisition of the stock. This seems to me to ignore the language and structure of § 7, the purpose of the Clayton Act, and all existing administrative and judicial precedents.

The first paragraph of § 7 provides that "no corporation . . . shall acquire . . . the stock . . . of another corporation . . . where the effect of such acquisition may be . . . ." Yet the Court construes this provision as if it read "no corporation . . . shall acquire or continue to hold . . . the stock . . . of another corporation . . . whenever it shall appear that the effect of such acquisition or continued holding may be . . . ." Continued holding, to be sure, is a prerequisite to any action under § 7 because, if the stock is no longer held, the violation has been purged and there is nothing to divest.[12] But the fact of continued holding does not allow the Government to dispense with the necessity of proving that the stock was unlawfully acquired. The offense described by § 7 is the acquisition, not the holding or the use, of stock. When the acquisition has been made, the offense, if any, is complete. The statutory language is unequivocal. It makes the test the probable effect of the acquisition at the time of the actual acquisition, and not at some later date to be arbitrarily chosen by the Government in bringing suit.

The distinction carefully made in the several paragraphs of § 7 between an unlawful acquisition and an unlawful use of stock reinforces this conclusion. The first paragraph of § 7, which speaks only in terms of acquisition of stock, is concerned solely with the purchase of stock in "another corporation." It is the only provision that is applicable in this case. The second paragraph, which expressly prohibits both acquisition and use, is concerned with stock purchases in "two or more corporations." Concededly, it is not applicable here. When Congress chose to make unlawful the use of stock subsequent to its acquisition, it did so in specific terms. The omission of the phrase "or the use of such stock by the voting or granting of proxies or otherwise," contained in the second paragraph of § 7, from the first paragraph of the section was not inadvertent. The phrase therefore cannot be read into the first paragraph of § 7.[13]

[13] It might be argued that the mention of subsequent misuse in the third paragraph of

The Clayton Act was not intended to replace the Sherman Act in remedying actual restraints and monopolies. Its purpose was to supplement the Sherman Act by checking anticompetitive tendencies in their incipiency, before they reached the point at which the Sherman Act comes into play. This purpose was well stated in the Senate Report on the bill:

> "Broadly stated, the bill, in its treatment of unlawful restraints and monopolies, seeks to prohibit and make unlawful certain trade practices which, as a rule, singly and in themselves, are not covered by the act of July 2, 1890, or other existing antitrust acts, and thus, by making these practices illegal, to arrest the creation of trusts, conspiracies, and monopolies in their incipiency and before consummation." S. Rep. No. 698, 63d Cong., 2d Sess. 1.

This purpose places emphasis on the probable anticompetitive effects of transactions or occurrences viewed as of the date of their occurrence. The determination required by the Act is one of predicting the probable outcome of a particular transaction, here an acquisition of stock in another corporation. If, at the time of the stock acquisition, a potential threat to competition is apparent, the acquisition is unlawful under § 7. If, on the other hand, a potential threat to competition is not then apparent, an antitrust violation is not involved unless subsequent use of the stock constitutes a restraint of trade prohibited by the Sherman Act.[14]

The Court ignores the all-important lawfulness or unlawfulness of the stock acquisition at or about the time it occurred, and limits its attention to the probable anticompetitive effects of the continued holding of the stock at the time of suit, some 30 years later. The result is to subject a good-faith stock acquisition, lawful when made, to the hazard that the continued holding of the stock may make the acquisition illegal through unforeseen developments. Such a view is not supported by the statutory language and violates elementary principles of fairness. Suits brought under the Clayton Act are not subject to any statute of limitations, and it is doubtful whether the doctrine of laches applies as against the Government. The result is that unexpected and unforeseeable developments occurring long after a stock acquisition can be used to challenge the legality of continued holding of the stock. In such an action, the Government need only prove that probable rather than actual anticompetitive effects exist as of the time of suit. The Government may thus set aside a transaction which was entirely lawful when made, merely by showing that it would have been unlawful had it occurred at the time of suit, many years later. The growth of the acquired corporation, a fortuitous decline in the number of its competitors, or the achievement of control by an accidental diffusion of other stock may result, under this test, in rendering the originally lawful acquisition unlawful ab initio. Strikingly enough, all of these factors are involved in this case.[15]

The Court's holding is unfair to the individuals who entered into transactions on the assumption, justified by the language of § 7, that their actions would be judged by the facts available to them at the time they made their decision.

§ 7, the investment proviso, enlarges the substantive content of the first paragraph of § 7. This paragraph provides that "This section shall not apply to corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment and not using the same by voting or otherwise to bring about, or in attempting to bring about, the substantial lessening of competition." But the mention of use in this paragraph has the effect of limiting the exception it contains, i. e., the exception for stock purchased "solely for investment." This exception is lost if the stock is subsequently misused. But the exception contained in this paragraph does not come into play unless the acquisition first comes within the substantive prohibition of the first two paragraphs of § 7. This limitation on the exception cannot expand the substantive prohibition to which the exception applies.

[14] It may be that § 7 is inapplicable when the Government fails to bring suit within a reasonable period after the consummation of the stock acquisition. If so, the 30 years here involved would exceed a reasonable period of incipiency. Even though § 7 of the Clayton Act, under this theory, would be inapplicable, any alleged restraint could be dealt with under the Sherman Act.

[15] The Court apparently concedes that du Pont's stock acquisition in General Motors was lawful when made because "its sales to General Motors were relatively insignificant" at that time and because "General Motors then produced only about 11% of the total automobile production . . . ." Ante, p. 12. Throughout, the Court stresses the growth in size of General Motors. Ante, pp. 8-9, 12. The decline in the number of automobile manufacturers is not mentioned, but is well known. And the Court states that diffusion of General Motors' stock through the years has increased "The potency of the influence of du Pont's 23% stock interest . . . ." Ante, p. 20, n. 36.

"The prohibition [of § 7] is addressed to parties who contemplate engaging in merger transactions and is meant, in the first instance, to guide them in deciding upon a course of action. The only standard they are capable of applying is one addressed to the circumstances viewed as of the date of the proposed transaction. Since this is the standard which the parties must apply in deciding whether to undertake a transaction, it seems reasonable to conclude that it is the standard which enforcement agencies should apply in deciding whether the transaction violates the statute." Neal, The Clayton Act and the Transamerica Case, 5 Stan. L. Rev. 179, 220-221.

The Court cites no authority in support of its new interpretation of this 40-year-old statute. On the other hand, examination of the dozen or more cases brought under § 7 reveals that in every case the inquiry heretofore has centered on the probable anticompetitive effects of the stock acquisition at or near the time it was made.[16] See, e.g., International Shoe Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 280 U. S. 291 (1930); Transamerica Corp. v. Board of Governors [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,536], 206 F. 2d 163 (C. A. 3d Cir. 1953); V. Vivaudou, Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 54 F. 2d 273 (C. A. 2d Cir. 1931); Federal Trade Commission v. Thatcher Mfg. Co., 5 F. 2d 615 (C. A. 3d Cir. 1925), rev'd in part on another ground, 272 U. S. 554; United States v. Republic Steel Corp. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,071], 11 F. Supp. 117 (D. C. N. D. Ohio 1935); In re Vanadium-Alloys Steel Co., 18 F. T. C. 194 (1934). The conclusion thus seems inescapable that the unlawfulness of a stock acquisition under the first paragraph of § 7 properly turns on the potential threat to competition created by the acquisition of the stock at the time of its acquisition and not by its subsequent use.

That the time of acquisition is controlling does not mean that the Government is unable to bring an action if it fails to proceed within a few years of the stock acquisition. It means only that if the Government chooses to bring its action many years later, it must prove what § 7 plainly requires—that the acquisition threatened competition when made.

Nor does it mean that evidence of subsequent events is necessarily irrelevant. Evidence that anticompetitive effects have occurred since the acquisition, and that these effects are traceable to the original acquisition rather than to other factors, may support an inference that such effects were "reasonably probable" at the time of acquisition. The element of causation is the necessary link with the past. However, if events subsequent to the acquisition indicate that no anticompetitive effects have occurred, that evidence may support an inference that an unlawful potential did not exist at the time of acquisition. Evidence as to what happened after the acquisition is relevant to the extent that it bears on the central question whether, at the time of the acquisition, there was a reasonable probability of a threat to competition.

I agree with the Court that § 7 does not require findings and conclusions of actual anticompetitive effects. Unlike the Sherman Act, § 7 merely requires proof of a reasonable probability of a substantial lessening of competition, restraint of commerce, or tendency toward monopoly. International Shoe Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 280 U. S. 291; Transamerica Corp. v. Board of Governors [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,536], 206 F. 2d 163. When a vertical acquisition is involved, its legality thus turns on whether there is a reasonable probability that it will foreclose competition from a substantial share of the market, either by significantly restricting access to needed supplies or by significantly limiting the market for any product. See Report of the Attorney General's National Committee to Study the Antitrust Laws (1955) 122-127. The determination of such probable economic consequences requires study of the markets affected, of the companies involved in relation to those markets, and of the probable immediate and future effects on competition. A mere showing that a substantial dollar volume of sales is involved cannot suffice. As the Court says, "The market affected must be substantial," ante, p. 8, and "Substantiality can be determined only in terms of the market affected," ante, p. 6. Section 7 thus requires a case-by-case analysis of the relevant economic factors.

[16] Except in this case, the enforcing agencies appear never to have brought an action under § 7 more than four years after the date of the acquisition. Consequently, the precise problem raised here has not been directly adjudicated. Nevertheless, the cases cited in the text spell out the proof required for a violation of § 7, and thus have an important bearing on this problem.

However, when, as here, the Government brings a proceeding nearly 30 years after a stock purchase, it must prove that the acquisition was unlawful when made (i. e., that there was a reasonable probability at that time that du Pont's competitors would be foreclosed from a substantial share of the relevant market), and also that the effect of the acquisition continued to be harmful to competition at the time suit was brought. Illegality at the time of acquisition is required by the first paragraph of § 7; continuing illegality is a prerequisite for obtaining equitable relief. See United States v. W. T. Grant Co. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,493], 345 U. S. 629; United States v. Oregon Medical Society [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,264], 343 U. S. 326, 333; United States v. South Buffalo R. Co., 333 U. S. 771, 774. This is particularly true under § 7 since it is a prophylactic measure designed to prevent stock acquisitions which probably will have a deleterious effect on competition. Proof that competition has not in fact been harmed during a long period following a stock acquisition itself indicates that a restraint in the future is unlikely. In such a case, the actual effect of the acquisition largely supplants the conjecture as to its probable effects which otherwise must be relied upon.

In this case, the District Court found that the challenged acquisition, which took place "over thirty years ago," had not resulted in any restraint of trade "In those many intervening years . . . ." The District Court properly concluded that, when there had been no restraint for 30 years, "there is not . . . any basis for a finding that there is . . . any reasonable probability of such a restraint within the meaning of the Clayton Act." 126 F. Supp., at 335. If the evidence supports the District Court's conclusion that there has been no restraint for 30 years, the judgment below must be affirmed.

III.

[Theory of Illegality Applied to Facts of Case]

The remaining issues are factual: (1) whether the record establishes the existence of a reasonable probability that du Pont's competitors will be foreclosed from securing General Motors' trade, and (2) whether the record establishes that such foreclosure, if probable, involves a substantial share of the relevant market and significantly limits the competitive opportunities of others trading in that market. In discussing these factual issues, I meet the Court on its own ground, that is, I assume that the old § 7 applies to vertical acquisitions, and that the potential threat at the time of suit is controlling. Even on that basis the record does not support the Court's conclusion that § 7 was violated by this 1917-1919 stock acquisition.

A. FORECLOSURE OF COMPETITORS

This is not a case where a supplier corporation has merged with its customer corporation with the result that the supplier's competitors are automatically and completely foreclosed from the customer's trade.[17] In this case, the only connection between du Pont, the supplier, and General Motors, the customer, is du Pont's 23% stock interest in General Motors. A conclusion that such a stock interest automatically forecloses du Pont's competitors from selling to General Motors would be without justification. Whether a foreclosure has occurred in the past or is probable in the future is a question of fact turning on the evidence in the record.

The Court, at the outset of its opinion, states that the primary issue is whether du Pont's position as a substantial supplier to General Motors "was achieved on competitive merit alone," or resulted from du Pont's stock interest in General Motors. Ante, p. 2. In resolving this issue, the Court states that the "basic facts" are not in dispute and hence that it is unnecessary to set aside the findings of fact of the District Court as clearly erroneous. See Fed. Rules Civ. Proc., 52(a). The basic facts are said to be that du Pont had no standing as a General Motors' supplier before the stock purchases of 1917-1919, that it gained a "commanding position" after the stock purchases, and that certain items of evidence in this gigantic record tend to indicate that du Pont hoped to get and actually did get a preference in General Motors' trade. From these alleged facts the Court draws the conclusion that du [17] Cf. United States v. Columbia Steel Co. [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,260], 334 U. S. 495, holding that even the exclusion of competition resulting from complete vertical integration does not violate the Sherman Act unless competition in a substantial portion of a market is restrained.

Pont has misused its 23% stock interest in General Motors "to entrench itself as the primary supplier of General Motors' requirements for automotive finishes and fabrics." Ante, p. 19. "The inference is overwhelming," the Court concludes, "that du Pont's commanding position was promoted by its stock interest and was not gained solely on competitive merit." Ante, pp. 18-19. With these words, the Court overturns the District Court's unequivocal findings to the effect that du Pont was a principal supplier to General Motors prior to the 1917-1919 stock purchases, that du Pont maintained this position in the years following the stock purchases, and that for the entire 30-year period preceding the suit, General Motors' purchases of du Pont's products were based solely on the competitive merits of those products. The evidence supporting these findings of the District Court may be summarized as follows:

Du Pont is primarily a manufacturer of chemicals and chemical products. Thousands of its products could be used by General Motors in manufacturing automobiles, appliances and machinery. Despite du Pont's sales efforts over a period of 40 years, General Motors buys many of the commodities produced by du Pont from du Pont's competitors.[18] The Court, ignoring the many products which General Motors declines to buy from du Pont or which it buys only in small quantities, concentrates on the few products which du Pont has sold in large volume to General Motors for many years—paints and fabrics. Before examining the history of those large-volume purchases, it is essential to understand where and by whom purchasing decisions within General Motors have been made.

For many years, General Motors has been organized into some 30 operating divisions, each of which has final authority to make, and does make, its own purchasing decisions. This decentralized management system places full responsibility for purchasing decisions on the officers of the respective divisions. To speak of "selling to General Motors" is, therefore, misleading. A prospective supplier, instead of selling to General Motors, sells to Chevrolet, or Frigidaire, or Ternstedt, or Delco Light, as divisions. Moreover, when there are several plants within a division, each plant frequently has its own purchasing agent and presents a separate selling job.

The record discloses that each division buys independently, that the pattern of buying varies greatly from one division to another, and that within each division purchases from du Pont have fluctuated greatly in response to price, quality, service and other competitive considerations. For example, Oldsmobile is the only division which buys antifreeze from du Pont and one of the two car divisions which does not finish its cars with Duco. Buick alone buys du Pont motor enamel, and Cadillac alone uses du Pont's copper electroplating exclusively. Thus the alleged nefarious influence arising from du Pont's stock interest apparently affects the Oldsmobile antifreeze buyer, but not the Oldsmobile paint buyer; the paint buyers at Chevrolet, Buick and Pontiac, but not the antifreeze or electroplating buyers; and the electroplating buyer at Cadillac, but not the Cadillac paint buyer.

1. Paints.—Du Pont, for many years, has had marked success in the manufacture and sale of paints, varnishes, lacquers and related products.[19] In 1939, it produced 9.5% of the total dollar value of all finishes produced in the United States and, in 1947, 8.1%. In recent years, approximately three-fourths of du Pont's total sales to General Motors have consisted of industrial finishes.[20] Although du Pont has been General Motors' principal supplier of paint for many years, General Motors continues to buy about 30% of its paint requirements from competitors of du Pont.[21] Moreover, the sales of paint from du Pont to General Motors do not bulk large in the respective total sales and purchases of either company. In 1948, du Pont's finish sales to General Motors were only 3% of its total sales of all products; they were an infinitesimal percentage of General Motors' total purchases.

Two products account for a high proportion of these finish sales to General Motors: "Duco," a nitrocellulose lacquer invented and patented by du Pont, and "Dulux," a synthetic resin enamel developed by du Pont.[22] However, Duco and Dulux did not come into commercial use until 1924 and 1931, respectively, and du Pont's position as a principal manufacturer of finishes was attained much earlier.

Du Pont first assumed a leading position in the automotive finish field with its acquisition, in 1918, of a majority of the stock of the Flint Varnish & Color Works at Flint, Michigan. At that time, and for some years before, Flint supplied the finishes used on all General Motors' cars except Cadillac, and also for many other automobile companies. Du Pont's acquisition of General Motors' stock in 1917-1919 did not influence the General Motors' divisions in purchasing from Flint. In 1921, Flint lost one-half of the Oakland business and, in 1923, a substantial portion of the business at Buick, Oakland and Oldsmobile. 126 F. Supp., at 288.

The invention and development of Duco in the early 1920's represented a significant technological advance. Automobiles previously had been finished by applying numerous coats of varnish. The finishing process took from 12 to 33 days, and the storage space and working capital tied up in otherwise completed cars were immense. The life expectancy of varnish finishes was less than a year. In December 1921, General Motors created a Paint and Enamel Committee which contacted numerous paint manufacturers in an attempt to find a quicker drying and more durable finish.

Meanwhile, du Pont had been doing pioneering work in nitrocellulose lacquers. In 1920, a du Pont employee invented a quick drying and durable lacquer which contained a large amount of film-forming solids. This patented finish, named Duco, was submitted to the General Motors Paint and Enamel Committee in 1922 to be tested

[19] The following table compares du Pont's total sales of industrial finishes in recent years with its sales of the same finishes to General Motors:

Year	Sales to General Motors: Duco	Other finishes	Total	Total finish sales	Sales to General Motors as percent of total sales
1938	$ 4,569,604	$1,625,625	$ 6,195,229	$ 31,357,134	19.8
1939	6,312,005	2,448,844	8,760,849	38,514,763	22.7

1947	12,224,798	6,713,431	18,938,229	105,266,655	18.0

The years 1942 through 1945 are omitted from all tables because of the suspension of automobile production during the war.

[20] In 1947, a typical year, General Motors' total purchases of all products from du Pont were $26,628,274. Of this amount, $18,938,229, or 71% of the total, was finishes.

[21] In 1947, over 400 paint manufacturers other than du Pont sold finishes to General Motors. The total amount they sold was $8,635,000, 31.6% of General Motors' requirements. Twenty-five companies, other than du Pont, each sold amounts of finishes to General Motors in excess of $30,000 in that year; one company sold as much as $3,205,000.

Duco	$12,224,798	65%
Dulux	3,179,225	17
All Others	3,534,206	18
	$18,938,229	100%

Thus, Duco and Dulux comprised 82% of du Pont's finish sales to General Motors in that year.

along with finishes of other manufacturers. After two years of testing and improvement, the Paint and Enamel Committee became satisfied that Duco was far superior to any other product or any other method of finishing automobiles then available.

The gradual adoption of Duco by some of the General Motors' car divisions, viewed in conjunction with its proved superiority as an auto finish, illustrates the independent buying of each division and demonstrates that Duco made its way on its own merits. Oakland (now Pontiac) first adopted Duco for use on its open cars in 1924. The new finish was an immense success and was used on all Oakland cars the following year. Buick and Chevrolet adopted Duco in 1925, but Cadillac, which had offered it as an optional finish in 1925, did not abandon varnish for Duco until 1926.[23]

From the beginning, General Motors continued to look for competitive materials. Letters were sent to other manufacturers urging them to submit samples of their pyroxylin paint for testing. Until 1927, none of the competing lacquers was comparable in quality to Duco. But the strenuous efforts by General Motors to develop competitive sources of lacquer eventually worked a substantial change in the du Pont position. Oldsmobile and Cadillac switched to a competitor, Rinshed-Mason, in 1927, and have continued to buy almost exclusively from that company ever since. Chevrolet, Buick and Pontiac continued to buy Duco, partly because of better service from nearby du Pont plants, and partly because repeated testing failed to disclose any lacquer superior to Duco.

Finally, the success of Duco has never been confined to the General Motors' car divisions. In 1924 and 1925, nearly all car manufacturers abandoned varnish for Duco. By the end of 1925, all cars, except Ford and Cadillac, were using Duco. Nash, Hudson, Studebaker, Packard and Willys have bought, and still buy, Duco in substantial amounts from du Pont. Chrysler bought Duco in large volume until the early 1930's when, in pursuance of a policy to obtain suppliers to whom it would be the most important customer, it concentrated its purchases on one company, Pittsburgh Plate Glass. Ford has chosen to make a large part of its own requirements. During the 1920's when Ford was losing its leadership in the low-priced field to Chevrolet, it continued to finish its cars in Black Japan. Mr. Ford is reported to have said, "Paint them any color, as long as they are black." Finally, in the 1930's, Ford was forced to shift to a synthetic enamel finish of its own manufacture. During this transition period, du Pont sold Ford a substantial amount of finishes. In 1935, Ford was making half, and buying half from du Pont; by 1937, Ford was making three-fourths and buying one-fourth from du Pont. In 1938, Henry Ford "issued instructions that the Ford Motor Company was not to purchase any more material from the du Pont company." From that time until Henry Ford II became active in Ford management, purchases from du Pont practically ceased. Since then, Ford has purchased finishes from du Pont in very substantial amounts.

General Motors has continued to test paints on thousands of cars annually. Du Pont has retained its position as primary lacquer supplier to several General Motors' divisions because these divisions have felt that Duco best fits their needs. Kettering, who was a leader in General Motors' research activities and who had been active in the testing and development of pyroxylin lacquers, testified that "one of the reasons" why General Motors' cars had a higher resale value than comparable cars "in a used car lot" "is the paint."

As the District Court found, "In view of all the evidence of record, the only reasonable conclusion is that du Pont has continued to sell Duco in substantial quantities to General Motors only because General Motors believes such purchases best fit its needs." (Italics supplied.) 126 F. Supp., at 296.

The second largest item which General Motors buys from du Pont is Dulux, a synthetic enamel finish used on refrigerators and other appliances. Prior to the development of Dulux, Duco was widely used as a finish for refrigerators. However, in 1927, Duco began to be replaced by porcelain, particularly at Frigidaire, a General Motors' appliance division. In 1930 and 1931, in collaboration with General Electric, du Pont developed Dulux, a greatly superior and cheaper product. Since its development, Dulux has been used exclusively by all the major manufacturers of refrigerators and other appliances—General Electric, Westinghouse, Crosley, and many others—except Frigidaire, which continues to finish part of its refrigerators with porcelain. Disinterested witnesses testified as to the superior quality and service which has led them to continue to buy Dulux.[24] The District Court did not err in concluding that Dulux—

[23] Du Pont initially sold more Duco to other auto manufacturers than it did to General Motors. In 1926, du Pont's sales of colored Duco were distributed as follows: to General Motors, 19%; to other auto manufacturers, 33%; to all others, 48%. The primary market for clear Duco has always been the furniture industry.

> "is apparently an ideal refrigerator finish and is widely used by a number of major manufacturers other than General Motors. Several representatives of competitive refrigerator manufacturers testified that they purchased 100% of their requirements from du Pont. There is no evidence that General Motors purchased from du Pont for any reason other than those that prompted its competitors to buy Dulux from du Pont—excellence of product, fair price and continuing quality of service." (Italics supplied.) 126 F. Supp., at 296.

The Court fails to note that du Pont's efforts to sell paints other than Duco and Dulux to General Motors have met with considerably less success. Du Pont does sell substantial amounts of automotive undercoats to Chevrolet and Buick but it has failed, despite continued sales efforts, to change the preference of Fisher Body, the largest purchaser of undercoats, for a competitor's undercoat. The successes and failures of other du Pont finish products at various General Motors' divisions emphasize the independent buying of each division and negate the notion that influence or coercion is responsible for what purchases do occur. Frigidaire uses large quantities of black finishing and machine varnish, but has not bought these products from du Pont since 1926. At A C Spark Plug Division, located in Flint, Michigan, where du Pont has a finishes plant, du Pont has been consistently successful in selling a substantial volume of the finishes used by that division. Delco-Remy Division, however, purchases most of its requirements of insulating varnish from du Pont's competitors. The Electromotive Division prefers a competitive lacquer for the interior finish of its locomotives, but uses Duco on the exterior because the railroads, most of which use Duco for the exterior of the balance of the train, specify that finish. At Guide Lamp Division, du Pont developed and still supplies a finish for the inside of headlight reflectors, but a competitor developed, and has kept, that division's substantial primer business. At the Inland Division, which produces steering wheels, du Pont had some of the business at one time, but has been completely supplanted by a competitor offering better service.

The du Pont experience at the Packard Electric Division, which uses large quantities of high and low tension cable lacquer, is illustrative. Until 1932, Packard Electric was a separate company wholly unrelated to General Motors, and du Pont was a principal supplier of low tension lacquer and the sole supplier of black high tension lacquer. Now, as a division of General Motors, Packard Electric purchases its entire requirements of high tension lacquer from du Pont competitors, and produces its own low tension lacquer from film scrap bought from du Pont competitors.

The District Court did not err in concluding, on the basis of this evidence, that du Pont's success in selling General Motors a substantial portion of its paint requirements was due to the superior quality of Duco and Dulux and to du Pont's continuing research and outstanding service, and that "du Pont's position was at all times a matter of sales effort and keeping General Motors satisfied. There is no evidence that General Motors or any Division of General Motors was ever prevented by du Pont from using a finish manufactured by one of du Pont's competitors; nor is there any evidence that General Motors has suffered competitively

[24] For example, Van Derau, a Westinghouse executive, testified that his company bought its entire requirements of refrigerator finishes from du Pont because of du Pont's quality and service:

"Now, another factor—and I think I can say this without it being harmful to any other suppliers—du Pont has the finest trained technical group at their beck and call, at the beck and call of the users of the materials, of anybody in the business and we have had several times, when we have had a little problem, and I am thinking of one in particular where we were going to find it very difficult to keep in production until the trouble would be overcome, which I called from Pittsburgh to the Chicago office, and the next morning one of the men of du Pont was on the job, and within a very few hours they had materials coming in from their Toledo plant that kept us in production.

"You cannot laugh off that kind of service. They have been simply excellent, and I don't know how you could say, any better."

from its substantial use of Duco." (Italics supplied.) 126 F. Supp., at 296.

2. Fabrics.—The principal fabrics which du Pont has sold to General Motors are imitation leather (du Pont's "Fabrikoid" and "Fabrilite") and top material for open cars and convertibles (du Pont's "Pontop," "Everbright" and "Teal").[25] Its sales of these materials to General Motors in 1947 totaled $3,369,000, or about 38.5% of General Motors' total purchases of such materials. In earlier years, before closed cars with all metal tops came to predominate, these materials constituted a larger proportion of the total fabrics used in an automobile than they do today. By 1946 they averaged, apart from the top material for convertibles, only about 1.6 yards, costing about $2.22 per car. They are used principally for seat tops and backs, kick pads, rear shelves, etc. Du Pont does not manufacture the cotton and wool products of which most of the upholstery is composed.

Du Pont entered the manufacture of coated fabrics in 1910, when it purchased the Fabrikoid Company of Newburgh, New York. "Artificial leather," as it was then known, was of poor quality and had very limited areas of acceptance. As du Pont succeeded in improving both its quality and appearance, its use rapidly broadened. By mid-1913, du Pont Fabrikoid, a pyroxylin-coated fabric, had been accepted by the automobile industry for upholstery and interior trim. Three years later, in 1916, almost every automobile company was a purchaser of Fabrikoid, and a contemporary du Pont estimate in that year stated that 60% of all cars produced in the United States would be equipped with Fabrikoid. In that same year, du Pont rounded out its line of fabrics by acquiring the Fairfield Rubber Company, a manufacturer of rubber-coated fabrics. Du Pont thus had achieved, before it purchased its General Motors' stock, a leading position in the automotive fabric field. Before 1917, it was supplying substantially all of the coated fabrics requirements at Chevrolet and Oldsmobile, about half of the requirements at Buick, and about a third of the requirements at Oakland. At the Cadillac division, du Pont supplied all of the coated fabrics for interior trim but none of the top material. 126 F. Supp., at 296-297.

Although there have been variations from year to year and from one car division to another in response to competitive considerations, du Pont generally has maintained its pre-1917 position as the principal supplier of coated and combined fabrics to General Motors. In 1926, General Motors purchased about 55.5% of these fabrics from du Pont, largely because Chevrolet switched entirely to du Pont after an unfortunate experience with competitive products during the preceding year. By 1930, the proportion had declined to about 31.5%, and du Pont was selling more fabrics to Ford than to General Motors. At the time of suit, du Pont's share had increased to 38.5%, the remainder being supplied by du Pont's competitors.

In addition to the mass of evidence supporting the District Court's finding that "such purchases of fabrics as the General Motors divisions have made from du Pont from time to time were based upon each division's exercise of its business judgment and are not the result of du Pont domination" (emphasis supplied), 126 F. Supp., at 301, the record clearly indicates that du Pont's fabrics can and have made their way in the automotive industry on their merits. Prior to the early 1920's, du Pont was the principal supplier of coated fabrics to all three of the then major producers—Ford, Willys-Overland and General Motors. After Ford and Willys began to produce their own coated fabrics they still turned to du Pont for much of what they could not produce.

Year	Sales to GM	Sales to others	Total sales	GM sales as percent of total sales
1938	$ 446,357	$ 6,647,112	$ 7,093,469	6.6
1939	803,854	7,775,778	8,579,632	9.4
1940	1,285,280	7,780,105	9,065,385	14.2
1941	1,773,079	13,093,469	14,866,548	11.9
1946	2,083,166	14,170,639	16,253,805	12.8
1947	3,639,316	16,723,610	20,362,926	17.9

Chrysler purchased substantial amounts from du Pont until, in the early 1930's, it embarked on its policy of one principal supplier for each product and chose Textileather, a du Pont competitor. Du Pont has continued to be Ford's largest supplier for the material which it does not manufacture for itself. Du Pont likewise has supplied, over the years, a considerable part of the coated and combined fabrics of most of the smaller automobile companies.

The District Court did not err in concluding that "Du Pont, the record shows, has maintained its position as the principal fabric supplier to General Motors through its early leadership in the field and by concentrating upon satisfactorily meeting General Motors' changing requirements as to quality, service and delivery." (Emphasis supplied.) 126 F. Supp., at 301.

3. Other Products.—The Court concludes only that du Pont has been given an unlawful preference with respect to paints and fabrics. By limiting the issue to these products, it eliminates from deserved consideration those products which General Motors does not buy in large quantities or proportions from du Pont.[26] Yet the logic of the Court's argument—that the stock relationship between du Pont and General Motors inevitably has or will result in a preference for du Pont products—requires consideration of the total commercial relations between the two companies. Du Pont "influence," if there were any, would be expected to apply to all products which du Pont makes and which General Motors buys.

However, the evidence shows that du Pont has attempted to sell to the various General Motors' divisions a wide range of products in addition to paint and fabrics, and that it has succeeded in doing so only when these divisions, exercising their own independent business judgment, have decided on the basis of quality, service and price that their economic interests would best be served by purchasing from du Pont. Six such groups of products were considered in detail by the District Court: plastics, brake fluid, casehardening materials, electroplating materials, safety glass, and synthetic rubber and rubber chemicals. 126 F. Supp., at 319-324. A few examples drawn from the findings will suffice.

Du Pont's sales to General Motors of celluloid (du Pont's "Pyralin"), used as windows in the side curtains of early automobiles, initially declined in 1918 after the stock purchase, and only revived when an improved product was adopted by all the large auto manufacturers. Instead of purchasing brake fluid and safety glass from du Pont, General Motors embarked, during the 1930's, on its own production of these substantial items. With respect to casehardening materials, General Motors has purchased less than half of its requirements from du Pont, while other auto manufacturers have purchased amounts larger in proportion and quantity. Although du Pont's new electroplating processes were widely adopted in the automobile and other industries in the 1930's only Cadillac has used du Pont's processes exclusively, Oldsmobile and Pontiac have used it occasionally, and Chevrolet and Buick never have used it except for brief periods. Neoprene, a synthetic rubber developed by du Pont, has been used to a much greater extent by Chrysler and Ford than by General Motors. Chrysler also uses, and helped develop, du Pont's synthetic rubber adhesive for brake linings, but the General Motors divisions prefer a more expensive type of synthetic rubber.

The record supports the conclusion of the District Court:

"All of the evidence bearing upon du Pont's efforts to sell these various miscellaneous products to General Motors supports a finding that the latter bought or refused to buy solely in accordance with the dictates of its own purchasing judgment. There is no evidence that General Motors was constrained to favor, or buy, a product solely because it was offered by du Pont. On the other hand, the record discloses numerous instances in which General Motors rejected du Pont's products in favor of those of one of its competitors. The variety of situations and circumstances in which such rejections occurred satisfies the Court that there was no limitation whatsoever upon General Motors' freedom to buy or to refuse to buy from du Pont as it pleased." (Emphasis supplied.) 126 F. Supp., at 324.

Evidence Relied on by the Court.—The Court, disregarding the mass of evidence supporting the District Court's conclusion that General Motors purchased du Pont's paint and fabrics solely because of their competitive merit, relies for its contrary conclusion on passages drawn from several documents written during the years 1918-1926, and on the logical fallacy that because du Pont over a long period supplied a substantial portion of General Motors' requirements of paint and fabrics, its position must have been obtained by misuse of its stock interest rather than competitive considerations.

The isolated instances of alleged pressure or intent to obtain noncompetitive preferences are four: (1) the Raskob report of December 1917; (2) several letters of J. A. Haskell, written during 1918-1920; (3) certain reports and letters of Pierre and Lammot du Pont during 1921-1924; and (4) a 1926 letter of John L. Pratt. Passages drawn from these 1918-1926 documents do not justify the conclusions reached by the Court. Each of them is a matter of disputed significance which cannot be evaluated without passing on the motivation and intent of the author. Each failed to achieve its specific object. Read in the context of the situations to which they were addressed, each is entirely consistent with the finding of the District Court that although du Pont was trying to get as much General Motors' business as it could, there was no restriction on General Motors' freedom to buy as it chose, and that General Motors' buyers did not regard themselves as in any way limited.[27] Moreover, even if isolated paragraphs in these documents, taken from their context, are given some significance, and the other evidence relating to the period from 1918 to 1926 is entirely ignored, all of the evidence after 1926 affirmatively establishes without essential contradiction [27] Because the Court quotes fully from, and appears to place special weight on, the 1926 letter of J. L. Pratt, a brief discussion of it is appropriate by way of illustration. Ante, pp. 19-20, n. 35.

The letter only purports to be an expression of Pratt's personal views—he makes it clear in the last paragraph that he is expressing his own opinions and not General Motors' policy. It has, therefore, comparatively little bearing on du Pont's intent. Moreover, it is significant that Pratt's attitude toward du Pont was based not on the stock relationship, but on the fact that du Pont saved General Motors from financial disaster in 1920. His views, apparently, would have been the same whether or not du Pont owned stock in General Motors. In any event, all that Pratt says is that, in making purchases, General Motors should "always keep a competitive situation," and "the prime consideration is to do the best thing for Delco-Light Company . . ." (Pratt was writing to the general manager of Delco, a General Motors' division.)

An examination of the circumstances in which this letter was written disposes of any notion that it expressed a policy that General Motors should prefer du Pont's products when they were equal in quality, service and price. The circumstances were these: Delco Light was buying paint from a competitor of du Pont. When the competitor failed to solve a paint problem which confronted Delco, it called on du Pont for help. However, although du Pont solved the problem and obtained one order for paint, Delco asked du Pont to withhold delivery so that the competitor could be given another opportunity to retain the business. Understandingly, Elms of the du Pont Paint Department was somewhat piqued by this, and he wrote a personal letter to his friend Pratt asking for his assistance. Pratt's letter to the general manager of Delco was the result.

Despite the fact that the du Pont product was offered at a lower price and the fact that the technical staff at Delco thought the du Pont product superior, Delco nevertheless continued to buy from the competitor. Du Pont never did receive the business to which the correspondence related. Judged by either its content or its result, the Pratt letter is a poor example of an alleged du Pont policy of "purposely employ[ing] its stock to pry open the General Motors market . . ." Ante, p. 19.

that du Pont did not use its stock interest to receive any preferential treatment from General Motors.

Nor can present illegality be presumed from the bare fact that du Pont has continued to make substantial sales of several products to General Motors.[28] In the first place, the record affirmatively shows that the new products which du Pont has sold to General Motors since 1926 have made their way, at General Motors as elsewhere, on their merits. Sales of Duco, Dulux, Fabrilite and Teal are not attributable in any way to dealings in the earlier period. Secondly, the Court's presumption is based on the fact that du Pont does not sell to all other automobile manufacturers in the same proportion as it does to General Motors. But there is no reason why it should—the Government has not shown that sellers normally sell to all members of an industry in the same proportion. In any event, the record fully explains the disproportion. Since 1930, du Pont's sales to other members of the industry have proportionately declined, largely because Ford has chosen to make the major share of its requirements of paint and fabrics, and because Chrysler has followed the policy of selecting a single supplier to whom it can be the most important customer. The fact is that du Pont has continued to sell in substantial amounts to the smaller members of the automobile industry. The growth in the dominance of General Motors, Ford and Chrysler—companies which together account for more than 85% of automobile production—when combined with the policies adopted by Ford and Chrysler, adequately explains why du Pont sells a larger proportion of paint and fabrics to General Motors than it does to the industry as a whole.

It is true that § 7 of the Clayton Act does not require proof of actual anticompetitive effects or proof of an intent to restrain trade. But these matters become crucial when the Court rests its conclusion that du Pont's stock interest violates the Act on evidence relating solely to an alleged du Pont intent to obtain a noncompetitive preference from General Motors, and on a finding that such a preference was actually secured through the unlawful use of du Pont's stock interest. Preference and intent are also relevant because the Government has brought this case 30 years after the event. If no actual restraint has occurred during this long period, the probability of a restraint in the future is indeed slight. Especially is this so when the only change in recent years has been in the direction of diminishing du Pont's participation in General Motors' affairs.

Rule 52(a) Governs This Case.—The foregoing summary of the evidence relating to General Motors' purchases of paint and fabrics from du Pont, comparatively brief as it is, reveals that a multitude of factual issues underlie this case. The occurrence of events, the reasons why these events took place, and the motives of the men who participated in them are drawn in question. The issue of credibility is of great importance. The District Judge had the opportunity to observe the demeanor of the witnesses and to judge their credibility at first hand. Thus, this case is a proper one for the application of the principle embodied in Rule 52(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure: "Findings of fact shall not be set aside unless clearly erroneous, and due regard shall be given to the opportunity of the trial court to judge of the credibility of the witnesses." United States v. Oregon Medical Society [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,264], 343 U. S. 326, 330-332, 339; United States v. Yellow Cab Co. [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,522], 338 U. S. 338, 341-342.

This is not a situation in which oral testimony is contradicted by contemporaneous documents. See United States v. United States Gypsum Co. [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,226], 333 U. S. 364. In this case, the findings of the District Court are supported both by contemporaneous documents and by oral testimony. For example, General Motors' search for a better automotive finish, the superiority of the product developed by du Pont, and General Motors' continuous efforts to secure an equally good lacquer from other sources are all proved by letters and reports written in the early 1920's as well as by the oral testimony of many witnesses. Similarly, contemporaneous exhibits prove that General Motors purchased fabrics from du Pont because of the superiority of du Pont products, and that on other occasions it turned to competing suppliers even though du Pont's product was just as good. Appellate review of detailed findings based on substantial oral testimony and corroborative documents must be limited to setting aside those that are clearly erroneous. The careful and detailed findings of fact of the District Court in this case cannot be so labeled.[29]

[28] The Court, without referring to any supporting evidence, ventures the conjecture that "General Motors probably turned to outside sources of supply at least in part because its requirements outstripped du Pont's production . . ." Ante, p. 18. As I read the record, du Pont was actively soliciting more business from General Motors and others throughout the period covered in this suit. I find no hint that du Pont was surfeited with business and unable to fill General Motors' orders.

B. RELEVANT MARKET

Finally, even assuming the correctness of the Court's conclusion that du Pont's competitors have been or will be foreclosed from General Motors' paint and fabric trade, it is still necessary to resolve one more issue in favor of the Government in order to reverse the District Court. It is necessary to hold that the Government proved that this foreclosure involves a substantial share of the relevant market and that it significantly limits the competitive opportunities of others trading in that market.[30]

The relevant market is the "area of effective competition" within which the defendants operate. Standard Oil Co. of California v. United States [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,432], 337 U. S. 293, 299-300, n. 5. "[T]he problem of defining a market turns on discovering patterns of trade which are followed in practice." United States v. United Shoe Machinery Corp. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,436], 110 F. Supp. 295, 303, aff'd per curiam, 347 U. S. 521. "Determination of the competitive market for commodities depends on how different from one another are the offered commodities in character or use, how far buyers will go to substitute one commodity for another." United States v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,369], 351 U. S. 377, 393. This determination is primarily one of fact.

The Court holds that the relevant market in this case is the automotive market for finishes and fabrics, and not the total industrial market for these products. The Court reaches that conclusion because in its view "automotive finishes and fabrics have sufficient peculiar characteristics and uses [29] The Court also overturns the District Court's express finding that du Pont purchased General Motors' stock solely for investment. The Court does this on the basis of an alleged du Pont purpose to secure a noncompetitive preference which the Court finds expressed in the Raskob letter and in certain statements in du Pont's 1917 and 1918 reports to its stockholders. These documents, however, are not inconsistent with the District Court's finding of an investment purpose. The District Court said:

"Raskob's report, the testimony of Pierre S. and Irenee du Pont and all the circumstances leading up to du Pont's acquisition of this substantial interest in General Motors, as shown by the record, establish that the acquisition was essentially an investment. Its motivation was the profitable employment of a large part of the surplus which du Pont had available and uncommitted to expansion of its own business.

"Raskob's reports and other documents written at or near the time of the investment show that du Pont's representatives were well aware that General Motors was a large consumer of products of the kind offered by du Pont. Raskob, for one, thought that du Pont would ultimately get all that business, but there is no evidence that Raskob expected to secure General Motors trade by imposing any limitation upon its freedom to buy from suppliers of its choice. Other documents also establish du Pont's continued interest in selling to General Motors—even to the extent of the latter's entire requirements—but they similarly make no suggestion that the desired result was to be achieved by limiting General Motors purchasing freedom. On the contrary, a number of them explicitly recognized that General Motors trade could only be secured on a competitive basis." 126 F. Supp., at 242, 243.

Whether any stock purchase is an investment turns largely on the intent of the purchaser. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,035], 66 F. 2d 37, aff'd by an equally divided court, 291 U. S. 651. In this case, since the District Court's finding with reference to that intent is unequivocal and not clearly erroneous, the stock acquisition falls within the proviso, stated in the third paragraph of § 7, expressly excepting acquisitions made "solely for investment."

[30] The District Court did not reach this question since it found that there was no reasonable probability of any foreclosure of du Pont's competitors by reason of du Pont's 23% stock interest in General Motors. Consequently, there are no findings of fact dealing with the relevant market. Also, the record appears deficient on such crucial questions as the characteristics of the products, the uses to which they are put, the extent to which they are interchangeable with competitors' products, and so on. For these reasons, I believe the Court in any event should remand the case to the District Court to give the District Judge, who is more familiar with the record than we can be, an opportunity to review the record, and entertain argument with respect to the substantiality of the share of the relevant market affected by the foreclosure which the Court finds to exist. By declining to remand, the Court necessitates a scrutiny here of this huge record for a determination of an essentially factual question not passed on by the District Court, and not thoroughly briefed or argued by the parties.

to constitute them products distinct from all other finishes and fabrics . . . ." Ante, pp. 6-7. We are not told what these "peculiar characteristics" are. Nothing is said about finishes other than that Duco represented an important contribution to the process of manufacturing automobiles. Nothing is said about fabrics other than that sales to the automobile industry are made by means of bids rather than fixed price schedules. Dulux is included in the "automobile" market even though it is used on refrigerators and other appliances, but not on automobiles. So are other finishes and fabrics used on diesel locomotives, engines, parts, appliances and other products which General Motors manufactures. Arbitrary conclusions are not an adequate substitute for analysis of the pertinent facts contained in the record.

The record does not show that the fabrics and finishes used in the manufacture of automobiles have peculiar characteristics differentiating them from the finishes and fabrics used in other industries. What evidence there is in the record affirmatively indicates the contrary. The sales of the four products principally involved in this case—Duco, Dulux, imitation leather, and coated fabrics—support this conclusion.

Duco was first marketed not to General Motors, but to the auto refinishing trade and to manufacturers of furniture, brush handles and pencils. In 1927, 44% of du Pont's sales of colored Duco, and 51.5% of its total sales, were to purchasers other than auto manufacturers. Although the record does not disclose exact figures for all years, it does show that a substantial portion of du Pont's sales of Duco have continued to be for non-automotive uses.[31]

It is also significant that Duco was a patented product. Prior to the expiration of the patent in 1944, only three years before this suit was brought, du Pont issued over 250 licenses—to all that applied—covering its patented process. If Duco is to be treated as a separate market solely because of its initial superiority, du Pont is being penalized rather than rewarded for contributing to technological advance.

Dulux has never been used in the manufacture of automobiles. It replaced Duco and other lacquers as a finish on refrigerators, washers, dryers, and other appliances, and continues to have wide use on metallic objects requiring a durable finish. Yet the Court includes it as a finish having the unspecified but "peculiar characteristics" distinctive of "automotive finishes." Ante, p. 6.

In 1947, when du Pont's sales of Duco and Dulux to General Motors totaled about $15,400,000, the total national market for paints and finishes was $1,248,000,000, of which about $552,000,000 was for varnishes, lacquers, enamels, japans, thinners and dopes, the kinds of finishes sold primarily to industrial users.[32] There is no evidence in this record establishing that these industrial finishes are not competitive with Duco and Dulux. There is considerable evidence that many of them are. It is probable that du Pont's total sales of finishes to General Motors in 1947 constituted less than 3.5% of all sales of industrial finishes.

The record also shows that the types of fabrics used for automobile trim and con-

[31] The Court states that "General Motors took 93% of du Pont's automobile Duco production in 1941 and 83% in 1947." Ante, p. 18. These figures are of little significance. Not only do they omit the crucial sales—those made outside the automobile industry—but they give a misleading impression with respect to du Pont's sales to the automobile industry. As previously stated, Ford chose to make its own requirements after about 1935 and Chrysler desired to concentrate its purchases on one supplier. Under these figures, after eliminating Ford and Chrysler, and deducting du Pont's sales to General Motors, du Pont must have supplied nearly half of the entire requirements of all remaining auto manufacturers in 1941 and an even larger portion in 1947.

The record does not contain complete figures on the amount of Duco sold outside the automobile industry. However, there are figures for selected years. In 1927, for example, 51.5% of all Duco sales were to other than automobile manufacturers (1,166,220 gallons, out of a total of 2,263,000 gallons). In 1948, du Pont's gross sales to purchasers other than General Motors of the same kinds of finishes bought by General Motors amounted to about $97,000,000; its sales to General Motors in the same year were $21,000,000, or 21.7% of the total. The record reveals that General Motors' purchases of finishes from du Pont have ranged, in recent years, from 14% to 26% of du Pont's sales of such finishes to all customers. The conclusion seems clear that du Pont's finishes have found wide acceptance in innumerable industries and that du Pont is not dependent on General Motors for a captive paint market.

[32] U. S. Department of Commerce, Bureau of the Census, II Census of Manufactures: 1947, Statistics by Industry, 414-415. There were 1,291 establishments manufacturing these products. Du Pont's total sales were 8.1% of the industry.

vertible tops—imitation leather and coated fabrics—are used in the manufacture of innumerable products, such as luggage, furniture, railroad upholstery, books, brief cases, baby carriages, hassocks, bicycle saddles, sporting goods, footwear, belts and table mats. In 1947, General Motors purchased about $9,454,000 of imitation leather and coated fabrics. Of this amount, $3,639,000 was purchased from du Pont (38.5%) and $5,815,000 from over 50 du Pont competitors. Since du Pont produced about 10% of the national market for these products in 1946, 1947 and 1948, and since only 20% of its sales were to the automobile industry, the du Pont sales to the automobile industry constituted only about 2% of the total market. The Court ignores the record by treating this small fraction of the total market as a market of distinct products.

It will not do merely to stress the large size of these two corporations. The figures as to their total sales—$793,000,000 for du Pont and $3,815,000,000 for General Motors in 1947—do not fairly reflect the volume of commerce involved in this case. The commerce involved here is about $19,000,000 of industrial finishes and about $3,700,000 of certain industrial fabrics—less than 3.5% of the national market for industrial finishes, and only about 1.6% of the national market for these fabrics. The Clayton Act is not violated unless the stock acquisition substantially threatens the competitive opportunities available to others. International Shoe Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 280 U. S. 291; Transamerica Corp. v. Board of Governors [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,536], 206 F. 2d 163; V. Vivaudou, Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 54 F. 2d 273. The effect on the market for the product, not that on the transactions of the acquired company, is controlling. Fargo Glass & Paint Co. v. Globe American Corp. [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,427], 201 F. 2d 534.[33]

The Court might be justified in holding that products sold to the automotive industry constitute the relevant market in the case of products such as carburetors or tires which are sold primarily to automobile manufacturers. But the sale of Duco, Dulux, imitation leather, and coated fabrics is not so limited.

The burden was on the Government to prove that a substantial share of the relevant market would, in all probability, be affected by du Pont's 23% stock interest in General Motors. The Government proved only that du Pont's sales of finishes and fabrics to General Motors were large in volume, and that General Motors was the leading manufacturer of automobiles during the later years covered by the record. The Government did not show that the identical products were not used on a large scale for many other purposes in many other industries. Nor did the Government show that the automobile industry in general, or General Motors in particular, comprised a large or substantial share of the total market. What evidence there is in the record affirmatively indicates that the products involved do have wide use in many industries, and that an insubstantial portion of this total market would be affected even if an unlawful preference existed or were probable.

For the reasons stated, I conclude that § 7 of the Clayton Act, prior to its amendment in 1950, did not apply to vertical acquisitions; that the Government failed to prove that there was a reasonable probability at the time of the stock acquisition (1917-1919) of a restraint of commerce or a tendency toward monopoly; and that, in any event, the District Court was not clearly in error in concluding that the Government

[33] In the Fargo case, Maytag, an appliance manufacturer, acquired a 40% stock interest in, and contracted to purchase the entire output of, Globe, a gas range manufacturer. A Globe dealer, who lost his source of supply as a result of the transaction, brought a treble damage action alleging, inter alia, that the stock acquisition violated § 7 of the Clayton Act. The evidence showed that there were about 70 manufacturers of gas ranges, and that Globe was about eighteenth in size, selling a little less than 2% of the national market (about $5,000,000 a year). The Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit held that the stock acquisition did not violate § 7 because the plaintiff had other readily available sources of supply.

The acquisition of an outlet is governed by similar principles. In either case, the question is whether competitors may be substantially limited in their competitive opportunities. Assuming that du Pont had purchased General Motors outright, and thus commanded an outlet consuming about 4% of the national market for industrial finishes and about 2% of the national market for industrial fabrics, it seems unlikely that du Pont's paint and fabric competitors would be substantially limited in selling their products, when 96% and 98%, respectively, of the national market would remain open to them.

failed to prove that du Pont's competitors have been or may be foreclosed from a substantial share of the relevant market. Accordingly, I would affirm the judgment of the District Court.

"SEC. 7. That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce, where the effect of such acquisition may be to substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to restrain such commerce in any section or community, or tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

"No corporation shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of two or more corporations engaged in commerce where the effect of such acquisition, or the use of such stock by the voting or granting of proxies or otherwise, may be to substantially lessen competition between such corporations, or any of them, whose stock or other share capital is so acquired, or to restrain such commerce in any section or community, or tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

"This section shall not apply to corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment and not using the same by voting or otherwise to bring about, or in attempting to bring about, the substantial lessening of competition. Nor shall anything contained in this section prevent a corporation engaged in commerce from causing the formation of subsidiary corporations for the actual carrying on of their immediate lawful business, or the natural and legitimate branches or extensions thereof, or from owning and holding all or a part of the stock of such subsidiary corporations, when the effect of such formation is not to substantially lessen competition.

"Nor shall anything herein contained be construed to prohibit any common carrier subject to the laws to regulate commerce from aiding in the construction of branches or short lines so located as to become feeders to the main line of the company so aiding in such construction or from acquiring or owning all or any part of the stock of such branch lines, nor to prevent any such common carrier from acquiring and owning all or any part of the stock of a branch or short line constructed by an independent company where there is no substantial competition between the company owning the branch line so constructed and the company owning the main line acquiring the property or an interest therein, nor to prevent such common carrier from extending any of its lines through the medium of the acquisition of stock or otherwise of any other such common carrier where there is no substantial competition between the company extending its lines and the company whose stock, property, or an interest therein is so acquired.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of California, Central Division. No. 19884-Y. Dated May 17, 1957.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Refusal To Deal—Termination of Distributor's Privilege of Making Bids—Legality.—A manufacturer of drugs did not violate Section 1 or 2 of the Sherman Act when it terminated a drug distributor's privilege of making bids for the sale of the manufacturer's products to city and county hospitals and other institutions for a commission of ten per cent of list prices because the distributor had made bids below the listed prices and had offered larger discounts for cash payments. The manufacturer was engaged in the production and sale of drugs which it developed through its own research, it did not act as a wholesaler or a retailer, and it did not compete with the distributor or others in the sale of drugs to city and county hospitals and other institutions. A unilateral refusal to deal is not unlawful, and this is especially true where, as in the instant action, there was competition in the market as to every one of the manufacturer's products. In view of such competition, the manufacturer was not in a position to control prices or exclude competition. Those who sold the manufacturer's products were free to sell competitive products. The manufacturer's arrangements as to price were within the scope of the restrictions that a manufacturing company may impose on penalty of refusing to deal.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.785; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2530.10, 2610.720.

Resale Price Fixing—Monopolies—Vertical Price Fixing—Exemption of Fair Trade Laws.—A manufacturer of drugs did not fix prices in violation of the Sherman Act by giving certain wholesale druggists, with whom it had fair trade agreements, and a drug distributor the privilege of making bids for the sale of its products to city and county hospitals and other institutions for a commission of ten per cent of list prices on the understanding that the bids were to be made at the prices stated in its price list. The manufacturer was engaged in the production and sale of drugs which it developed through its own research, it did not act as a wholesaler or a retailer, and it did not compete with the wholesale druggists or the distributor in the sale of drugs to hospitals and other institutions. The understandings which the manufacturer entered into were permitted under the California Fair Trade Act, and, consequently, were excepted from the operation of the antitrust laws under the Miller-Tydings and McGuire Acts. Furthermore, there was no unlawful price fixing because the manufacturer was not in competition with the wholesale druggists or the distributor. While, at times, the manufacturer sold direct to hospitals and other institutions, it did not do so when the wholesale druggists or the distributor submitted bids. There was no horizontal price fixing. The manufacturer's arrangements as to bids to institutions and hospitals which received the products in quantities not available to wholesalers or retailers were outside the purview of the antitrust laws. Also, in view of the fact that other products were sold in competition with the manufacturer's products, the manufacturer did not exercise unreasonable monopoly powers, and it was not in a position to control prices or exclude competition. The manufacturer's arrangements as to price were within the scope of the restrictions that a manufacturing company may impose on penalty of refusing to deal.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2011; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2610.660; Resale Price Fixing, Vol. 1, ¶ 3015.20, 3100.

LEON R. YANKWICH, Chief Judge [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: The action is for infringement of a trademark and seeks injunctive relief and damages. The defendants in their Answer have attacked the validity of the trademark and have also urged that injunctive relief be denied upon the ground that the plaintiff has been guilty of monopolistic practices and price-fixing in violation of the antitrust laws of the United States. (15 U. S. C. A., 15, 26, § 1115(b)(7))

The facts out of which the controversy arises are stated briefly in the Memorandum filed when preliminary injunction was issued. (G. D. Searle & Co. v. Institutional Drug Distributors, Inc., D. C. Cal., 1955, 141 F. Supp. 838)

A hearing on the merits confirms the conclusion arrived at previously on the basis of affidavits and depositions that the mark is valid and has been infringed by the defendants and that the plaintiff, to be referred to as Searle, has not been guilty of any practices in violation of antitrust laws which would call for denial of permanent injunctive relief.

I

The Mark Involved

As stated in the previous Memorandum, the plaintiff drug manufacturers registered on March 17, 1949, the mark "Dramamine" which was first used in commerce on January 28, 1949.

II

"Strong" Marks

The mark is not descriptive. By all standards it is a strong mark. * * *

In the case before us we have an instance of a strong, fanciful mark, used by pharmaceutical manufacturing company doing business on a national scale and spending millions in advertising the product and others it manufactures and sells under tradenames and trademarks, being infringed by one of the persons, the defendant, used by them in limited transactions in a certain California locality.

By oral understanding, without any binding written agreement, the defendant was given the privilege of making bids to public institutions for sale of its products, at their catalogue prices. For this he received ten per cent of the price. After the relationship was terminated he proceeded to imitate the label of one of their most successful drug products. Admittedly the cause for the severance was that the defendant offered the drug to institutions at a lower than its catalogued price and allowed a larger discount for cash payments within a certain period. Which brings us to the question whether this method of bidding, to be described in more detail later, amounted to the type of horizontal price fixing which is condemned as a restraint of interstate commerce under the antitrust laws of the United States.

III

The Nature of the Plaintiff's Activities

[Nature of Business]

Before considering the question just posited, it is well to state the nature of the activities in which Searle engages. Its business is that of pharmaceutical manufacturer limited to medicinal drugs in the human fields. This means that they do not engage in producing medicines that might be used in the treatment of animals. But in the conduct of its business rather than relying on copying other formulae, they devote special attention to the actual discovery of new medicinal products. No medicinal products are marketed unless, as the Vice-President of the Company in charge of distribution stated, they have satisfied themselves

> "at least and are in a position to document their claims that the product is an improvement over anything that has previously been available to the medical profession in that particular field of medicine."

For this reason, they are not what is described as a full-line pharmaceutical house, but restrict themselves to manufacture and sale of the relatively small number of medicinal drugs which have been developed by them. More than 300 of their employees are engaged in research. A great majority of them have PhD degrees in biology or chemistry. The laboratory facilities operated consist of two buildings at Skokie, Ill., the first one of which is one story in height and occupies a ground area in excess of an acre. The second building is three stories in height and also occupies a ground area in excess of an acre. Between them they are equipped with between 150 and 200 individual, fully-equipped laboratories. In order to facilitate research, there is maintained an animal colony and all the facilities that go with it.

The manufacturing of a pharmaceutical product takes many forms, the first one being the manufacture of the chemical substance. The second is the manufacture of the tablet. The same witness described the process in this manner:

> "There actually are many forms of pharmaceuticals, but in the manufacture of a tablet, having satisfied everybody that is concerned that the chemical is pure, quite of the proper strength, then it is joined with other materials and is what is known as a granulation. Those materials are known as excipients and they are there purely for the purpose of making the tablet stand together rather than crumble too easily, or for the purpose of assuring that the tablet shall disintegrate in the body within the time in which it should, for the medicine to be effective.

That then goes . . . to the compressing stage where it is compressed into the tablet. From that point on, it necessarily must be packaged and necessarily must be labeled and all of those things are very carefully controlled.

"The obvious purpose of the manufacturing part of the business is to assure that the product is properly manufactured, that it is of proper potency, that it is in a form which will remain stable and above all, that is it properly packaged and properly labeled, because in this business there is no room for mistakes. It would be a pretty serious matter if the wrong tablet got into the wrong bottle, and actually in our business, in the manufacturing end of our business, we have more people analyzing and controlling the product than we do otherwise, actually manufacturing as we consider it to be that important."

[Distributor of Drugs]

In the manner of distribution of drugs, hospitals have a unique position. For this reason, the packaging of drugs for hospitals is different from that which, through wholesalers, reaches the retail trade. The retailer has need for a package which is in line with his rate of sale and distribution. This calls for a relatively small package. As a prescription is written by a doctor, the patient may take the prescription to any of the drug stores in his locality. So the retail druggist never knows exactly what his volume will be and is therefore inclined to buy a smaller package. This, Searle allows him to do. In this manner, the drug will retain its potency even though it remains on the shelves for several months. Larger packages are provided for larger drug stores located in a medical building where the rate of prescription might be high. In a hospital in which the prescriptions are filled in the hospital pharmacy, it is possible to use large packaging because the hospital can anticipate the rate of use of a particular drug. So hospitals prefer larger packages and Searle supplies them.

There is in evidence a package of the drug involved which, when filled, contains 5000 tablets,—a size that could not be used by the average retail store without a good deal of repackaging involving the danger of contamination of the drug. The package normally used for the wholesale trade for distribution through retail outlets consists of a glass bottle containing 100 tablets.

[Representatives]

As a drug is of little value unless the medical profession knows of it, it is necessary that they be informed of the drug and of its nature in order that they may prescribe it, and that the drug be easily procurable by the patients. So a pattern of distribution is adopted which was done with the particular product involved. The witness referred to described what he called the normal pattern of distribution in this manner:

"That is accomplished by essentially three means: First, by a large number of representatives who travel in this country constantly, whose responsibility it is to call upon the physicians and give them this information by word of mouth. Secondly, it is accomplished by announcements that go through the drug literature channels. The third is accomplished by paid advertising in the medical journals of the country."

The representatives who call chiefly on physicians, pharmacies, wholesalers and retailers, in regard to its products to keep them up-to-date on any new development that may come about, are called by Searle "medical representatives."

Searle prepares special manuals relating to its products, called "reference manuals" which inform the profession about the product and the experience with it in laboratories or clinically.

[Development of Drug]

In the case of the drug to which the trademark "Dramamine" was adopted, its effect on motion sickness, nausea and vomiting was first noticed by a clinician at Johns Hopkins University, who had prescribed it for a woman patient who stated to him that in coming to the hospital on the street car she did not feel dizzy when she took the drug. Later experiments were carried on in 1948 by the United States Army on a transport. Two of the clinicians accompanied a rather ancient transport from the United States to Germany and gave the drug to the soldiers in order to observe its effect on motion sickness. These and other experiments ultimately resulted in the development of the Searle brand of dimenhydrinate to which the trade name "Dramamine" was attached by their laboratory men and, as already appears, later registered and used in interstate commerce.

[Importance of Business Facts]

This rather lengthy description is necessary in order to understand that in this case we are not dealing with an ordinary company engaged in the wholesale distribution of drug products, many of which they do not manufacture, like McKesson & Robbins or others, but with a manufacturing concern engaged in the manufacture and improvement of either recognized drugs or drugs of their own invention applied to the cure of human illnesses. In considering the alleged violation of antitrust laws, these facts have a particular significance.

IV

No Antitrust Violation

["Unclean Hands"]

The violation of antitrust laws is pleaded in the Answer under the general claim of "unclean hands" which is used in cases of this character to prevent enforcement of equity when misuse of a trademark is alleged. (87 C. J. S., Trademarks, § 102; Morton Salt Co. v. G. S. Suppiger Co., 1942 [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,176], 314 U. S. 488, 494; Renaud Sales Co. v. Davis., 1 Cir., 1939, 104 F. 2d 683; Strey v. Devine's, Inc., 7 Cir., 1954, 217 F. 2d 187, 190) The Lanham Act specifically provides for denial of relief in trademark cases when a violation of the antitrust laws is shown to exist. (15 U. S. C. A. § 1115(b)(7)) This provision was especially pleaded and evidence in the record was directed to prove violation of the Sherman Act. (15 U. S. C. A., § 1 and § 2)

[Fair Trade Laws]

I am of the view that the defendant has not shown a violation of either section. On the contrary, the facts disclose that whatever understandings plaintiff entered into with the defendant and other persons through whom, at times, it acted, were permitted under § 16902 of the California Business & Professions Code. Consequently, they are excepted from the operation of antitrust laws both under the Miller-Tydings Act of 1937, (50 Stat. 693; 15 U. S. C. A., § 1) and the McGuire Act of 1952. (15 U. S. C. A., § 45)

As stated, Searle is a manufacturer of pharmaceutical products having a medical value in the human field. The product to which the mark under discussion is attached is one of them. Of the twenty-five products listed in one of their catalogues twenty-three are sold under coined trademarks or tradenames, the other two under their chemical names. The plaintiff is not a wholesaler or retailer.

The evidence shows that while the plaintiff had in 1949 some one hundred and fifty representatives and in 1957 some three hundred representatives throughout the country, ninety per cent of them call on physicians. They do not take orders from them nor do they sell them any products. They merely offer them samples. And the only way they know that their mission has been successful is when the physicians on whom they called prescribe the product, which is supplied through regular drug channels.

[Bidding System]

Prior to December, 1956, Searle adopted a system of selling to hospitals and public institutions which, in effect, functioned in this manner: In the Los Angeles area five wholesale druggists with whom they had "fair trade" agreements,[1] were given

[1] The Fair Trade Agreement called "Manufacturer-Wholesaler Contract" contained these clauses:

"Whereas, the Manufacturer is the producer or the distributor of various commodities and the Wholesaler is engaged in the sale of such commodities at wholesale in various states which have enacted fair trade acts, and the Manufacturer and the Wholesaler desire to avail themselves of the provisions of such fair trade acts and of the fair trade acts of such other states as shall enact such statutes;

"Now, Therefore, in consideration of the premises, and the mutual benefits and obligations accruing to and assumed by the parties hereto from and by the execution and delivery of this agreement, the parties hereto agree as follows:

"2. The Wholesaler will not (except as specifically permitted by statute) directly or indirectly, advertise, offer for sale or sell any of the Products to any buyer in any state in which at the time of such sale a fair trade act shall be in effect at less than the minimum wholesale selling price at that time stipulated therefor in such state by the Manufacturer.

"3. The minimum wholesale selling prices stipulated by the Manufacturer for the Products in various states are those now or hereafter designated in Schedule A plus, in each sale, the amount of all sales and excise taxes applicable to such sale.

"The Manufacturer, at any time and from time to time by written notice given to the Wholesaler as hereinafter provided, may (a) eliminate one or more Products from Schedule A; (b) add one or more Products to Schedule the right to make bids for Searle products to city or county hospitals or other institutions requiring bids. The products were shipped by Searle from Skokie, Ill., a suburb of Chicago, Ill., or San Francisco, Calif., direct to the institution. The bills bore the legend "sold to (name of drug company)", "shipped to (name of institution)" and the price. The drug companies were allowed ten per cent of the list price. The defendant was given the same privilege. They were not wholesalers. They carried no stock of drugs. They merely were permitted to make bids for Searle products at the list price. No formal agreement existed between them and Searle as to these matters, except that it was understood that the bids were to be made at the prices stated in the catalogue. Like the drug companies, the defendant was to receive as a commission ten per cent of the invoice price. Searle charged no sales tax, it being collected by the drug companies or the defendant. Searle looked to the drug companies and the defendant for payment of the invoices. They in turn collected the full price from the institution, giving to Searle ninety per cent of it.[2]

[No Unlawful Price Fixing]

There is no denial that the privilege was withdrawn when it was learned that the defendant had made bids below the amount set forth in the catalogue and had offered higher discounts. It is doubtful, to say the least, whether this arrangement, regardless of any fair trade practices constituted an agreement to fix prices of the type which the courts have condemned. (See United States v. Colgate & Co., 1919, 250 U. S. 300; Adams-Mitchell Co. v. Cambridge Distributing Co., 2 Cir., 1950 [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,856], 189 F. 2d 913; and see, Cutter Laboratories v. Lyophile-Cryochem Corp., 9 Cir., 1949 [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,542], 179 F. 2d 93)

Certain it is that Searle was not in competition with the drug companies and the defendant, nor they with it. While, at times, they sold direct to institutions, they did not do so during the period when this special arrangement called "drop shipments" obtained.

I do not think that the sale to institutions of products under their own brands put them in the class of competitors of the drug companies and the defendant so as to subject them to the charge of horizontal price fixing. (Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Parke & Sons Co., 1911, 220 U. S. 373, 408; United States v. Masonite Corp., 1942 [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,209], 316 U. S. 265, 274-275; United States v. Bausch & Lomb Co., 1944 [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,224], 321 U. S. 707, 720; United States v. Frankfort Distilleries, Inc., 1945 [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,338], 324 U. S. 293, 295-298; Schwegmann Bros. v. Calvert Distillers Corp., 1951 [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,823], 341 U. S. 384; United States v. McKesson & Robbins, 1956 [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,368], 351 U. S. 305, 311-313)

In reality, the arrangement was one whereby the drug companies and the defendant, in a limited area, became the agents or representatives or "brokers" of the plaintiff in placing the products which

A and stipulate minimum wholesale selling prices therefor; and/or (c) change the minimum wholesale selling price of any one or more of the Products.

"Each elimination from and each addition to Schedule A and each change in any minimum wholesale selling price, including each such change made pursuant to Article 4 of this agreement, shall be effective at the opening of business on the date specified in the notice thereof, and such notice (which may take the form of a revised Schedule A which specifies its effective date) shall be mailed so that, in the ordinary course of the mails, it will be received by the Wholesaler before the date so specified.

"4. In the event that, pursuant to any agreement similar to this one, the Manufacturer shall stipulate a minimum wholesale selling price for any of the Products in any given state which shall be different from the minimum wholesale selling price at the time stipulated for such products in such state under this agreement, the Manufacturer will give prompt written notice of such fact to the Wholesaler and such different minimum wholesale selling price shall be effective under this agreement as provided in Article 3 hereof."

[2] The general form of agreement entitled "Manufacturer-Wholesaler Agreement" and entered into between Searle and the wholesale druggists in the Los Angeles area contained this clause relating to drop shipments:

"7. We will allow you a handling discount of 10% (based upon our quotation) on drop shipments of Searle Tablets in Bulk Packages Only to any accredited hospital, physician or established clinic which orders such shipments through you. In the case of institutions which are city, county or state controlled, this handling discount arrangement extends to drop shipments of Any Searle Item or Package Size. Under no circumstances will we allow a handling discount on Federal Government business."

they manufactured in institutions in exchange for the commission. The fact that the invoices spoke of the goods as "sold" to the druggist and to the defendants and that the plaintiff looked to them to collect the money does not, in my view, alter the situation. (See Woodworkers Tool Works v. Byrne, 9 Cir., 1951, 191 F. 2d 667; Woodworkers Tool Works v. Byrne, 9 Cir., 1953, 202 F. 2d 530) The test applied in the tort case just cited is even truer in a case like this when realities must govern in determining the meaning of relationship. (United States v. Richfield Oil Corp., D. C. Cal., 1951 [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,878], 99 F. Supp. 280, 293. And see, Federal Trade Commission v. Curtis Publishing Co., 1923, 260 U. S. 568; United States v. General Electric Co., 1926, 272 U. S. 476)

We are inescapably led to the conclusion that Searle's arrangements as to bids to public institutions and hospitals who received the products in quantities not available to wholesalers or retailers were outside the purview of the antitrust laws whether we consider them in the light of the state fair trade laws or not.

To amplify, Plaintiff's Hospital Catalog states:

> "Sales of tablets in bulk quantities are restricted to physicians and hospitals."

We are, therefore, dealing with a commodity which was packaged for only the hospital trade and which was available only directly from Searle. As stated, there were two ways of supplying this commodity to the hospitals. One was by direct sales from Searle to the hospital, the other was by the "drop shipment." These were not competing but supplementary methods. "Drop shipment" was used where a hospital did not wish to deal direct with Searle, but required a local source. Where the hospital dealt direct, there was a direct account, and no bidding. There were, in effect, two markets and two parallel sets of accounts. The plaintiff's Vice-President in charge of distribution, Franklin P. O'Brien, testified:

> "The Court: Did you at times submit a bid direct or did you always do it through a wholesaler?
> "The Witness: No, in the case where a hospital had a direct account with us, then they did not ask for bids. But in cases where a hospital asked for bids, we allowed anybody who wished to bid and we ourselves did not bid."

Other testimony indicates that Searle would not ship on a "drop shipment" order to a hospital where they had a direct account. There was also the testimony of Mr. Butler, the mainstay of the defendant, that as to Searle's products, his concern bid only at Los Angeles County, Los Angeles City and San Bernardino County, so far as he could recall. He actually sold Searle goods to one account only, the County of Los Angeles. While the arrangement with the defendant continued Searle neither bid nor sold to these accounts.

These and other facts, already alluded to, indicate the absence of competition between Searle and the defendant or others. Essentially, Searle was a manufacturer and such sales were merely incidental and accessory to its main business,—that of manufacturing. (See, General Electric Company v. Kimball Jewelers, Inc., 1956 [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,291], 333 Mass. 665, 132 N. E. 2d 652, 657)

[Competition—Monopoly]

One other matter should be adverted to. The evidence shows clearly that both as to the pharmaceutical product to which the mark was attached, and as to other products which Searle manufactured and sold under various tradenames, there were other products manufactured by other pharmaceutical companies in actual competition with each of them. So we are back to the fact that Searle did not exercise unreasonable monopoly powers, that they were not in a position to "control price or exclude competition". (United States v. duPont & Co., 1956 [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,369], 351 U. S. 377, 391)

Very apposite here are the following words of the Supreme Court in the case just cited:

> "Thus one can theorize that we have monopolistic competition in every nonstandardized commodity with each manufacturer having power over the price and production of his own product. However, this power that, let us say, automobile or soft-drink manufacturers have over their trademarked products is not the power that makes an illegal monopoly. Illegal power must be appraised in terms of the competitive market for the product.
> "Determination of the competitive market for commodities depends on how different from one another are the offered commodities in character or use, how far buyers will go to substitute one commodity for another. For example, one can think of building materials as in commodity competition but one could hardly say that brick competed with steel or wood or cement or stone in the meaning of Sherman Act litigation; the products are too different. This is the interindustry competition emphasized by some economists. See Lilienthal, Big Business, c. 5. On the other hand, there are certain differences in the formulae for soft drinks but one can hardly say that each one is an illegal monopoly. Whatever the market may be, we hold that control of price or competition establishes the existence of monopoly power under § 2. Section 2 requires the application of a reasonable approach in determining the existence of monopoly power just as surely as did § 1." (p. 393) (Emphasis added)

So here the only monopoly is that which the excellence of its products may have given to Searle. Indicative of the freedom of action in the field is the fact that the defendant, after being deprived of the privilege of bidding for Searle products, caused a chemist to manufacture a kilo of the chemical product (dimenhydrinate) sold under the trademark of "Dramamine". They did not go beyond that because, as stated, the injunction intervened and stopped in their incipiency their activities in infringing the mark. Only one advertisement appeared in which the mark "Dramamine" was used, dividing the syllables in this manner: "Dram-a-mine", and adding the letters "I. D. D.", the initials of the defendant's corporate name.

Summary and Conclusion

[Trade-Mark]

From what precedes the following conclusions may be drawn. The plaintiff has a valid mark which has been infringed by the defendant. The fact that the harm which the defendant might do to a concern such as plaintiff's with its large resources is not great, affects only the right to recover damages and makes the case one in which the remedy should be limited to injunctive relief. (15 U. S. C. A., § 1117; Champion Plug Co. v. Sanders, 1947, 331 U. S. 125, 130-131; National Dryer Mfg. Corp. v. National Machinery Co., D. C. Pa. 1955, 136 F. Supp. 886) Otherwise the plaintiff is entitled to the full relief as spelled out by the court in Mishawaka Mfg. Co. v. Kresge Co., 1942, 316 U. S. 203, 205:

"The protection of trade-marks is the law's recognition of the psychological function of symbols. If it is true that we live by symbols, it is no less true that we purchase goods by them. A trade-mark is a merchandising short-cut which induces a purchaser to select what he wants, or what he has been led to believe he wants. The owner of a mark exploits this human propensity by making every effort to impregnate the atmosphere of the market with the drawing power of a congenial symbol. Whatever the means employed, the aim is the same—to convey through the mark, in the minds of potential customers, the desirability of the commodity upon which it appears. Once this is attained, the trademark owner has something of value. If another poaches upon the commercial magnetism of the symbol he has created, the owner can obtain legal redress." (p. 205)

[Refused to Deal]

As already stated, the plaintiff has not been guilty of violation of any of the antitrust laws. The arrangements as to price are within the scope of the restrictions that a manufacturing company may place on sale on penalty of refusing to deal with a particular person. Not every monopolistic practice violates the antitrust law. Monopolistic restrictions are condemned only if they affect a substantial segment of interstate commerce. Unilateral refusal to deal is not a violation of law. (Charles F. Barber, Refusal to Deal Under the Antitrust Laws, 1954, 103 U. of Pa. L. Rev. 847) This is especially true where, as here, there was competition in the market as to every one of the products manufactured by the plaintiff. (United States v. E. I. duPont de Nemours & Co., 1956 [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,369], 351 U. S. 377. See, Donald F. Turner, Antitrust Policy and the Cellophane Case, 1956, 70 Harv. L. Rev., 281)

The only real advantages the plaintiff has are those flowing from the primacy which its trademarked and tradenamed products and their quality has given them over the course of years. To this they are legitimately entitled. There can be no unlawful monopolization

"unless accompanied by a purpose or intent to exclude competition." (Cutter Laboratories v. Lyophile-Cryochem Corp., 9 Cir., 1949, 179 F. 2d 80, 93)

petitive to those manufactured by Searle. There was no requirement of "exclusive representation" of the type which the antitrust laws condemn as a condition to dealing in Searle products or even "Dramamine". (See, Standard Oil of California v. United States, 1949 [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,432], 337 U. S. 293; Richfield Oil Corp. v. United States, 1952 [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,262], 343 U. S. 922)

So Judgment will be for the plaintiff for injunctive relief and costs.

[Damages—Jury Trial]

One observation should be added as to the form of the Judgment. The defendant by counterclaim seeks damages for violation of the antitrust laws, (15 U. S. C. A., § 15 and § 26) and has asked for a jury trial. The scope of the trial of the counterclaim will be markedly affected by the correctness of the findings of this Court on the subject of the validity of the trademark and of the lawfulness of the practices outlined in this opinion. So this is a case in which the provisions of Rule 54(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure should apply. The Judgment will, therefore, be declared final as to the issues involved within the meaning of that rule. Formal judgment and findings to be prepared by counsel for the plaintiff under local Rule 7.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. September Term 1956—April Session 1957. No. 11941. Dated May 31, 1957.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division. KNOCH, District Judge.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Who May Bring Suit —Non-Operating Landlord of Motion Picture Theatre—Injury to Business or Property.— A non-operating landlord of a motion picture theatre which was entitled, under the terms of its lease, to a fixed minimum rental plus a percentage of the lessee's gross receipts could maintain a treble damage action alleging that the lessee, other motion picture exhibitors, and motion picture distributors engaged in a conspiracy to monopolize and restrain trade in the exhibition of motion pictures, that the effect of the conspiracy was to relegate the theatre to an inferior playing position and that it was thereby deprived of rentals under the percentage clause that it otherwise would have received. The injury allegedly sustained by the lessor was susceptible of proof, both as to the fact of injury and as to the amount of damages; the injury to the lessor as a non-operating theatre owner was not unforseeable; the acts of the defendants were the direct and proximate cause of such injury; and the lessor was seeking recovery in its own right, not derivatively through the lessee. The lessor was injured in its business or property within the meaning of Section 4 of the Clayton Act. The lessor's rights under the lease were of value, and to the extent that the value of any of the rights was diminished, the lessor was injured. Whatever the legal characterization of these rights, they were within the term "property" as used in the Act. "It is the source of injury, not the character of property or business injured, which constitutes the test of recovery." Furthermore, the failure of the lessor to demand that the defendants refrain from their alleged illegal acts does not legalize or immunize defendants against liability to the lessor. Section 4 does not require a demand as a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9005.55.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Defenses—Statute of Limitations—Applicable Statute—Allegation of Claim Within Limitation Period.—Since a non-operating landlord of a motion picture theatre commenced its treble damage action prior to the enactment of the Federal statute of limitations, the action was governed by an Illinois statute of limitations which prescribes a two-year limitation period. The allegations of injury and antitrust violation encompassed all the time from July, 1933, to the date of the action, and the complaint clearly alleged a claim that was within the limitation period. The defendants' contention that the last act from which damage could have accrued occurred more than two years prior to the filing of the complaint was rejected. The complaint allegedly a conspiracy to monopolize first and first subsequent run film exhibition. "We cannot understand how the fact that plaintiff's theatre was moved up to a first subsequent run exhibiting position affects or negates the alleged effect on it of the first run monopoly and the clearance period which is imposed before it gets even first subsequent run films." The change in playing position may lessen the alleged diversion of patronage, but it does not eliminate or legalize it.

Reversing and remanding a decision of the U. S. District Court, Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, 1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,513.

Before FINNEGAN, LINDLEY and SWAIM, Circuit Judges.

[Trial Court Ruling]

SWAIM, Circuit Judge [In full text]: This action was commenced in the District Court as a private antitrust suit under Sections 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. A. §§ 15, 26, to recover treble damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained by reason of defendants' violationn of the Sherman and Clayton Acts, and for injunctive relief. The District Court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment on the ground that plaintiff is not a person injured in its business or property within the meaning of Section 4 of the Clayton Act and, therefore, is not entitled to maintain this action. (Reported in CCH [1956] TRADE CASES Par. 68,513 (1956).)

[Non-operating Lessor of Theatre]

Plaintiff is the non-operating owner-lessor of a motion picture theater property located in Chicago, Illinois. The theater is leased to defendant Balaban & Katz (B & K) which controls the operation of the theater. Under the terms of the lease plaintiff is entitled to a fixed minimum rental plus a percentage of the lessee's gross receipts. The lessee has at all times paid the minimum rental, but, as alleged by plaintiff, the receipts, and thus the amounts payable by the lessee under the percentage clause, have been kept down due to the illegal trade practices of the defendant-lessee B & K, certain motion picture distributors and certain affiliated exhibitors in the City of Chicago. Plaintiff alleged that the defendants, including the defendant-lessee, engaged in a conspiracy to monopolize first and first subsequent run exhibition of motion pictures in the City of Chicago and to restrain trade and commerce in the licensing of motion pictures for exhibition by suppressing the competition of independent exhibitors, by the establishment of a uniform system of minimum theater admission prices to be charged by exhibitors, uniform playing positions for theaters and a uniform system for releasing motion pictures for exhibition. Plaintiff further alleged that the effect of these illegal trade practices was to relegate its theater to an inferior exhibiting position thereby depriving plaintiff of rentals under the percentage clause that it otherwise would have received.

[Right To Maintain Action]

The question of whether a non-operating lessor may maintain a treble damage action has been infrequently litigated and such decisions as there are are difficult to reconcile. In East Orange Amusement Co. v. Vitagraph, Inc., D. C. N. J., CCH Trade Cas. [TRADE REGULATION REPORTS, Ninth Edition, Supp. 1941-1943] Par. 52,965 (1943), the lessor claimed that antitrust violations had caused his lessee to default in the payment of rent and that this default, in turn, resulted in the lessor's loss of his real estate to a mortgagee. And in Camrel Co. v. Paramount Film Distributing Corp., D. C. S. D. N. Y., CCH [1944-1945] TRADE CASES Par. 57,233 (1944), the lessor claimed, as a result of alleged antitrust violations, injury to the rental and market value of its real estate and, in addition, injury under a percentage rental clause like that in the instant case. The District Court in each of the above cases upheld the lessor's capacity to sue by denying motions to dismiss. However, neither court gave substantial treatment to the problem. The authority of these cases may be in doubt because of later decisions by the Courts of Appeal for their respective circuits. See Harrison v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., D. C. E. D. Pa. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,568], 115 F. Supp. 312, aff'd 3 Cir. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,721], 211 F. 2d 405, certiorari denied 348 U. S. 828; Melrose Realty Co. v. Loew's Inc., 3 Cir. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,358, 68,423], 234 F. 2d 518, certiorari denied 352 U. S. 890; Productive Inventions, Inc. v. Trico Products Corp., 2 Cir. [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,104], 224 F. 2d 678, certiorari denied 350 U. S. 936 (these cases will be considered shortly).

This problem was also before the court in Westmoreland Asbestos Co. v. Johns-Manville Corp., D. C. S. D. N. Y., 30 F. Supp. 389, aff'd 2 Cir., 113 F. 2d 114, where it was held that the injuries to the lessor were too remote to entitle him to maintain the action. It must be noted that in the East Orange, Camrel and Westmoreland cases the lessee was also a victim of the alleged antitrust violations which is not the case here, as the defendant-lessee is alleged to have been a participant in the trade practices complained of.

Harrision v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., D. C. E. D. Pa. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,568], 115 F. Supp. 312, is the first decision to deal fully with the problems peculiar to a suit by a lessor. The lessor, a non-operating theater owner, claimed injury to the market value of her theater and injury under a percentage rental clause, as a result of alleged antitrust violations. Although the court's opinion is not explicit on this point, it appears that the lessee was alleged to be one of the co-conspirators. The court held that the lessor did not have capacity to sue on two alternative lines of argument: (1) that the interest of the lessor was such that there could be no injury in "his business or property," as required by Section 4 of the Clayton Act; (2) that even if there were injury to his business or property within the meaning of Section 4, it would be too remote to be compensable. The Court of Appeals affirmed in a per curiam opinion and adopted the reasoning of the district judge. 3 Cir. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,721], 211 F. 2d 405, certiorari denied 348 U. S. 828.

The problem was next considered in Steiner v. 20th Century-Fox Film Corp., 9 Cir. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,304], 232 F. 2d 190. The lessor, another non-operating theater owner, claimed that as a result of alleged antitrust violations she was forced to lease her theater for less than a reasonable rental. The prime lessee was alleged to be one of the co-conspirators and initially was made a party defendant. However, the lessor dismissed her complaint as against the lessee. There, as here, it was asserted that the lessor's interest is too remote to be compensable. The court distinguished the Harrison case and held that the lessor was entitled to maintain the action, saying:

> "Here the complaint affirmatively alleges direct injury to the [lessor], not the lessee. It is said the appellees' wrongful acts operated directly upon the [lessor]. This is sufficient for the [lessor] to become a proper party to complain of the conspiracy alleged." 232 F. 2d at 193.

The court distinguished the Harrison case as follows:

> "The cases cited by the appellees are not factually similar to the case at bar. In Harrison v. Paramount Pictures [citation] there were no direct dealings between the plaintiff and defendant. Here the [lessor] asserts the appellees conspired with the prime lessee to force [lessor] to receive less than a reasonable rent." 232 F. 2d at 193.

The court's treatment of the Harrison case is confusing. If, when the court said, "there were no direct dealings between the plaintiff and defendant" in Harrison, it meant that the lessee was not alleged to be one of the co-conspirators, it is in error. If, on the other hand, the court meant that there were no direct dealings between the plaintiff and the defendants other than the lessee, it is probably correct. The court may have well intended the latter since there is some language in the court's opinion which indicates the lessor in Steiner alleged that the defendants other than the lessee had direct dealings with her. The question then arises whether this is a significant distinction.

The problem was again considered by the Third Circuit in Melrose Realty Co. v. Loew's Inc. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,358, 68,423], 234 F. 2d 518, certiorari denied 352 U. S. 890, and the court adhered to the rule laid down in the Harrison case. The only reference made by the court to the Steiner case is found in Chief Judge Biggs' dissent on the petition for rehearing. 234 F. 2d at 519.

The rationale of Harrison was approved by the Second Circuit in Productive Inventions, Inc. v. Trico Products Corp. [1955 Trade Cases ¶ 68,104], 224 F. 2d 678, certiorari denied 350 U. S. 936. The plaintiff, a patentee, who had granted to another an exclusive license upon a royalty basis, claimed injury due to a loss of royalties on sales that might have been made save for the allaged antitrust violations of the defendant. The court held that the licensor had no standing to sue because its loss was "beyond the limit of injuries cognizable under the antitrust laws." The injury asserted by the licensor is analogous to the injury claimed by the plaintiff in the instant case under the percentage rental clause. It should be noted, however, that the licensee was also a victim of the alleged antitrust violations, and not a co-conspirator.

The Harrison rationale has been also cited with approval in Miley v. John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co., D. C. Mass. [1957 Trade Cases ¶ 68,609], 148 F. Supp. 299; and Snow Crest Beverages, Inc. v. Recipe Foods, Inc., D. C. Mass. [1957 Trade Cases ¶ 68,602], 147 F. Supp. 907. In Miley, the plaintiff, an insurance broker, claimed injury to his business due to loss of insurance premiums which he would have earned save for the alleged antitrust violations of the defendants by causing the insurance company which he was representing to lose a profitable contract. And in the Snow Crest case the plaintiff claimed injury due to loss of business as the supplier of another who was the intended victim of the alleged antitrust violations. In each of these cases the court adopted the Harrison rationale and held that the interest of the plaintiff was too remote to be compensable and, therefore, each lacked the standing to maintain the action.

The situation in the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, only adds to the confusion. In two recent decisions, in cases virtually indistinguishable factually from the instant case, that court has held that a non-operating theater owner is entitled to maintain a treble damage action. Tower Building Corp. v. Loew's Inc., CCH [1956] Trade Cases Par. 68,537 (1956); and 1617 Belmont Co. v. Columbia Pictures Corp., No. 52-C-251 (unreported).

[Dissimilar Situations]

Turning to factually dissimilar situations where this general problem has been considered, we find some degree of uniformity. The courts have uniformly denied recovery to stockholders. Gerli v. Silk Ass'n of America, D. C. S. D. N. Y., 36 F. 2d 959; Loeb v. Eastman Kodak Co., 3 Cir., 183 Fed. 704, creditors, Loeb v. Eastman Kodak Co., supra, and deposed officers of a corporation, Corey v. Boston Ice Co., D. C. Mass., 207 Fed. 465, who claimed injury as the result of alleged antitrust violations. See also Productive Inventions, Inc. v. Trico Products Corp., 2 Cir. [1955 Trade Cases ¶ 68,104], 224 F. 2d 678, certiorari denied 350 U. S. 936; Miley v. John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co., D. C. Mass. [1957 Trade Cases ¶ 68,609], 148 F. Supp. 299; and Snow Crest Beverages, Inc. v. Recipe Foods, Inc., D. C. Mass. [1957 Trade Cases ¶ 68,602], 147 F. Supp. 907, which are discussed above. On the other hand, this court has permitted a sales agent to recover lost commissions and it is of note that his employer was a participant in the trade practices complained of. Roseland v. Phister Mfg. Co., 7 Cir. [1940-1943 Trade Cases ¶ 56,187], 125 F. 2d 417. See also, Vines v. General Outdoor Advertising Co., 2 Cir. [1948-1949 Trade Cases ¶ 62,340], 171 F. 2d 487; McWhirter v. Monroe Calculating Mach. Co., D. C. W. D. Mo. [1948-1949 Trade Cases ¶ 62,227], 76 F. Supp. 456; and Klein v. Sales Builders, Inc., D. C. N. D. Ill., CCH [1950-1951] Trade Cases Par. 62,600 (1950).

It is not clear why the interest of a sales agent should be considered less remote than the interest of either a stockholder, creditor or employee. However, the diverse treatment of the stockholder-creditor cases and the sales agent cases is not without its justification. To permit individual stockholder recovery would run counter to the traditional treatment of corporate injury that the corporation is the proper party to redress corporate wrongs. And direct recovery by the individual creditor would give him a preference over other creditors of the insolvent business and such recovery may act to thwart the policy of the bankruptcy laws. Further, the number of stockholders and creditors might produce an insurmountable problem of multiplicity of suits. These problems are not present in the sales agent situation nor are they present in the non-operating lessor situation.

On the basis of this analysis, it would seem more logical that the instant case be aligned with the sales agent cases, rather than the stockholder-creditor cases. It is also true that considerations such as these may be grounds for distinction in cases where the lessee is also injured as the result of antitrust violations and cases where the lessee is a party to the antitrust violations. For example, would the defendants be subject to two actions, one by the lessor and one by the lessee. Suppose the lessee sues first and recovers, should the damages be apportioned between lessor and lessee and, if so, how? Another problem is that of settlements by one of the parties without the participation or consent of the other. See Hempstead Theatre Corp. v. Metropolitan Playhouses, Inc., 308 N. Y. 712, 124 N. E. 2d 332. None of these problems is present in the lessor situation where the lessee is a party to the antitrust violations, and may justify a different result.

[Clayton Act]

Section 4 of the Clayton Act provides that:

> "Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor * * * and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained * * *."

Notwithstanding the broad language of Section 4, which literally, at least, appears to give the plaintiff herein a cause of action, the courts have narrowed the apparent scope of this statute usually on the ground, more or less expressed, that in view of the severity of the penalty a line must be drawn. Thus, in the Harrison case the court said:

> "In determining the scope of the Act it must be remembered that the treble damage feature is an enforcement provision and superimposes a penalty upon compensation. As such it should not be literally construed if unreasonable results would be reached by so doing. Obviously, there must be a limit somewhere." 115 F. Supp. at 317.

And in Snow Crest Beverages, Inc. v. Recipe Foods, Inc., D. C. Mass., 147 F. Supp. at 909, the court said:

> "Without trying to spell out in detail the justification for these decisions, it may be noted that if they had gone the other way, there would as a result of the treble damage provisions of the anti-trust acts have been given in each case to the plaintiff what has sometimes been called a 'windfall.' [Citing] In effect, businessmen would be subjected to liabilities of indefinable scope for conduct already subject to drastic private remedies."

Compare with these statements, however, the one made by this court in Roseland v. Phister Mfg. Co., 125 F. 2d at 420:

> "We may not by what seems to us a strained and unjustified limitation bar plaintiff from the statutory remedy. 'Congress evidently foresaw the wholesome effect of pecuniary responsibility for injuries resulting from such forbidden combinations and the courts should not devitalize the remedy by strained interpretations calculated to encourage disregard of the law.'"

And as recently as this year the Supreme Court has admonished the inferior federal courts that:

> "Petitioner's claim need only be 'tested under the Sherman Act's general prohibition on unreasonable restraints of trade,' [citing] and meet the requirement that petitioner has thereby suffered injury. Congress has, by legislative fiat, determined that such prohibited activities are injurious to the public and has provided sanctions allowing private enforcement of the antitrust laws by an aggrieved party. These laws protect the victims of the forbidden practices as well as the public. [Citing] Furthermore, Congress itself has placed the private antitrust litigant in a most favorable position through the enactment of § 5 of the Clayton Act. [Citing] In the face of such a policy this Court should not add requirements to burden the private litigant beyond what is specifically set forth by Congress in those laws." Radovich v. Nat. Football League [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,628], 352 U. S. 445, 453-454.

[Existence of Competition]

Since the District Court decision in the Harrison case is the only decision to deal fully with the problems peculiar to a suit by a lessor and since defendants' argument herein suggests no additional considerations, we shall consider in detail the rationale set forth therein. The court said, 115 F. Supp. at 316:

> "The plaintiff has not shown and does not allege that she has ever had any business transactions with the defendants. She is not in the business of operating a motion picture theater."

We do not think it significant that the plaintiff was not in direct competition with the defendants. In Snow Crest Beverages, Inc. v. Recipe Foods, Inc., D. C. Mass., 147 F. Supp. at 909, the court stated:

> "Courts aware of these considerations have been reluctant to allow those who were not in direct competition with the defendant to have a private action even though as a matter of logic their losses were foreseeable. Congress has failed to amend the antitrust laws on this point in the face of repeated decisions. It seems to have been content for the judiciary to take a position narrower than that often applied in nonstatutory tort cases and in cases where plaintiffs are not allowed a multiple recovery."

Not only in this "limitation" without support in the language of Section 4 but it appears to have been implicitly rejected by the Supreme Court. E.g., Radovich v. Nat. Football League [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,628], 352 U. S. 445; and Bigelow v. R. K. O. Radio Pictures, Inc. [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,445], 327 U. S. 251. And furthermore, there are many decisions to the contrary. E.g., Chattanooga Foundry & Pipe Works v. City of Atlanta, 203 U. S. 390; Steiner v. 20th Century-Fox Film Corp., 9 Cir. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,304], 232 F. 2d 190; Roseland v. Phister Mfg. Co., 7 Cir. [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,187], 125 F. 2d 417; McWhirter v. Monroe Calculating Mach. Co., D. C. W. D. Mo. [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,227], 76 F. Supp. 456; Klein v. Sales Builders, Inc., D. C. N. D. Ill., CCH [1950-1951] TRADE CASES Par. 62,600 (1950); East Orange Amusement Co. v. Vitagraph, Inc., D. C. N. J., CCH Trade Cas. [TRADE REGULATION REPORTS, Ninth Edition, Supp. 1941-1943] Par. 52,965 (1943); Camrel Co. v. Paramount Film Distributing Corp., D. C. S. D. N. Y., CCH [1944-1945] TRADE CASES Par. 57,233 (1944).

[Lessor's Interest]

As to the question of injury the court in Harrison said, 115 F. Supp. at 316:

> "First, she says that if the theatre had been operated by the tenant showing pictures on first-run, the receipts would have been greater and she might have obtained a larger rental, by way of percentage, than she did. The fact is that while she would have had a right to rental above the minimum, if earned, she had nothing more than a hope that it ever would be earned."

To characterize the interest of the lessor under the percentage clause as no more than a "hope" is to subtly beg the question and ignore the fact that most economic dealings and transactions are founded on "hope"—the hope of making a profit. In any event, it would seem to be a hope which should not be impaired with impunity by violations of the law. See Vines v. General Outdoor Advertising Co., 2 Cir. [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,340], 171 F. 2d 487; Roseland v. Phister Mfg. Co., 7 Cir. [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,187], 125 F. 2d 417. Furthermore, it may be fairly assumed that in bargaining for the percentage clause, the lessor undoubtedly accepted a lower minimum rental than it would otherwise have agreed to. In other words, plaintiff accepted a lower minimum rental in return for the "hope" of a percentage of the lessee's receipts, and thereby accepted as well, a share of the risks of the business. Since plaintiff accepted some part of the business risks, plaintiff would appear to be entitled to rely on statutory remedies whose purpose is to reduce such risks. This would obviously be the case if the plaintiff and B & K were partners in the operation of the theater.

[Antitrust Violation]

In Harrison the court continued, 115 F. Supp. at 316:

> "The tenant could have operated the business, from whatever motive, so as to keep the percentage from ever exceeding the minimum, for example, by cutting admission charges, discontinuing advertising or showing nothing but foreign language or documentary films, and there would be no right which the plaintiff could have asserted against him in that respect."

This statement ignores the fact that the lessor is not asserting mismanagement by the lessee or merely expressing disappointment in the lessee's receipts, but rather that the lessee in conjunction with others conspired to and did violate the antitrust laws to the plaintiff's injury. Surely the fact that the operation of the theater was entrusted to the discretion of the lessee does not give the lessee the right to flaunt the antitrust laws, nor can we see why this fact should deny plaintiff the protection of and the right to rely on statutory remedies provided by the antitrust laws.

[Direct Injury]

The court continued, 115 F. Supp. at 317:

> "But even if it be assumed that the plaintiff had some property, some right, which was susceptible of injury, and that such injury could be traced to the acts of defendants, the question of remoteness remains."

If the plaintiff's allegations are proved, we are not at a loss to see how it can be said that it has not been injured. In fact, everyone seems to concede the existence of the injury, but then counter with the argument that it is too remote to be compensable. We think the alleged acts of the defendants are clearly the direct and proximate cause of the injury. What intervening factors are there to consider? The only one that suggests itself is that if competitive conditions had prevailed would the lessee's operation of the theater have been more profitable with resulting pecuniary benefit to the lessor under the percentage clause. This problem, however, is present when a lessee sues. See Bigelow v. R. K. O. Radio Pictures, Inc. [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,445], 327 U. S. 251. In fact, the similarity between the proof necessary in each of these cases is obvious. The antitrust violation has allegedly decreased the receipts of the enterprise by an amount which is ascertainable and recoverable where the lessee sues. See Bigelow v. R. K. O. Radio Pictures, Inc., supra. For a lessor to establish the extent of his injury under the percentage clause, he would make virtually the same proof as the lessee. The only hidden assumption in this analysis is that in most instances the interests of the lessor and lessee would coincide. In other words, whatever operation of the theater would produce the greatest return for the lessee would also produce the greatest return for the lessor. Only when the outside interests of the lessee dictated a less profitable operation of the lessor's theater would there be a divergence in their respective interests.

In the Harrison case the court continued, 115 F. Supp. at 317:

"The difficulties which would arise unless some consideration be given to the remoteness or indirectness of the injury are particularly apparent in the motion picture business, in which thousands of theatres are owned by persons who have nothing to do with the operation of them and no right to interfere."

However, to deny recovery to the plaintiff would "devitalize the remedy by strained interpretations calculated to encourage disregard of the law." Roseland v. Phister Mfg. Co., 7 Cir. [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,187], 125 F. 2d at 420. The only thing an intended violator need do is join forces with the lessee as was done here and violate the law with impunity, free from private actions for treble damages. The problem of multiplicity of suits to which the court alluded is not similar to stockholder-creditor cases where a single entity exists to redress the wrong, for here there is no such entity. In fact, if the lessor cannot sue there will be no private redress for the defendants' wrongful acts. Furthermore, multiplicity is always present where the acts of the tortfeasor injure more than one individual.

The court continued, 115 F. Supp. at 317:

"In such a situation, where a tenant desires a particular kind of product, must the distributors seek out the owner of the building to ascertain whether they can safely give the tenant what he wants? It seems clear that unless a line is drawn excluding remote and indirect injuries to property owners in similar cases, an almost intolerable burden would be placed upon the whole industry."

In the first place, the most elementary conceptions of justice and public policy require that a wrongdoer shall bear the risk of any burdens which his wrong has created. Cf. Bigelow v. R. K. O. Radio Pictures, Inc. [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,445], 327 U. S. 251. And secondly, the "burden" to which the court alluded is in fact nonexistent. The film distributors can obviously enter into legitimate business arrangements with the lessee without incurring liability and without the need for lessor approval of such arrangements. This is not to say, however, that the film distributor can engage in illegal trade practices without fear of legal redress by an injured party.

[Lessor's Property Rights]

Finally, we return to the argument that the lessor was not injured in "his property or business" within the meaning of Section 4 of the Clayton Act. The defendants herein contend that, "Once the lease had been executed, plaintiff's 'business' of leasing ceased." We do not think it necessary to consider this "argument," for we think it clear that plaintiff was injured in its property. "A man is injured in his property when his property is diminished." Chattanooga Foundry & Pipe Works v. City of Atlanta, 203 U. S. 390, 399. Under the terms of the lease plaintiff retained the right to the reversion of the fee after the expiration of the leasehold, a right to a minimum rental, and a right to a percentage of the lessee's gross receipts if and when the minimum rental was earned. The lessor's rights under the lease were undoubtedly of value and could have been sold, bartered or given away. To the extent that the value of any of these rights is diminished, the lessor is injured. Whatever the legal characterization of these rights may be, they are clearly within the term "property" as used in Section 4 of the Clayton Act. And as was said in Roseland v. Phister Mfg. Co., 7 Cir., 125 F. 2d at 420, "It is the source of injury, not the character of property or business injured, which constitutes the test of recovery."

[Summary]

In summary, the injury that plaintiff allegedly sustained is susceptible of proof, both as to the fact of injury and as to the amount of damages; the injury to plaintiff as a non-operating lessor was not unforeseeable; the acts of the defendants are the direct and proximate cause of such injury; and the plaintiff is seeking recovery in its own right, not derivatively through the lessee. In these circumstances we do not believe that recovery should be denied on some vague notion that "a line must be drawn." We therefore decline to follow the rule laid down by the Third Circuit in the Harrison and Melrose decisions.

[Demand by Lessee]

In the alternative the defendants insist that because the plaintiff did not demand or request of any of the defendants earlier runs for its theater plaintiff is precluded from claiming any damages. Although the parties have briefed and orally argued this point on appeal, the plaintiff proceeds on the assumption that the District Court did not reach this question. However, as we read the District Court's memorandum opinion, it appears that the District Judge was of the opinion that demand is a condition precedent. In so holding we believe the District Judge erred. The failure of the plaintiff to demand that defendants refrain from their illegal trade practices could not legalize such trade practices nor immunize defendants against liability to those injured. Kobe, Inc. v. Dempsey Pump Co., 10 Cir. [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,312], 198 F. 2d 416, certiorari denied 344 U. S. 837; Ulrich v. Ethyl Gasoline Corp., D. C. W. D. Ky., 2 F. R. D. 357. The defendants had a duty to refrain from acts injurious to others and we know of no rule that states that demand is necessary in an action to enforce a liability arising from a tortious act. See generally, 1 Am. Jur., Actions § 36; 1 C. J. S. Actions § 27; 86 C. J. S. Torts § 51. Neither Section 4 of the Clayton Act, nor the terms of any agreement or undertaking by plaintiff with any of the defendants, express or implied, nor the circumstances of this case require a demand as a condition precedent to the maintenance of this action.

We must confess that there is some language in the decision by this court in Milwaukee Towne Corp. v. Loew's Inc. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,891], 190 F. 2d 561, certiorari denied 342 U. S. 909, which lends support to the argument advanced by defendants. See also J. J. Theatres, Inc. v. Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corp., 2 Cir. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,757], 212 F. 2d 840; and see Vilastor Kent Theatre Corp. v. Brandt, D. C. S. D. N. Y. [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,102], 18 F. R. D. 199; T. C. Theatre Corp. v. Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc., D. C. S. D. N. Y. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,761], 16 F. R. D. 173. However, as we read the Milwaukee Towne decision, the court did not hold that a demand was a condition precedent to the maintenance of a private antitrust suit. The case was tried on the theory of a refusal to deal, which is also true of the J. J. Theatres case, at least in part, and the court held properly, we think, that without a demand or request to deal there could be no refusal to deal. But that is not the case here.

[Statute of Limitations]

Defendants also seek to support the judgment below on another ground not passed on by the District Court but which was argued here both orally and in the briefs, namely, that the statute of limitations had run on plaintiff's cause of action before the complaint was filed. This action was commenced on September 1, 1950, prior to the enactment of Section 4B of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 15b, and is therefore governed by Ill. Rev. Stat. (1955) c. 83, § 15, which prescribes a two year limitation period. Whitsell v. Alexander, 7 Cir. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,255], 229 F. 2d 47, certiorari denied 351 U. S. 932, and cases cited therein. The allegations of injury and antitrust violation by the plaintiff encompass "all time from July 20, 1933, to the date of this action," and the complaint, standing alone, clearly alleges a claim that is within the limitation period. The defendants argue that the affidavit of one Harry Lustgarten filed in support of their motion for summary judgment establishes that first subsequent run films were exhibited in plaintiff's theater on and subsequent to February 27, 1948, and "[t]hus, the last act from which damage could have accrued occurred, if at all, on February 27, 1948, more than two years prior to the filing of the Complaint." Defendants arrive at this conclusion by an obvious emasculation of the complaint. The plaintiff alleges a conspiracy to monopolize first and first subsequent run film exhibition. We cannot understand how the fact that plaintiff's theater was moved up to a first subsequent run exhibiting position affects or negates the alleged effect on it of the first run monopoly and the clearance period which is imposed before it gets even first subsequent run films. At best this change in playing position may lessen the alleged diversion of patronage but it does not eliminate or legalize it. We conclude therefore that the complaint states a claim that is not barred by the statute of limitations. And in view of this conclusion we need not consider whether the plaintiff's amended complaint supplies the deficiencies which the defendants have asserted in arguing that the statute has run nor whether the Paramount decree has tolled the statute.

[Reversed]

For the reasons set forth above, the judgment of the District Court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages and Injunctive Relief—Pretrial Procedures—Refusal To Comply with Pretrial Orders—Dismissal of Action——Validity of Order Appointing Master.—A trial court dismissal of a private antitrust action, with prejudice, on the grounds (1) that one of the plaintiffs, as a party and as an officer and manager of a corporate party plaintiff, and another plaintiff, the president and director of the corporate party plaintiff, each willfully and without justification or excuse refused to testify by deposition after having been ordered by the court to testify, and (2) that the plaintiffs willfully and without justification or excuse failed and refused to comply with an order of the court to make a deposit to help defray fees and disbursements of a special master appointed to supervise discovery proceedings, was affirmed. Under the circumstances of the action, the plaintiffs were accorded fair and just treatment by the trial court, and their refusal to proceed in accordance with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and their willful and deliberate disobedience of the orders of the court necessitated and justified the dismissal of the action with prejudice. The plaintiffs' contention, among others, that the appointment of the special master was unlawful was rejected. The issues involved in the action were complicated, and the action was exceptional in presenting occasion and necessity for the services of a master preliminary to trial. The order of reference did not amount to an abdication of the judicial function and thereby deprive the parties of a trial before the court on the basic issues involved in the action. The reference was made at an early stage of preparation for trial, and it related, not to the basic issues in the action, but to pretrial matters. Furthermore, the plaintiffs waived any error that might have been committed in the reference since they failed to make a timely objection to the reference.

[Antitrust Action]

WOODROUGH, Circuit Judge [In full text]: This action was brought on February 18, 1954, to recover treble damages and injunctive relief under the Sherman Act and Clayton Act against the ten defendant utility corporations and the unincorporated association which are here as appellees.

[Trial Court Dismissal]

After the action had been pending nearly two years and on January 25, 1956, the District Court sustained motions made by the defendants to dismiss it for failure of plaintiffs to prosecute and for disobedience to Court orders in violation of The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The Court dismissed the action at plaintiffs' costs [1] with directions that the dismissal should operate as an adjudication upon the merits. The grounds for dismissal were (1) that plaintiff Harry J. Strong as a party plaintiff and as an officer and manager of the corporate party plaintiff First Iowa Hydro Electric Cooperative and plaintiff F. A. E. Gillmor, president and director of said cooperative, each did willfully and without justification or excuse after having been ordered by the Court to testify by deposition, willfully and without justification or excuse refuse to do so; (2) and that the plaintiffs willfully and without justification or excuse failed and refused to comply with an order of the Court to make a deposit of $2500, to defray fees and disbursements of the Special Master.

This appeal is taken to reverse the judgment.

[Causes of Action]

The defendants, except the unincorporated association and perhaps one or two others are, and long have been, engaged in distributing and selling electric power in an area that includes parts of Iowa and adjacent States. On September 8th, 1948, the Federal Power Commission granted a license to the plaintiff First Iowa Hydro Electric Cooperative to construct and operate a hydro-electric-project, No. 1853, in the Cedar River which flows through Iowa and to generate and sell its electric power in the same area where appellees operate. In State of Iowa v. Federal Power Commission, 178 F. 2d 421, this Court dismissed a petition to vacate the Commission's order granting the license to First Iowa Hydro Electric Cooperative. Our opinion contains a brief outline of the project and our conclusions concerning the powers of the Commission in the matter as declared by the Supreme Court in First Iowa Hydro Electric Cooperative v. Federal Power Commission 328 U. S. 152.

Although the probable cost of the project was estimated at many millions of dollars, the cooperative to which the license was granted consisted of the five persons who are joined with it as plaintiffs in this action. Each of the five has paid into the cooperative

[1] Except as to the Master's fees and disbursements, which were divided.

$2.00 for his share in it and the complaint alleged that "said individual plaintiffs constitute all of the members of the First Iowa Hydro Electric Cooperative and each own an equal one-fifth therein."

The complaint filed in this action charged that the defendants, beginning in 1938 when the cooperative was organized under the laws of Iowa (Chapter 390 § 1 of the 1935 Code of Iowa) and continuing thereafter, acted in conspiracy to violate and attempted to violate and violated the provisions against restraint of trade and monopoly contained in the Sherman Act and in the Clayton Act, first, to prevent the issuance of the license for the project to plaintiffs and then to prevent financing the project and construction of it by plaintiffs and thereby did prevent the plaintiffs "from obtaining the necessary funds to construct said project." The period of time covered by the complaint was from 1938 to 1956. Plaintiffs alleged they had been damaged by the defendants' conduct in the sum of $40,000,000 and prayed for recovery in the sum of $120,000,000. They also prayed that defendants be enjoined from continuing their wrongful acts and in strict accordance with Rule 38(b) of The Rules of Civil Procedure, they demanded a trial by jury "of all the issues tendered by the above and foregoing complaint, except the issue whether or not the plaintiffs are entitled to the equitable injunctive relief prayed."

The allegations of wrong done by defendants against plaintiffs are set forth in the complaint, mostly in paragraph ten,[2] in general and sweeping terms and without identification of times, places, persons or utterances.

Likewise the allegations as to diligent efforts made by plaintiffs to obtain money to construct and carry out the project, No. 1853, and as to institutions which "would willingly have furnished the funds to pay the cost of said proposed project" are merely general.[3]

[Discovery Proceedings]

Shortly after the complaint was filed and before any of the defendants answered it, certain defendants began discovery proceedings by means of written interrogatories and notices of depositions of the plaintiffs, but the interrogatories propounded and the answers and the notices gave rise to objec-

[2] Paragraph 10. "That since the organization of the plaintiff First Iowa Hydro Electric Cooperative in 1938, the defendants conspired to monopolize, monopolized, and attempted to monopolize the generation, transmission, distribution, and sale of electric light and power, in the area above described, and have unlawfully contracted, combined, and conspired to restrain trade and commerce among the several states in the distribution of electric light and power. These unlawful conspiracies to monopolize, and contracts and combinations, and conspiracies to restrain interstate trade and commerce in electric light and power have been and are being consummated by the following means and methods, among others:

"(a) Deliberate and continued attempts to prevent the issuance of a license to the plaintiff First Iowa Hydro Electric Cooperative and for the construction, operation and maintenance of the project originally known as the Cedar River Dam and later as Federal Power Commission Project #1853.

"(b) The agreement during the year 1948 reciting in substance their unalterable opposition to the proposed hydro electric project on the Cedar River in Muscatine County, Iowa; their agreement to pool their resources to oppose the construction of said project; and their further agreement that in the event said project should be built said defendants would not use any power from said generation facilities.

"(c) By threatening banks, bankers, financial institutions, their officers, brokers and or agents with boycott and loss of utility business on a national scale as well as the loss of future business from the members of the Iowa Utilities Association.

"(d) Carrying said agreement and conspiracy into effect by applying various persuasions, influences, threats, and intimidations to banks and banking and financial institutions solicited, requested, approached, and contracted in behalf of plaintiffs to assist in financing said project and thereby forcing and coercing said financial institutions to refuse to assist in the marketing of any securities to finance the cost of constructing said proposed project.

"(e) And otherwise hampering, interfering with, obstructing and impeding the financing of said project by divers and sundry means, methods and practices, the precise nature of which are unknown to these plaintiffs, but which proved nevertheless effective in thwarting and preventing the plaintiffs from obtaining the necessary funds to construct said project.

"(f) By various other unfair competitive practices designed to appropriate all of the electric light and power distribution in areas in Iowa, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Missouri hereinbefore referred to, all of which were designed to prevent plaintiff and other possible competitors from engaging in the generation and distribution of electric light and power in the area last above referred to."

[3] The allegations are mostly in paragraphs and paragraphs number 12 and 15 of the complaint state:

Paragraph 12. "That plaintiffs have at all times since receiving their certificate to do business as an association made diligent effort tions and motions and on March 30th, 1954, thirty days after the complaint had been filed, Judge Riley, on whose docket the case pended, conducted proceedings relative to preparing the case for trial at which all parties were represented by attorneys of record. Judge Riley observed that the charges in the complaint were very general; that under the old rules there would have been a plethora of motions for more specific statements and to strike and everything else; that little time should be wasted on those methods because of discovery proceedings designed to obviate them. Judge Riley stressed the seriousness of the charges in the complaint and their generality and declared that the defendants had the right to find out through depositions of the plaintiffs what the plaintiffs claimed the facts were on which they based their accusations and claims. The Judge accordingly made suggestions that all counsel sit down and try to figure out and agree among other things upon how the taking of the depositions of the individual plaintiffs should be handled in an orderly way and made suggestions how it could be done without undue duplication but in fairness to each of the eleven defendants.

He did not however require the defendants to file answers to the complaint before carrying on their discovery proceedings.

Apparently he thought that the defendants could obtain the information, to which they were entitled, from the individual plaintiffs by the production of documents and by depositions of plaintiffs. He directed the defendants to proceed to obtain the production of the documents by the plaintiffs and the taking of depositions of the individual plaintiffs in accordance with Rule 20.

[Answers]

It resulted that on July 9, 1954, the Court was called on to consider motions on behalf of both plaintiffs and defendants with respect to interrogatories which had been propounded and the responses prior to any pleading filed by defendants or the cause being at issue. After consideration of that situation, the Judge concluded that it was necessary to have the issues joined before proceeding further with the discovery proceedings and directed that defendants plead to the complaint within twenty days. At the same hearing he also entered an order to compel plaintiff Harry J. Strong to make and file a written oath to the effect, i.e., that he is secretary treasurer of the plaintiff cooperative, that the answers to interrogatories to which his signature was attached were made by him in that capacity as such officer for and on behalf of plaintiff [co-operative] and that his answers were true, etc., and that "failing this, plaintiff will be subject to sanctions under Rule 37."

A separate answer for each defendant was accordingly filed in due time, the answers being similar in respect to general and particular denials of all charges and each set up a number of specific defenses. But the generality of the pleadings left the defendants under the same necessity as before to find out through depositions of the plaintiffs what the plaintiffs claimed the facts were on which they based their charges and the court declared that its rulings on certain motions that had been filed were without prejudice to defendants' right to obtain by deposition the information they had sought by interrogatories.

[Court Orders]

Following the proceedings before Judge Riley on July 9, 1954, defendants were unable to compel the production of documents or the taking of depositions of the individual plaintiffs throughout the rest of the year 1954. Plaintiffs did not commence the production of the documents called for until January 18, 1955, and additional production was compelled by order of Judge Riley on March 24, 1955. The taking of the depositions of the individual plaintiffs which Judge Riley had declared to be the right of the defendants in his order of July 9, to finance and construct said project, and they, together with various other individuals interested in the construction of said project and in the resulting generation, transmission, distribution and sale of electric light and power on reasonable terms in the territory adjacent thereto in the State of Iowa and adjoining states, began negotiations with various banks and financial institutions in New York City, Chicago, and elsewhere to arrange for the sale of bonds and other securities to pay for the cost of constructing said project."

Paragraph 15. "That but for the threats, intimidation, coercion and other activities of defendants hereinbefore described the financial institutions above referred to would have willingly furnished the funds to pay the cost of said proposed project."

[Footnote 4 did not appear in the text of the opinion. CCH.]

1954, was delayed longer. Efforts to enter upon the taking of depositions by agreement failed and it was not until the 16th of May, 1955, about fifteen months after commencement of the action, that motions of certain defendants were sustained to the extent that the Court ordered that one of the defendants (Union Electric Power Company) should proceed to take the deposition of plaintiff Harry J. Strong on the sixth day of June, 1955, and named Commissioners to take the testimony and specified the place and hour. The Court directed the plaintiff Strong to present himself as the first witness and subject himself to examination as a witness until his deposition was concluded.

[Special Master]

Afterwards on May 23, 1955, an order was entered by the Court which recited that it appeared from the record and from the statements of counsel that it would expedite the taking of depositions and be in the interest of justice to appoint a Special Master in connection therewith. Mr. Wayne G. Cook was appointed as Special Master to supervise the conduct of the taking of said depositions, to rule on objections and to rule on all applications for relief which may be made by any party. He was to have "such other powers as the Court may by order later prescribe" and the order appointing him provided that his compensation was to be paid by the defendants participating in the depositions.

[Plaintiffs' Expenses]

The order for the appointment of Mr. Cook was made with the consent of all parties but before the taking of depositions began under it, plaintiffs moved to have the expense of plaintiffs' attorneys incidental to their attendance at the depositions assessed upon the defendants.

The motion was denied on June 4th, 1955.

[Deposition]

The deposition of Strong was accordingly begun pursuant to the Court's order on June 6, 1955, before the appointed Master and was carried on with some intermissions for fifteen days and until June 24, 1955.

Strong's testimony showed that he had originally conceived the idea of the formation of the plaintiff cooperative. He had been its general manager since its formation, was its secretary-treasurer and handled its funds, kept the records and devoted his time to its affairs since 1938. The allegations and charges of the complaint were based largely on the information he furnished to the attorneys and all of the other individual plaintiffs who testified corroborated that Strong was at all times the guiding force of the cooperative. He could apparently have disclosed what basis he had for each of the charges made against defendants of wrong doing in paragraph 10 of the complaint, but he reiterated day after day of his examination in response to inquiries as to whether he had disclosed all the facts on which he relied in respect to such allegations in substance, "I am sure that there are more * * * I can't recall them."

On the last few days of his examination, commencing on June 21, 1955, counsel began inquiring about the financial affairs of the cooperative. As the cooperative had no capital and proposed to obtain the millions necessary to pay for promotion expense, construction costs and commencement of operations from borrowing through the sale of bonds to be issued by it, the inquiry as to the handling of its financial affairs was relevant to the issue as to what caused the cooperative to fail, as to what transactions it had engaged in and as to damages.

Strong testified that the cooperative had never had a bank account in its own name and its funds were carried into his personal bank account; that he had "no way of knowing" how much of the $133,029.59, reflected in a certain report of the cooperative of August 9, 1952, to January 1, 1954, had gone through his personal account. He was asked how he accounted for a difference between the amount of money collected for the cooperative and the amount he showed had been spent and he replied, "I have no answer for it." He stated that he would not produce his personal records for defendants to hash over and stated; "It is none of your business."

[Production of Bank Records]

On June 22, 1955, Strong's attorney objected to further questioning of Strong regarding the finances of the cooperative, but counsel for the defendant taking the deposition, moved that the Master require Strong to produce his bank records because the personal and cooperative funds were shown to be commingled in those records. On examining the transcript and hearing the arguments, the Master ordered the production of the bank records. Thereupon the plaintiffs made charges against the Master, Mr. Cook, to the effect that he was disqualified to act as Master and they obtained a delay of the deposition until July 11, 1955, in consequence of the charges.

Strong was advised by the counsel examining him for the defendants that on resumption of his deposition there would be further questioning concerning the finances of the project.

The parties convened before the Master on July 11, but there was no examination of Strong until the morning of July 12th, when he submitted to questioning on matters other than finances. With exception of the questioning on that morning, Strong practically terminated the taking of his deposition on June 22, 1955, at the time when the Master heard the motion for production of his bank records and ruled that they should be produced. Strong prevented defendant Union Electric Company from completing its examination of him and none of the other defendants ever had an opportunity to examine him.

[Refusal to Testify]

A number of continuances of his deposition applied for and granted at the instance of the plaintiffs or their attorneys contributed to the delay, but final action of the Court dismissing the action followed upon the absolute refusal of Strong to testify on October 20, 1955, his further refusal on November 18th, 1955, and again on December 20th, 1955, and upon the absolute refusal to testify by plaintiff Gillmor on January 10th, 1956.

As to Strong's refusal on October 10th, the record shows that at 11:00 o'clock on that day he came into the hearing room before the Master and all counsel pursuant to the order of the Court and notice duly given him and announced that he would not testify. The Master urged him "for his own good" to testify but he walked out of the room. Strong appeared again before the Master and all counsel on November 18th pursuant to the orders of the Court and of the Master and notice given him and when the question was raised whether he still refused to testify he departed from the hearing room. Again on December 20th, Strong appeared before the Master and attorneys pursuant to order and notice and asked to be excused from testifying. The Master declined to excuse him and admonished him that the consequence of his refusal to testify would be the entry of an order of dismissal. Strong said he would chance the dismissal and persisted in his refusal to testify.

The plaintiff F. A. E. Gillmor was the President of the Cooperative and the order of the Court for the taking of his deposition contemplated that it should follow after the completion of Strong's deposition. After that deposition was finally broken off by Strong's refusal to continue to testify and on December 22nd, 1955, the Master ordered Gillmor's deposition to commence on January 10th, 1956, and on that date Gillmor appeared before the Master and the attorneys of record for the parties. On being called on to take the oath he read a prepared statement and asked to be excused from testifying. The Master denied the request and Gillmor stated that he refused to testify and left the hearing room.

Thereafter the depositions of the three other individual plaintiffs were taken before the Master. They were generally to the effect that Strong was the one who devoted all of his time to the affairs of the cooperative. He had organized it and was the moving force and negotiated and took care of its business affairs, its records and its finances and "by and large was the man running the show." He made reports to the others and they had confidence in him and relied on him to carry on.

The Special Master duly reported to the Court the action of Strong and of Gillmor in refusing to testify. He also sustained motions made by defendants to dismiss the action because of the refusal but the Court treated that action of the Master as merely a recommendation and the judgment of dismissal here appealed from is based on the findings and conclusions made by the Court.

[Master's Fees]

As to the refusal of plaintiffs to make deposit for Master's fees, Judge Riley evidently thought the pre-trial proceedings which were manifestly necessary to define the issues and get the case ready for the jury trial which had been demanded would be speedily accomplished through the cooperation of the attorneys. He at first merely appointed persons to act as amanuenses in the taking of depositions of individual plaintiffs, but after the lapse of nearly fourteen months without a single deposition having been taken, he appointed Mr. Cook Special Master with powers to supervise the conduct of the taking of depositions of the five individual party plaintiffs "including the length thereof," as above stated, and both sides invoked the powers of the Master in the course of the taking of Strong's deposition before him. After Mr. Cook ruled that Strong's bank records should be produced the plaintiffs made complaint against him before Judge Riley and although the Court, after hearing, found there was no cause for Cook's removal as Master, his resignation was accepted on September 21, 1955, and Mr. Edward A. Doerr was appointed Special Master in his place.

[New Master—Powers]

The original order appointing Mr. Cook as Master provided that the Master should have "such other powers as the Court may by order prescribe" and in the order appointing his successor, Mr. Doerr, the powers were broadened to include "all powers authorized by Rule 53 of The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure" and "these powers he shall exercise until otherwise limited by order of this Court."

In his order appointing Mr. Doerr as Master, Judge Riley recited that extended discovery proceedings had been in progress and that they awaited resumption pursuant to order of Court and that there were controversies between plaintiffs and their counsel awaiting solution as to which Strong had requested disposition as soon as possible; that depositions were pending to preserve testimony and that the variety and number of the problems presented, the complicated nature of the issues involved, the best interests of all persons and parties affected and the interests of justice demand that "these proceedings" (evidently meaning the discovery proceedings) may be carried forward to their conclusion with the utmost dispatch.

The order appointing Mr. Doerr (the second Master) and prescribing his duties and powers conferred no powers in respect to the jury trial that had been duly demanded by the plaintiffs by endorsement on their complaint under Rule 38b and Judge Riley later declared that "the appointment of the Special Master does not and cannot deprive plaintiffs of their right to a jury trial, nor does it empower the Special Master ultimately to hear and determine the issues between the parties upon a trial of this cause." Mr. Doerr was never called on to perform any function in the case beyond discovery proceedings and in the matter of the attorney controversy, all preliminary to and in preparation for the jury trial on the merits.[5]

[5] The order appointing Mr. Doerr contained the following recitals:

"There are eleven named defendants, ten of whom are alleged to be private corporations engaged in the business of producing, selling and distributing electrical power in Iowa, and the eleventh to be an unincorporated voluntary association, including ten named defendants among its members.

"The issues are complicated beyond those normally to be found in the usual action. There are extended discovery proceedings in progress since June 6, 1955, and now awaiting resumption on October 3, 1955, pursuant to order of Court. Controversies have arisen between plaintiffs and their counsel since August 29, 1955, which await solution, in respect of which plaintiff Harry J. Strong, has requested disposition as soon as possible; depositions are pending to preserve testimony and other factors urge the action herein ordered to be taken."

"The present engagements of the court to which commitment had been made long prior to this date require continuous absence of the judge from this division for regular terms of the court, commencing on Sept. 26, 1955, in the Southern Division, Oct. 3, 1955, in the Western Division, Oct. 17, 1955, in the Ottumwa Division, Oct. 24, 1955, in the Central Division, and Nov. 28, 1955, in the Eastern Division of this District.

"The variety and number of the problems presented in this action, their complicated nature, the issues involved, the best interests of justice combine to demand that these proceedings may be carried forward to their conclusion with the utmost dispatch. The court recognizes that the expense consequent to the appointment of a master with general powers should make it the exception rather than the rule and has weighed the cost incident thereto against the benefits to be derived by all concerned, it is firmly persuaded that the circumstances described and involved and the peculiar urgency of the many and complex problems require departure from the rule of avoiding the appointment of special masters where possible."

"Accordingly, the court must find it to be advisable and necessary in the premises that a reference shall be made to a special master who shall have and exercise all powers permitted to masters under Rule 53 of the Federal

[Deposit—Master's Fees]

Coincident with its order appointing Mr. Doerr, on September 21, 1955, the Court ordered "the deposit forthwith into the registry of this court the sum of $2500.00 by plaintiffs and the sum of $2500.00 by defendants, to defray the fees and disbursements of the Special Master"[6] and on September 26, 1955, the plaintiffs moved the Court to "defer the requirements of the depositing of the sum of $2500.00 as ordered by this Court under its order dated September 21, 1955." The Court gave full consideration to the motion and denied it and thereupon ordered the plaintiffs to make the deposit of $2500.00 forthwith as a condition of going forward with their action.[7] Although the plaintiffs were fully able to comply with the order, they refused to make the deposit.

[Deliberate Refusals]

There was no question in the trial court and there is none here that when Strong refused to continue his deposition and when Gillmor refused to testify and when all the plaintiffs refused to make the deposit for costs ordered by the Court, each and all of them acted deliberately with full understanding that their refusals were in violation of the orders of the Court. They asserted a right to disobey the court as they did on the ground that they had lost confidence in their attorneys about the first of August, 1955. Their claim was that from that time on they were without the assistance of counsel of their own choosing.

[Relations with Attorneys]

They first called Judge Riley's attention to a quarrel between themselves and their local attorneys by a so-called petition to intervene presented by four of the individual plaintiffs on September 2, 1955, in which they made charges against their attorneys and alleged that they had obtained an agreement from other attorneys of record and that the attorneys of record had agreed but had later declined and had moved to quash the entry of appearance made by Bell, Farrar and Scott.

When the motion of the local attorneys of record to quash the appearance of Bell, Farrar and Scott was brought up for hearing, Bell, Farrar and Scott withdrew their appearance for plaintiffs and the Court accepted the withdrawal. The Court therefore found that the proceeding to quash the attorneys' appearance had become moot leaving nothing before the Court for hearing and that a so-called petition of the individual plaintiffs in the case to intervene in the moot proceedings if regarded as filed, should be, and was stricken.

Accordingly all of the plaintiffs joined ten days later, on September 16, 1955, in filing a motion "by Harry J. Strong, Secretary-Treasurer," for leave to remove their attorneys of record as attorneys for plaintiffs herein. The motion set forth numerous and serious charges made by the plaintiffs against their local attorneys of record and prayed leave to dismiss them.

The pendency of this motion was an important factor in Judge Riley's decision to appoint Mr. Doerr as Special Master some five days after the motion had been filed. In the order relieving Mr. Cook as Master, the Court stated in reference to this motion: " * * * and matters having recently arisen which make it desirable and in fact necessary, in the opinion of the Court, to Rules of Civil Procedure and such additional specified powers as later may be conferred upon and delegated to him in that capacity."

"* * * and that this entire cause be referred to him for such proceedings as may be necessary, to hear the evidence, to take testimony on any issue herein, to pass on disputed claims, to pass on applications of the parties and to make where necessary special findings of fact and conclusions of law thereon and to report the same to the court, and these powers he shall exercise until otherwise limited by order of this court."

[6] "It is further ordered, that the fees and disbursements of the master shall be allowed by the court from time to time and that for the purpose of assuring the payment of his fees and disbursements as related to the services of the special master except as directed by Paragraph IV of the order of May 23, 1955, (defendants' discovery depositions were to be charged to defendants) there shall be forthwith paid into the registry of this court, $2500.00 by the plaintiffs and $2500.00 by the defendants, which sum shall be paid out to the Special Master upon the order of the court for the allowance of fees and disbursements, and that said sum shall be subject to increase from time to time as the necessities of the situation may require."

[7] The order required the deposit for costs by plaintiffs because the plaintiffs were the moving parties in making charges against their attorneys of record and asking for speedy hearing of their evidence to support their charges. The costs of the master as to all discovery depositions taken by defendants remained chargeable to defendants only.

immediately appoint a Master with broader powers." It was contemplated that the attorney dispute would be promptly presented to, passed upon and reported by Mr. Doerr. The defendants had nothing to do with the quarrel between plaintiffs and their attorneys of record, but the existence of that quarrel was a cause of delay and continued pendency in Court of the claim for $120,000,000 against the defendants, after the claim had already been held in Court for a year and a half. Judge Riley did not evince unwillingness to try the attorney controversy himself, but specified official obligations that would delay his doing so. Upon the appointment of Mr. Doerr as Master with full power to hear and report on the attorney controversy, Strong wrote to Doerr, as Special Master, explaining that the matter of removing plaintiff's attorneys of record had been assigned to him (Doerr) and requesting that an early hearing be had on the matter. Strong also requested in the letter that postponement of discovery proceedings be granted to enable new counsel to become informed and to prepare and proceed in the case.

Accordingly, Mr. Doerr as Master, within a few days after receiving the letter from Strong, entered an order setting the plaintiff's motion to remove attorneys and any response to it for hearing before him on October 3rd, 1955, and directed that plaintiffs be represented on the hearings by counsel of their own choosing.

The attorneys of record for plaintiff filed a motion in resistance to the motion of plaintiffs to remove them as their attorneys and also sought affirmatively to compel plaintiffs to turn over to them some ten thousand dollars on account. Other parties who had advanced money to plaintiffs sought to intervene in the proceedings for removal of attorneys and to impress a trust upon the money advanced. These parties were denied relief and do not appeal.

[Receivership]

Creditors also brought involuntary bankruptcy proceedings against the plaintiff cooperative which were heard before Judge Riley and a jury. In the course of the proceedings a receiver was appointed for the cooperative and Strong was ordered to turn the assets over to the receiver. The date of the turn over order was some months after the plaintiff had been ordered to make the deposit for costs and had made their refusal to comply.

[Hearing—Attorneys]

On October 3, 1955, the day appointed for the hearing of the attorney controversy before the Master, the plaintiffs wilfully absented themselves from the hearing and on their failure to appear in person or by attorney, the Master adjudged them in default. The attorneys of record accordingly introduced their evidence and the Master found upon the evidence that there was no cause for discharging the attorneys; that they had faithfully and loyally performed their services for plaintiffs which were of great value, to wit: $200,000; that the attorneys recognized their continuing obligation to serve the plaintiffs and that there was no reason in plaintiffs' relationship with their attorneys for postponement of proceedings in the cause. The Master held that the plaintiffs had the right to discharge the attorneys but only on the condition of the payment of the fees and disbursements of the attorneys to the extent of the means possessed by plaintiffs and that it was left open to plaintiffs in spite of their default to show inability to comply with the conditions imposed. The conclusions of the Master were declared orally on October 3rd, and his opinion and order in writing were issued October 5th, 1955.

[Petition for Mandamus]

On the day of the hearing before the Master (October 3rd, 1955), Strong was in St. Paul, Minnesota, and there applied unsuccessfully to this Court in person for himself and the other plaintiffs for leave to file a petition for mandamus and injunction and for an order staying proceedings in this case.

[Affidavit of Bias]

A few days later, on October 10th, 1955, he filed an affidavit of bias and prejudice against Judge Riley in the District Court alleging that Judge Riley had a personal bias and prejudice against "our project, a hydro electric development on the Cedar River," and among other things that Judge Riley has issued orders in the case that were biased and prejudiced; that the Special Master (Doerr), appointed by Judge Riley, had in turn issued orders which carry out the bias and prejudice and that the biased and prejudiced orders were merely a furtherance of defendants' strategy to completely break the plaintiffs so they could not pursue their cause of action. He also alleged that unless Judge Riley was removed as judge in the matter and all orders entered therein since September 2, 1955, were stricken, he and his associates would be denied a fair trial. He also stated in a "certificate" signed by him accompanying the affidavit of prejudice that it was filed because he felt it was the only means to hasten the trial of the cause.

On October 14, 1955, Judge Riley ordered a hearing on the affidavit on October 21st, 1955, and on that date having inquired into the timeliness and sufficiency of the affidavit of bias and prejudice he adjudged that it was not timely filed and was insufficient to meet the requirements of 28 U. S. Code, since the bias was charged "against our project" and not against the plaintiffs or either of them and furthermore the affidavit was not accompanied, as required by the statute, by a certificate of counsel.

It is undisputed that Judge Riley's ruling was in accord with the statute and the proceedings in the case were properly continued "as though the affidavit had not been filed."

[Motions to Dismiss]

On January 20th, 1956, Judge Riley proceeded, after notice and with the consent of all parties, to hearing of the several motions made by defendants to dismiss the case for infractions of the Rules and failure to prosecute, the objections of plaintiffs to the reports of the Master Doerr, a motion by plaintiffs, filed on January 19, 1956, to vacate the order appointing Doerr as Master and to set aside all of his acts thereunder, and a motion by defendants to strike said motion to vacate, and on January 25, 1956, after a hearing, the Court filed its memorandum of decision upon all motions and objections then pending and its order for judgment. It set forth step by step all of the motions, hearings and rulings that had been had in the case and found no error prejudicial to the plaintiffs and no controversy undetermined as to any facts in issue. The Court found the plaintiffs to be represented by their local attorneys of record and that the firm of attorneys appearing for them on this appeal, also appeared of counsel. It was further found:

"The complaint seeks recovery of $120,000,000 in treble damages and equitable relief under the antitrust laws. The period of time covered by the complaint extends from 1938 to 1954. There are ten defendants, whose separate answers pose evidentiary and procedural problems of great magnitude. The issues in this action involve engineering, financing, economic and other technical problems of vast complexity. The discovery proceedings, still in their early stages, have resulted in volumes of testimony and documents. The record discloses many difficult problems pertaining to marketability of power, project design, economic and engineering feasibility, financing methods and expectations, costs of construction and power, additional and numerous expert witnesses, and other discovery proceedings requiring continued supervision to prevent oppression or hardship to any party. The documents which plaintiffs have voluntarily produced in response to defendants' interrogatories and which plaintiffs have produced under order of court and order of the Master are detailed and voluminous. For example, the transcripts of the Federal Power Commission hearings exceed 5,000 pages."

"I find that the issues are complicated and that the reference was not only proper but necessary in the interest of justice. This action, peculiarly and appropriately, requires the appointment of a Special Master."

The court said as to the refusals of Strong and Gillmor to testify:

"The deposition of Harry J. Strong was begun under an order of this Court, and its resumption was ordered both by this Court and by the Special Master. On September 28, 1955, the Special Master, upon the informal request of the witness, postponed the resumption date to October 10, 1955. On October 19, 1955, Harry J. Strong expressly refused to testify, although instructed twice by the Special Master to testify. The witness left the hearing room while one of the defendants was attempting to advise him that sanctions would be sought under Rule 37(d), should he persist in his refusal to testify. Despite such conduct, the Special Master gave the witness a final chance to testify and ordered his deposition to resume on December 6, 1955. In his order, which was entered on November 21, 1955, the Special Master found that the witness' refusal to testify was flagrant, wilful and without justification or excuse and had the necessary effect of disrupting orderly procedure and hampering defendants in making their defense. The witness was, and is, secretary, treasurer, director and general manager of plaintiff First Iowa Hydro Electric Cooperative. The order provided that, if the witness again refused to testify, the action would be dismissed as to plaintiff Harry J. Strong and First Iowa Hydro Electric Cooperative. The order was served on all of the named plaintiffs and on their attorneys of record. At the request of plaintiffs through their attorneys of record, the resumption date was postponed until December 20, 1955. On December 20, 1955, the witness was again present and again expressly refused to testify. He stated that he would take his chances on a dismissal of the action."

"I find that plaintiff, Harry J. Strong, was secretary, treasurer, director and managing agent of plaintiff First Iowa Hydro Electric Cooperative. I find that the refusal of the witness to testify was flagrant, wilful, and without justification or excuse and had the necessary effect of disrupting orderly procedure and was prejudicial to the defendants in making their defense. I find that, under the circumstances, there was no necessity for according this witness another chance to testify. As with Strong, the conduct of the Witness Gillmor was contumacious, his attitude defiant, his reasons for refusing to testify invalid. The (disrespect) which these parties exhibited toward judicial process is the proper subject of sanctions sought by defendants."

[Judgment of Dismissal]

The final judgment of dismissal of the action provided that the dismissal should operate as an adjudication of the merits.

On this appeal taken to reverse the judgment of dismissal of the case with prejudice, the appellants are represented by the firm of Washington attorneys which appeared of record, as of counsel, on the complaint in the action.[8]

[Arguments for Reversal]

The points argued for reversal of the judgment are to the effect (1) that the reference to Special Master Doerr was unlawful and all orders issued in connection therewith and all acts under it were void; (2) that it was arbitrary and unlawful to dismiss the action for failure of plaintiffs to make the $2500. deposit and for failure of Strong and of Gillmor to testify; (3) and that plaintiffs were erroneously denied the right to be represented by counsel of their choice.

1. As to the Reference to Master Doerr.

In their attack upon the District Court's appointment of Doerr as Master with "all powers authorized by Rule 53 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure" the appellants have relied mainly upon Howes Leather Company v. LaBuy [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,261], 226 F. 2d 703, 7 Cir., affirmed as LaBuy v. Howes Leather Company [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,585], 353 U. S. 249.

[Howes Leather Case]

That action, like the one at bar, was for the recovery of treble damages and equitable relief by reason of defendants, alleged violations and threats to violate the antitrust laws. After long preparation, the case came on for trial and thereupon the District Court, instead of entering upon the trial, referred the case to a Master for trial over the objections of all parties. The Master ruled that the cause would proceed to trial before him and it was at that stage of the case that defendants petitioned the Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit for a writ of mandamus to compel the District Judge to vacate the order of reference of the trial to the Master and direct the trial of the cause to proceed before the court. Judgment awarding the writ was granted by the Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court affirmed. The Supreme Court held that the Court of Appeals was justified in finding that the order of reference for trial of the case was an abuse of the power of the District Judge under Rule 53(b) amounting to little less than an abdication of the judicial function and depriving the parties of trial before the court on the basic issues involved in the litigation. When the reference was made there was no such complicated issues present as required by Rule 53 to justify the reference to a Master.

[Case Distinguished]

The case at bar presents an entirely different situation. Instead of this case being ready for trial or being turned over to a Master for trial on its merits, on basic issues between the parties, the case was "in an early stage" of preparation for trial when the Court made the reference to Mr. Doerr as Master.

[8] Mr. Wollenberg has in the meantime succeeded Mr. Schellenberg as a member of the firm.

At the time of the appointment on September 21st, 1955, more than a year and a half had elapsed since the action was brought and the pretrail proceedings for discovery were as found by the trial court, "still in their early stages."

[Complication of Issues]

The complications of the issues and exceptional circumstances blocking the preparation for trial on the merits of the case were arising in those proceedings and as declared by Judge Riley, it was his purpose in making the appointment to provide for supervision of discovery proceedings and to "prevent oppression or hardship to any party."

Simply stated, the plaintiffs through their pleading were claiming in general terms that Project No. 1853 was a sound project and that they had been entitled to receive and would have promptly received their federal license therefor and would have obtained the money to promote, construct and operate the project, save that defendants' wrongs prevented. We think the Court did not distort or exaggerate the complications of the issues to be anticipated in the discovery proceedings carried on to find out the facts, or claimed facts, on which plaintiffs were basing such a cause of action or in the trial thereof. There is no contention that Judge Riley erred in declaring the right of defendants to attempt such discovery and we find no error in his conclusion that the issues involved in it were complicated and the case was exceptional in presenting occasion and necessity for the services of a Master preliminary to trial such as seldom arises in litigation. There was obvious possibility of oppression and hardship unless the discovery proceedings were continuously supervised and kept in order through the services of a Master. The Court took pains to prevent any financial burden on plaintiffs except in respect to the matter of the discharge of their attorneys wherein they were the moving parties requesting action and the issues between them and the defendants were not involved.

They had no right to hold their $120,000,000 claim against defendants in court unless they were able to prosecute their case. Through no fault of defendants, their quarrel with their attorneys was disabling them from prosecuting their suit. The appointment of the Master Doerr was made in part to expedite settlement on that matter and they acted reasonably and with good sense when they acquiesced in the appointment of Master Doerr and wrote to him for a speedy hearing of their quarrel with their attorneys.

[Powers of Master]

It is true that in the order appointing Doerr after conferring upon him the powers authorized by Rule 53, the order reads "that this entire cause be referred to him for such proceedings as may be necessary, to hear evidence, to take testimony on any issue herein, to pass on disputed claims, to pass on applications of the parties and to make where necessary special findings of fact and conclusions of law thereon and to report the same to the Court, and these powers he shall exercise until otherwise limited by order of this Court."

Appellants have argued that by this wording the Court committed the trial of the case to the Master Doerr, but the order should not be so construed. The order was made "in the early stages" of discovery proceedings, the proceedings were expected to be extended and the difficulties to be met by the order were the exceptional complications in those proceedings.

Likewise the final clause directing the powers to be exercised "until otherwise limited by order of this Court," reflects that Judge Riley had only the Master's services preliminary to trial in mind as he declared in his order of January 9th, 1956.

Quite aside from any possible ambiguity in the order in respect to powers of the master that might have been asserted after the pretrial proceedings, the record shows that Doerr was never called on to exercise any such powers. All he had to do with what is here involved was the taking of discovery depositions and hearing the controversy over the discharge of attorneys.

The appointment of a Master to take depositions of plaintiff was agreed to by all parties and Strong gave his testimony before the Master without any objection until the Master ordered the production of the bank records.

If there had ever been any ground for the plaintiffs to question the delegation by the Court of the taking of the discovery depositions, it had been fully and completely waived by the plaintiffs long before the plaintiffs committed the acts of disobedience that caused the dismissal.

[Appointment Proper]

We think the ruling of the Supreme Court against referring the final trial of the case to a Master in the LaBuy case has no application to the order of the Court appointing Doerr as Master for the complicated and exceptional issues in the preliminary stages of this case.

The ruling of the Court appointing a Master is fully supported. Smith v. Brown, 5 Cir., 2 F. 2d 926; Coyner v. United States, 7 Cir., 103 F. 2d 629; Graffis v. Woodward, 7 Cir., 96 F. 2d 329; Hart v. Williams, App. D. C., 202 F. 2d 190; Tendler v. Jaffee, App. D. C., 203 F. 2d 14, cert. denied, 346 U. S. 817. As this court recently stated:

> "Beyond the provisions of Rule 53, Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U. S. C. A., for appointing and making references to Masters, a Federal District Court has 'the inherent power to supply itself with this instrument for the administration of justice when deemed by it essential.' Ex Parte Peterson, 253 U. S. 300, 312, 40 S. Ct. 543, 547, 64 L. Ed. 919; Weschester Fire Ins. Co. v. Bringle, 6 Cir., 82 F. 2d 262, 263. While reference should be the exception and not the rule in judicial administration, the Court may, in its discretion, make appointment of a Master to assist in any of the incidents of a proceeding before it, whether civil or criminal, so long as there is no infringement upon the right of trial by jury or any prejudice to other substantive right." Schwimmer v. United States, 8 Cir., 232 F. 2d 855, 865.

Although the plaintiffs entered objections to the appointment of Master Doerr when they appeared before him on certain occasions, they did not present such an objection to Judge Riley until January 19th, 1956.[9] Long before they filed the motion shown in the footnote, the master had held numerous hearings and entered numerous orders and plaintiffs had frequently invoked his jurisdiction.

We emphasize again that the proceedings before the Special Master had not reached the trial stage. The Court in its order of January 9, 1956, clearly indicated it was not its intention that the case should be heard upon its merits before the Special Master, stating [Appellees' Supplemental Record, p. 125]:

> "It is further ordered, to permit all interested parties to be advised, that the order of September 21, 1955, appointing the Special Master does not and cannot deprive plaintiffs of their right of trial by jury if their request therefor has been seasonably made, nor does it empower the Special Master ultimately to hear and determine the issues between the parties upon the trial of this cause, but does empower the Special Master to proceed in respect of legal questions to be ruled upon, subject to the court's approval, and to have such other powers, not including trial of the issues, as are described in Rule 53(c) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, or otherwise stated in the order of appointment of September 21, 1955, and not inconsistent with this order."

The Court was legally empowered to appoint a master to carry out the functions actually performed by the master in this case.

[Waiver]

Under the circumstances, Judge Riley's ruling that plaintiffs waived any error that may have been committed in the appointment of Master Doerr was not erroneous.

[9] Their motion filed on January 19, 1956, reads:

"Come now the plaintiffs and their attorneys of record, in behalf of plaintiffs and in behalf of their attorneys of record, and move the court to make an order vacating and setting aside the order made by this Court on Sept. 21, 1955, appointing Edward A. Doerr Special Master in this cause, for each and all of the reasons set forth in the petitions for review of the orders of the Special Master which were filed in this cause with respect to the orders made by the Special Master on Dec. 22, 1955, and Jan. 16, 1956, and the grounds stated in the objections and exceptions to the report of the Special Master which was filed January 4, 1956, and to the supplemental report which was filed Jan. 17, 1956, and the objections urged and interposed orally in the record by these parties prior to each hearing and proceeding before said Special Master and said reasons, grounds and objections are hereby incorporated herein by reference thereto and made a part as fully as if set forth at length, herein, in support of this motion."

Failure to make timely objection to the appointment of a Master either at the time of the order or promptly thereafter constitutes a waiver of error and objections made only to the Master are unavailing.

[Validity of Orders]

Appellants' contention that the proceedings and orders of the Master were nullities is without merit. In any event there is no basis for the contention of appellants that the reference to the Master was entirely void and that his proceedings and orders were nullities. The power to refer is conferred in positive and unequivocal terms by Rule 53 and mere error in the exercise can only be corrected in direct proceedings. Hart v. Williams, 702 F. 2d 190; Coyner v. United States, 7 Cir., 103 F. 2d 629; Smith v. Brown, 5 Cir., 3 F. 2d 926; Flanders v. Coleman, 249 F. 2d 757, (rev'd on other grounds), 250 U. S. 223.

2. As to the Dismissal.

It is contended for appellants that they "were not contumacious" and that "their motives were not contumacious" in refusing to testify and in refusing to make the deposit for costs ordered by the court and that "dismissal was a harsh and unjustified penalty to impose upon confused laymen," but there is no claim that the individual plaintiffs did not fully understand that they were disobeying the order of the court when they refused to testify and when they refused to make the deposit or that their disobedience was other than wilful and deliberate.

Under Rule 37(d) and Rule 41(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure as well as in the exercise of its inherent power the District Court is authorized to dismiss the action of any individual plaintiff who wilfully disobeys a proper order of the court to compel the giving of security or the giving of testimony on deposition and to dismiss the action of a corporation plaintiff whose managing agent so offends. We think the contention that dismissal was unduly harsh or unjustified is without merit. It was the right of the plaintiffs to prosecute the action for the recovery of $120,000,000 against the defendants regardless of the burden it imposed on defendants, but only in the orderly course and in obedience to proper court orders. The Court would not have been justified in granting leniency or indulgence to the plaintiffs at the expense of the defendants. We find there was no abuse of discretion in the application by the Court of the sanction that was authorized by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and by the inherent powers of the Court.

3. As to Denial of Right of Counsel.

It was strenuously urged that the plaintiffs were erroneously denied the right to be represented by counsel of their choice and many cases are cited to the effect that the right is held to be a fundamental one and the denial of it prevents according a fair trial.

The record shows that on the occasions when Strong and Gillmor refused to testify and when all plaintiffs refused to deposit the ordered security for costs, they asserted that they were without counsel of their choice and they based their disobedience to the Court's order on that claim. The trial court found that it was not in accord with the facts because there was no claim or showing that the firm of attorneys appearing on the complaint as of counsel (who now appear for them on this appeal) were not available to them and because they had requested and had been given opportunity to show any reason they had for distrusting and discharging their attorneys of record and they wilfully absented themselves from the hearing and that matter set by the Master and refused to afford proof of any reason for their alleged distrust. Upon their default it was found from the evidence adduced that they had no such reason for distrust and their attorneys were available to them. They took no steps to have the default entered against them set aside or the order entered by the Master vacated by the Court and the record does not indicate that they had any ground for such relief. It was necessary that the questions of their representation by counsel be settled in order for them to proceed with the case against defendants and it was so settled. It was their own conduct which prevented a change of attorney relationship and the fact that they were dissatisfied did not entitle them to disobey the court's orders or to block disposition of the case.

It is true the charges they made against their local attorneys were serious and if they had proven them when they were given the opportunity to do so, no doubt the attorneys would have been unconditionally discharged. But their mere accusations without proof conferred no right and supplied no excuse to plaintiffs for their disobedience of the Court orders.

The plaintiffs were not entitled as of course and without cause to an order unconditionally substituting other counsel for the attorneys of record employed by them and it was within the discretion of the Court or Master to require that the attorneys be paid or secured as a condition to granting the request for substitution of new counsel.[10] Doggett v. Deanville Corp., 5 Cir., 148 F. 2d 381 and cases cited therein. Woodbury v. Andrew Jergens Co., 2 Cir., 62 F. 2d 49.

The record shows that after plaintiffs had refused to offer any proof of cause of their claimed distrust of their local attorneys of record and had defaulted at the hearing of that matter, Mr. Strong and in some instances the other individual plaintiffs with him, filed motions and other papers in the case assuming to represent the corporation or themselves or both in invoking Court action. But such filing was in conflict with the provisions of Rules 11 and 7(b)(2) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and would, if permitted to stand, have had the effect of nullifying the orders that had been made by the Court in respect to the attorney controversy and depositing security. Although appellants complain of the action of the Court in striking the filings which were made contrary to the provisions of the Rules, we do not find the ruling was erroneous.

[Affirmed]

Our conclusion on consideration of the whole record and all contentions is that appellants were accorded fair and just treatment by the trial court and that their own refusal to proceed in accord with Rules of Procedure and wilful and deliberate disobedience of the orders of the Court necessitated and justified the dismissal of the case with prejudice.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Southern District of Iowa. RILEY, District Judge.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages and Injunctive Relief—Appeal and Error—Appeal by Attorneys Who Represented Plaintiffs—Right To Appeal. —An appeal by attorneys who represented plaintiffs in a private antitrust action, which was dismissed with prejudice, was dismissed on the ground that the attorneys were not parties to the action, and, therefore, had no right to appeal. Also, the plaintiffs had not authorized the appeal, and the attorneys had no interest in the cause of action by reason of their contingent fee contract with the plaintiffs. There was no substantial evidence that the plaintiffs assigned any part of their claim for damages to the attorneys, and the contract to pay a contingent fee out of any recovery did not operate as such an assignment.

[10] On the evidence before him it appeared to the Master that the services the attorneys had performed were of the value of $200,000.00 but he held it open to plaintiffs notwithstanding their default to be heard on the question of the terms of the condition upon the discharge of the attorneys.

The provisions of Section 4 of the Clayton Act provide for the recovery of an attorney fee in addition to treble damages; however, the right accrues to the party injured and not to his attorney.

[Nature of Appeal]

WOODROUGH, Circuit Judge [In full text]: This appeal in No. 15,549, has been taken to obtain reversal of the same judgment which we considered and have this day affirmed in First Iowa Hydro Electric Cooperative v. Iowa-Illinois Gas and Electric Company et al., No. 15,548, [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,726] supra. The appellants herein include all those named as appellants in No. 15,548 and in addition, James D. France and Xavier C. Nady, James R. McManus and Allan R. Shepherd. The additional appellants are the attorneys who appeared for and represented the plaintiffs, First Iowa Hydro Electric Cooperative and its five members, F. A. E. Gillmor, Harry J. Strong, Carl J. Mitzner, Harry Imel, and P. H. Naber in the action for treble damages under the antitrust laws, which resulted in the judgment dismissing the action of the plaintiffs, the dismissal to operate as an adjudication on the merits. The four named attorneys undertake to prosecute this appeal from that judgment on behalf of the cooperative and the individuals who were the plaintiffs in the action in the District Court, and said attorneys also undertake to prosecute the appeal on their own behalf on the ground that they have an interest in the subject matter of the litigation by reason of the nature and effect of their contingent fee contract of employment, and the time, work and effort they have expended on the case. They filed a notice of appeal in the District Court to which they sign their names in one column as "attorneys of record for plaintiffs and in their own behalf as such attorneys of record," and in a parallel column they sign the notice of appeal again as "attorneys for plaintiffs-appellants."

[Motion To Dismiss]

The eleven corporations which were the defendants in the action in the District Court and are named as defendants-appellees here have moved to dismiss this appeal on the grounds that:

(1) The four attorneys here attempting to appeal in their own behalf were not parties to the record and judgment in the Court below and do not have the right to appeal under Rule 73 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure;

(2) they do not have as attorneys an interest in the subject matter of this lawsuit entitling them to appeal;

(3) and (4) all of the appellants except one individual have another appeal pending and this appeal is not authorized.

We have before us the records brought up in No. 15,548 and in No. 15,549, and the briefs and have heard the arguments of counsel and hold that the motion to dismiss this appeal should be sustained on each of the grounds presented.

["Parties" May Appeal]

(1) Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, appeals cannot be taken from final judgments of the District Court otherwise than by parties to the judgment. Rule 73 provides that "a party may appeal from a judgment by filing with the District Court a notice of appeal." The four attorneys were not parties and they neither asked nor obtained leave to become parties. We know of no appeal by non-parties. The question thus raised was reviewed in United States v. Seigle, App. D. C., 168 F. 2d 143, 144-146, which case has been frequently cited with approval. Maritime Com'n v. California, App. D. C., 204 F. 2d 70, 71; In Re Central States Electric, 4 Cir., 206 F. 2d 398, 403; Commanding Officer, U. S. Army Base, v. United States, 6 Cir., 207 F. 2d 499, 501. The law was the same prior to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. In United States ex rel. Louisiana v. Jack, 244 U. S. 397, 402, the court said:

> "With exceptions not even remotely applicable to a case such as we have here it has long been the law, as settled by this court that 'no person can bring a writ of error [an appeal is not different] to reverse a judgment who is not a party or privy to the record,' Bayard v. Lombard, 9 How. 530, 551, and in Ex Parte Tobacco Board of Trade, 222 U. S. 578, it was announced, in a per curiam opinion, as a subject no longer open to discussion that 'one who is not a party to a record and judgment is not entitled to appeal therefrom,' * * *."

[Contingent Fee Contract]

(2) The attorneys argue that they have an interest in the cause of action by reason of their contingent fee contract but the Special Master and the District Court found that they had no such interest. There was no substantial evidence that the cooperative assigned any part of its claim for damages to the attorneys and their contract to pay a contingent fee out of any recovery for the services they were employed to perform did not operate as such assignment.

[Clayton Act]

The provisions of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C., Section 15) provides for recovery of an attorney fee in addition to treble damages but the right accrues to the party injured and not to his attorney. 32 West Randolph Corporation v. Blackman, 7 Cir., 222 F. 2d 54; Strickland v. Sellers, D. C. Texas, 78 F. Supp. 274. The law of Iowa therefore controls the decision on the question whether the contingent fee contract the four attorneys had with the plaintiffs created a power coupled with an interest in the lawsuit in them permitting them to maintain an action in their own behalf. We have not been cited to any Iowa decision supporting their claim to such an interest in the lawsuit and the following cases are to the contrary. Boardman & Brown v. Thompson, 25 Iowa 487, 489-506; Kauffman v. Phillips, 154 Iowa 542, 134 N. W. 575; Tone Brothers v. Shankland, 110 Iowa 525, 81 N. W. 789, 791; Keehn v. Keehn, 115 Iowa 467, 88 N. W. 957, 958-59; Foss v. Cobler, 105 Iowa 728, 75 N. W. 516; Ward & Lamb v. Sherbony, 96 Iowa 477, 65 N. W. 413; Brown v. Morgan, D. C. Iowa, 163 F. 395; Falcone v. Hall, App. D. C., 235 F. 2d 862; Sellman v. Bankers Trust, 2 Cir., 6 F. 2d 799, 800.

[Appeal Not Authorized]

(3) and (4). The appeal in No. 15,548 presented and this court has considered the sufficiency of the proceedings and judgment in the action of the District Court and the affidavits of the individual plaintiffs have established here without dispute that the plaintiffs have not authorized this appeal. We think the plaintiffs may not be made appellants against their will. Tolzoff v. May, 186 Iowa 520, 172 N. W. 446; 7 C. J. S. 913.

[Dismissal]

The motion to dismiss the appeal is accordingly sustained and the appeal is dismissed at the costs of the four attorneys.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of California, Northern Division. No. 1708 ND Civil. Dated May 24, 1957.

Clayton and Sherman Antitrust Acts

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Who May Bring Suit —Class Actions—Common Fund Theory—Allegation of Damage.—A "spurious" class action which was brought by 22 (26 originally) growers of cotton on behalf of themselves and approximately 8,000 other cotton growers in a specified area who had sold cottonseed to the defendants, owners of all of the non-cooperative gins in the area, and which charged that the defendants unlawfully conspired to fix the prices to be paid to each of the growers for cottonseed, was dismissed as a class action. In a "spurious" class action as well as other types of class actions, the court must be satisfied that the persons before the court will "fairly insure adequate representation of all." In view of the record in the instant action showing the diversity of interests in the group and the numerical inadequacy of the plaintiffs, the growers who were before the court did not and could not insure the adequate representation of all of the growers of cotton in the area. Four of the original plaintiffs in the action had expressed their desire to withdraw, 2038 persons had stated that they did not desire to be represented by the plaintiffs, and no other member of the class had sought to join as a plaintiff or had intervened or interpleaded. It was apparent from the variety of operations and contracts of the growers and other factors that no single decree of the court could possibly determine a damage ratio that would apply to all of the growers. The court rejected the plaintiffs' theory that they could establish the alleged price fixing and the damages per ton of cottonseed sold, and that, thereafter, other growers could come into court and, by merely proving the amount sold at the alleged depreciated price, could recover damages. The court would have no power to enter such an "interlocutory" judgment, and, in a "spurious" class action, a separate judgment must be entered as to each of the plaintiffs. Also, the complaint in the action was insufficient because it failed to allege specifically the actual damage suffered by each of the plaintiffs. While the plaintiffs may aggregate the amount for which each sues, the complaint should state specifically the amount which each claims to be the actual damage suffered. A defendant should be appraised of the claim which is asserted against him.

Introductory Statement of Facts

[Complaint]

LEON R. YANKWICH, Chief Judge [In full text]: On May 10, 1957, Jesse B. Hess and twenty-five other persons on behalf of themselves and others similarly situated, filed this civil action to recover damages for violation of the anti-trust laws. More specifically, the Complaint alleged:

"The plaintiffs complain on behalf of themselves and all other cotton growers and persons, all of whom are hereinafter referred to as growers, who have sold cottonseed to any one of the above-named defendants in the San Joaquin Valley, State of California, and for cause of action allege:

"I

"This action arises under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act of July 2, 1890, Chapter

647, 26 Stat. 209, U. S. C. A. Sections 1 to 7, 15 U. S. C. A., Sections 1 to 7 as amended, and under the Clayton Anti-Trust Act of October 15, 1914, Chapter 323, 38 Stat. 730 U. S. Code, Title 15, Section 12, et seq., amended, all as hereinafter more fully appears. That each of said defendants is to be found and each has an agent in the above-named district."

[Corporate Capacity of Defendants]

The following facts appear as to the corporate capacity of the defendants:

The defendant Anderson, Clayton & Co., is a Delaware corporation authorized to do business in California. During the time mentioned in the Complaint, it was to be found in the Southern District of California, Northern Division, with an agent who resides in Los Angeles, California. California Cotton Oil Company and Coberly-West Company, during the same time, were California corporations with their principal place of business at Los Angeles, California. Defendants Producers Cotton Oil Company, Kingsburg Cotton Oil Company, S. A. Camp Ginning Company, and J. G. Boswell Company, during the times alleged in the Complaint, were California corporations, each with its principal place of business within the district.

[Class Action—Unity of Interest]

Before giving a full summary of the allegations of the Complaint, it is well to reproduce fully Allegation IV of the Complaint, which attempts to set forth the unity of interest of the plaintiffs and other growers and the alleged basis for instituting this as an action not only on behalf of the twenty-six named plaintiffs, but on behalf of some 8,000 growers in the San Joaquin Valley. The allegation reads:

"The above-named plaintiffs assert rights herein on behalf of themselves and each of said other growers in respect of or arising out of a series of transactions in which common questions of law and common questions of fact arise and are involved. The said transactions involve sales of cottonseed by said plantiffs, growers and persons identical in all material matters and respects, for successive cropping season, each involving cottonseed to be grown and grown in the San Joaquin Valley in the State of California; that the issues and facts stated in this action and the questions herein to be litigated, both of law and fact, are of common and general interest to all cotton growers in the San Joaquin Valley; State of California; that said common question of law and fact affect the rights of each of said growers, and each of said growers has a cause of action against said defendants; that said growers are so numerous, amounting to many thousand persons, that it is impractical to bring all of said growers before the Court as individual plaintiffs; that said growers, and each of them, have a cause of action against the defendants named herein and each of them based upon said common questions of fact and law; that this action will prevent a multiplicity of actions. That the amount of cost and work in actions of this type is great and the amount of damages due the individual growers would not justify the cost and work involved in separate action, and that, therefore, these plaintiffs sue for themselves and for the benefit of all of said growers within said valley.

"That in 1933, the Legislature of the State of California enacted Sections 951 and 952 of the Agricultural Code of said State, making all counties within said San Joaquin Valley within which cotton was grown a one-variety district and making it unlawful to plant, process for planting, pick, harvest, or gin any variety or species of cotton other than that variety or species of cotton known as 'ACALA': that only that variety of cotton has been grown in said Valley since 1933; that at all times herein mentioned the methods of cultivation and harvesting cotton by growers was uniform throughout said Valley; that during the various times involved in this action, the same types of gins and ginning methods were used to gin said cotton grown in said Valley; that the quality and value of cottonseed grown in various areas, or by various growers, varies substantially from that grown in the same or other areas or by other growers; that the percentages of fatty-acids, moisture and other substances contained in cottonseed varies and affects the quality and value thereof; that regardless of said differences in quality and value of said seed a fixed and uniform price per ton was paid to said growers by said defendants, and each of them, for said seed during all times involved herein.

"That said San Joaquin Valley at all times herein mentioned contained large areas of land suitable in texture, fertility, composition, drainage, irrigation, location, climate, and transportation facilities for the successful raising of cotton containing cottonseed; that said cottonseed is suitable for processing into cottonseed oil and cottonseed meal v thin the confines of said Valley; that at all times herein mentioned said growers have had farm machinery, equipment, tools and supplies, personnel, labor, organization, and knowledge adequate for said production of cottonseed suitable for processing into cottonseed oil and cottonseed meal; that during all the successive crop years hereinafter described said growers planted said areas in said Valley in cotton and raised and produced cotton containing large amounts of cottonseed suitable for said purposes."

[Production of Cottonseed]

The remainder of the Complaint states in substance the following facts:

The rights of each of the thousands of growers are based upon and are affected by a common question of law and fact. The growers are numerous and each has a small interest in this controversy. One variety of cotton has been produced by use of uniform methods of cultivation and harvest. Although the quality and value of the cottonseed has varied, every one of the growers has, nevertheless, been paid the same fixed uniform price for his seed, regardless of the difference.

The soil and climate are suitable for the production of cottonseed suitable for the production of cottonseed oil and meal, and the growers produced such cottonseed. The growing, harvesting, ginning, processing of the seed and the refining of the oil, and the shipping and sale of the oil, meal, hulls, and linters in interstate commerce are each a part of a continuous, inseparable course of conduct which affects commerce between the States.

"Seed cotton" is defined and it is stated that there is no market for it as such for there is only a market for the lint and seed after the two have been separated by ginning. The growers delivered large quantities of cottonseed each year to the defendants. It is heavy and bulky and must be ginned close to the place where it was grown. The seed-cotton was removed from the trailers and ginned. The lint of each grower was weighed and kept separate from all others. Neither the seed nor debris of any one of the growers was ever weighed. The seed of each grower was inextricably intermingled with that of every other grower without weighing it. Defendants credited each grower in their books with an amount substantially less than the true amount of his seed.

The total amount deliverd by all growers was more than the total amount all growers were credited with or paid for and then there was pro-rating among the growers in proportion to the total number of bales of cotton ginned for each grower. The amount of money received by a grower for his seed depends on two factors,—weight and price.

The defendants, including Doe One through Doe Forty, owned all the non-cooperative gins in the Valley and no other gins existed within any other available area. Cottonseed must be ginned before it or its components of lint and seed can be sold. The defendants control all available gins and the growers must deal with them or not at all.

Cottonseed is not sold in open markets as other farm products are, but it is sold by the growers to large processors to whom the grower had delivered his seed cotton, as his agent, for the purpose of ginning it and for the purpose of selling his lint and seed.

The cottonseed was hauled away from the gins of the defendants day by day as it was ginned and taken to the processing plants of the defendants. No grower could have sold his share of the intermingled seed to anyone but the defendant who ginned it, for it was trucked away as fast as it was ginned. The grower must have his seed cotton ginned before he can sell it at all. The defendants have all of the available gins. As fast as the seed is ginned, it is intermingled with that of other growers and trucked away. The grower has no choice except to sell his seed to the defendant who ginned it for him at both a weight and price arbitrarily fixed by the defendants. Cottonseed is too bulky to transport long distances and cannot be safely stored.

A large portion (almost two-thirds) of seed cotton consists of cottonseed. The only use therefor, except a small amount of planting seed, is the manufacture of cottonseed oil, meal and linters by defendants who own all the available processing plants therefor. The defendants process more than 90% of all seed grown in the Valley. The remaining 10% is processed by an agricultural non-profit cooperative for its members. The cooperative did not buy cottonseed from growers but processed on a non-profit basis only. The defendants constituted the only practical market for cottonseed in the Valley,—there being no other outlet or market or use for the growers' cottonseed there.

There follow direct allegations to the effect that the defendants named therein own all available gins in the Valley; that the seed of each grower was intermingled with that of all other growers and immediately hauled away so the grower had no alternative but to sell to the defendants and that the growers paid all costs of ginning.

It is then alleged that the growing of cotton is a costly matter. A large part of the growers are financed by the defendants and through these financing transactions, the defendants gain control over the grower and the cottonseed.

Many persons are affected by the growing of cotton in the Valley and the illegal fixing of the price of cottonseed directly and substantially affects interstate commerce.

The number of gins and processing plants owned by each of the defendants in the Valley is alleged and that there are no other gins, or processing plants there. All cottonseed sold in the Valley must be sold to the defendants named. There is no other market for such seed and the defendants have a complete monopoly of the market for cottonseed there and of interstate commerce of such seed and of the purchase and processing of such seed as well as of the sale of the products of such seed in interstate commerce. The acts of the defendant set out in the Complaint violated the Anti-Trust Acts and injured each of the growers in his business and property.

[Alleged Conspiracy]

It is then stated in Paragraph XII that, at a time unknown to plaintiffs, the defendants "entered into a conspiracy, plan, scheme, and course of conduct with each other to regulate, fix and determine the price" of cottonseed and to force the growers to sell the seed to them at that price by each paying the same price for seed at all times. For that purpose, "the defendants agreed, confederated and conspired with each other to fix and determine a single and common price to be offered and paid to each of the growers for cottonseed delivered by him to any one of the defendants." Each of the defendants did from time to time, regulate and adjust its price so that all defendants offered and paid the same price at all times.

All the defendants posted and paid the same price for cottonseed at all times. The price was changed at times, sometimes by lowering it, sometimes by raising it, and all the defendants made the same changes at the same time. All raised and lowered their price to the same extent at the same time, and all defendants followed this practice during the years therein mentioned.

Other allegations are herein summarized:

Defendants did illegally make and enter into a conspiracy, confederation and agreement to unlawfully monopolize interstate commerce and to unlawfully fix prices paid the growers for seed, all in violation of the Anti-Trust Laws.

Each defendant agreed to fix, adjust and regulate the price of seed and each agreed to and did charge the same price for ginning.

By concerted action, each defendant did offer and pay the same price for seed at all times. Each did raise and lower the price on various occasions in the same amount at the same time.

This agreement and practice as to price-fixing affected each and every one of the growers to the same extent. "No one grower can recover without proving this common question of law and fact". These and other allegations are directly to the effect that there was an agreement between the defendants and that they followed a common course of conduct by actually posting and paying the same price for seed at all times, regardless of many factors that would normally tend to cause their prices to differ.

Defendants no longer competed with each other for the purchase of cottonseed or for ginning business on a price basis and regardless of the factors, such as differences in distances and costs of transportation of seed, varying efficiencies and costs of ginning, the relative prices defendants received for their products, and all other factors, every one of the defendants paid the same price per ton for seed.

The prices agreed upon and paid by the defendants were not the reasonable value or the actual or market value thereof. Such prices were $12.00 per ton less than the market value thereof and each grower has been damaged to that extent. During the time involved, all growers delivered 2,400,000 tons of seed and have been damaged in the amount of $28,800.00.

In a final paragraph, it is alleged that the identity of every grower and the amount of cottonseed credited to each grower is contained in the books and records of the defendants; that the exact amount of cottonseed delivered to defendants, the time it was processed and sold in interstate commerce are all known by the defendants but are unknown to plaintiffs and that the amount, price and quality thereof was directly affected by the conspiracy.

And finally, as a summation, it is stated that the acts of the defendants illegally affected interstate commerce, the price of seed was illegally fixed and a monopoly established in the Valley.

[Damages Sought]

The foregoing summary adequately summarizes the Complaint. Indeed, it is taken, with slight variations as to language, from the plaintiffs' own summary contained in the brief filed in this case. Just as we reproduced in full some of the introductory paragraphs in the complaint showing the nature of the action and the reason why it is claimed to be a proper class action, we believe that, in the light of the discussion to follow, the Prayer of the Complaint should also be reproduced in full. It reads:

> "Wherefore, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, plaintiffs pray judgment for damages in the total amount of $28,800,000.00 and for treble damages in the amount of $86,400,000.00, and that said damages be distributed among said growers in accordance with the number of tons of cottonseed each of said growers delivered to said defendants during said years; that each of plaintiffs and each of said growers have judgment for the sum found to be due him, and that the amount so found due be trebled; and that said plaintiffs, and each of them, and each of said growers, have judgment for their own costs herein involved, together with attorneys' fees in such sum as the Court may deem reasonable; and that plaintiffs and each of said growers have such other and further relief as may be deemed fit and proper in the premises."

[Defendants' Motions]

Each of the defendants filed Motions to Strike and to Dismiss. The Motion to Strike related to certain paragraphs which were alleged to be inflammatory. They were disposed of in open court and have no particular significance in a published opinion. A more important Motion to Restrict Recovery to a date subsequent to January 7, 1953, was conceded to be correct in view of the fact that actions prior to that date would be barred by the Statute of Limitations of the State of California. [§ 338(1), California Code of Civil Procedure] The Order at the end of the Opinion so limits any claim to be asserted in any amended Complaint to be filed.

[Issues]

The Opinion which follows concerns itself with two main problems:

First: Whether this action was properly instituted as a class action under Rule 23(a)(3) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. In this respect, the motion filed by the Chief Defendant, Anderson, Clayton & Co., correctly summarizes the grounds for the contention that it was not. In substance, it stated:

The Complaint should be dismissed insofar as it purports to present claims on behalf of any parties other than the named plaintiffs, in that it does not constitute a proper class action under the applicable Federal Rules of Civil Procedure for the following reasons:

> (1) As affirmatively appears from the affidavits of growers of cotton and cottonseed in the San Joaquin Valley of California, which have been filed with this motion, and the affidavits of an additional large number of such growers filed with the motions of other defendants in this action, the named plaintiffs in this action do not, as alleged in the complaint, sue on behalf of all members of said purported class.
> (2) The persons whom the named plaintiffs purport to represent do not constitute a class as required by Federal Rule 23(a), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.
> (3) It does not appear that the named plaintiffs fairly insure the adequate representation of all parties whom they purport to represent. On the contrary, it affirmatively appears from the Complaint and from the affidavits filed by this defendant and the other defendants, that the named plaintiffs do not insure adequate representation of all such parties.
> (4) As appears from affidavits filed, and the allegations of the Complaint, the questions of law and fact presented in this action are not common to all members of the purported class.

(5) As appears from affidavits, many transactions involving the sale of cottonseed by numerous persons included in the class were not identical with or comparable to the transactions involving sales made by other members of the purported class, but, on the contrary, there were material differences and distinctions between the various types of transactions involved.

Second: As to the Motion to Dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted [Rule 8, Federal Rules of Civil Procedure], the most succinct statement of the grounds is contained in the Motion of another defendant which states that the action should be dismissed

"because the complaint fails to state a claim against the defendants upon which relief can be granted for the reason that the amount of damages each named plaintiff individually sustained is not alleged in said complaint."

[Affidavits]

It would serve no useful purpose to attempt to even summarize the hundreds of pages of affidavits which have been filed by the defendants in this case. Suffice it to say that the affidavits show (1) that since the institution of the action, four of the plaintiffs, Manuel Garcia, John Lusaretta, Pete Prandini and Andy Carey, have announced their desire to dissociate themselves from the action, and (2) a total of 2038 other growers have announced their opposition to participation in the action and their unwillingness to be represented by the named plaintiffs.

In contrast, no one in the unnamed group of 8000 growers has expressed a desire or willingness to join the plaintiffs or to intervene or interplead in the action on their side.

[Motions]

YANKWICH, Chief Judge (After stating the facts above): The two motions, (1) to dismiss the complaint as a class action and (2) to dismiss it for failure to state a claim as to the individuals joining as plaintiffs, are interrelated. Whether the complaint before us be considered as an action by several plaintiffs on their own behalf or as representing themselves and others similarly situated, the fundamental principles of law—those relating to the practices alleged to be in violation of the antitrust laws of the United States, from which the injuries to plaintiffs are alleged to flow—are the same. Procedurally, there is fundamental difference between stating a claim or cause of action on behalf of several persons who join as individuals and seek recovery for injuries caused to them alone and stating a claim for injury by a small group on behalf of a large class. Because the harm of which complaint is made—whether the action be considered from one aspect or another—is the same and stems from the interdictions contained in the antitrust laws, it is well to begin the discussion with a statement of some of the fundamental principles underlying antitrust legislation and jurisprudence.

I

The Aim of Antitrust Legislation

The Congress of the United States, in 1890, enacted the Sherman Antitrust Act.[1] The Act followed attempts by various states to deal with the problem of monopoly, which the rapid industrialization of the country following the Civil War had brought on. The trend has been characterized by a writer as "the nationalizing of business," which was very prominent in the period between 1878 and 1898. Large trusts arose: The Standard Oil Company, The American Sugar Refining Company, and the amalgamation of tinplate companies. Opposition to them began at state level, and many states instituted prosecutions under state laws before the Sherman Act became law.

In 1888 fourteen antitrust bills were introduced in the House of Representatives. In the same year Senator John Sherman introduced his first bill,

"To declare unlawful trusts and combinations in restraint of trade and production."

Senator Sherman's name was attached to the Bill, although historians state that other senators were more instrumental in the final framing of the Act than he.[2] The Act was signed by President Harrison on July 2, 1890. The statute remained unchanged until 1914, when the Clayton Act was adopted.[3]

The Sherman Act condemned certain practices and their results. The Clayton Act condemned the same practices in their incipiency. There have been other acts since, such as the Robinson-Patman Act, prohibiting certain discriminatory practices in commerce.[4] They are not involved in this litigation. Mr. Chief Justice Hughes has called the Sherman Act "a charter of freedom."[5]

Mr. Justice McReynolds, speaking in 1919 for an unanimous court, gave this as the aim of the Sherman Act:

> "The purpose of the Sherman Act is to prohibit monopolies, contracts and combinations which probably would unduly interfere with the free exercise of their rights by those engaged, or who wish to engage, in trade and commerce—in a word to preserve the right of freedom to trade."[6]

The same aim has been stressed repeatedly since by the court. In fact, there is no break of continuity between the old and new cases in this respect.[7]

The Congress has provided two means for enforcing the Act through Governmental agencies. It declared certain practices a misdemeanor.[8] It also provided for a civil action in equity to enjoin them.[9]

The Congress has also provided for a private civil action:

> "Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee."[10]

The object of this section is to allow persons who are injured by the prohibited acts to bring civil actions for treble damages, not as a penalty or as a means of private enrichment, but as an aid to the enforcement of the antitrust laws. For this reason the judgment in a criminal proceeding or in a civil action instituted by the Government is made prima facie evidence of the existence of the condemned practices, to the same extent as persons would be bound under the doctrine of estoppel, but a consent decree is not given such effect.[11]

II

The Nature of the Treble-Damage Suit

The Congress, by allowing private actions, in aid of enforcement of antitrust policy, did not intend to allow a person representing himself or a group to bring an unlimited action for an unspecified amount, upon the bare allegation that a conspiracy exists. Congress intended to confine the remedy to persons who are actually damaged in their business, and damaged in a measurable amount.

The Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, in a noted case, made this statement:

> "Injury 'in his business or property' is a prerequisite to a person's right to maintain an action for treble damages."[12]

[12] Peller v. International Boxing Club, 7 Cir., 1955 [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,202], 227 F. 2d 593, 595.

This expresses the attitude of all courts. The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has said, in effect, that the purpose of the treble damage action is not to make a private person the vindicator of the antitrust laws of the United States, but merely to aid the Government in the enforcement of these laws:

"The main purpose of those laws was to protect the public from monopolies and restrain of trade, and the private right of action for treble damages was incidental and subordinate to that main purpose. * * * The grant of a claim for treble damages to persons injured was for the purpose of multiplying the agencies which would help enforce the antitrust laws and therefore make them more effective. * * * The very foundation of the right of a private suitor to recover 'threefold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee' is the violation of public rights prohibited by the Act and, indeed, made criminal offenses. * * *

"Public injury alone justifying the threefold increase in damages and being an indispensable constituent of a claim for violation of the antitrust laws, a general allegation of such injury is not sufficient. It is essential that the complaint allege facts from which it can be determined that the conduct charged to be in violation of the antitrust laws was reasonably calculated to prejudice the public interest by unduly retricting the free flow of interstate commerce." [13] (Emphasis added)

The Circuit Courts of Appeals have been very careful to note that the persons suing, either for themselves or on behalf of a class must show that they are of the type to be directly injured by the conspiracy and not only indirectly.

The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in sustaining a judgment on the pleadings entered by our colleague, Judge Wm. C. Mathes, in a case,[14] upon the ground that the complaint did not state a cause of action either on behalf of the persons individually or as the members of a class, made this pertinent statement:

"A conspiracy may have many purposes and objects; the conspirators may perform an almost indefinite variety of acts in furtherance of the conspiracy; but in order to state a cause of action under the antitrust laws a plaintiff must show more than that one purpose of the conspiracy was a restraint of trade and that an act has been committed which harms him. He must show that he is within that area of the economy which is endangered by a breakdown of competitive conditions in a particular industry. Otherwise he is not injured 'by reason' of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws." [15] (Emphasis added)

All courts agree that the damages of which the section speaks are not the type of general damages that are recoverable in an ordinary tort, but rather damages actually sustained, which are susceptible of measurement. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit has so stated:

"The next issue is whether the appellant has stated a recoverable claim under the alleged conspiracy.

"Recovery in a private civil antitrust action is based upon actual damage. * * * As stated in Harrison v. Paramount Pictures, supra, 115 F. Supp. at page 316:

'Injury * * * implies violation of a legal right.'

"* * * this plaintiff 'owns' the building, but her 'property' in it consists entirely of the right to the reversion after the expiration of the lease, plus the rights which she has retained by the leases in respect of it. There is no such thing as a conspiracy against a building, and the plaintiff's injury, if any, can only arise from a violation or impairment of such rights in the property as she has." [16]

In proving damage in a civil antitrust suit there are several methods of approach. One is the rule laid down in the motion picture cases in which the courts have held that

This is necessarily so because in a private action for treble damages, the right of recovery does not depend upon the mere existence of the conspiracy, but upon the injuries resulting to the particular defendant from it. (Foster & Kleiser Co. v. Special Site Sign Co., 9 Cir., 1936 [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,135], 85 F. 2d 742, 750; Suckow Borax Mines Consolidated, Inc. v. Richfield Oil Corp., 9 Cir., 1955 [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,020], 221 F. 2d 358, 362-364) where one is complaining of restrictions practiced against the exhibition of motion pictures, damages may be proved by showing the loss of receipts resulting from the operation of the restrictions.[17] It may also be done by showing the profits of theatres similarly situated, to which pictures were released earlier.[18]

When we are dealing with other commodities the rule of proof may be different. The plaintiff may show that he was deprived of a commodity, that he could have handled it and sold it, and what profit he would have made.[19] This method was used in a recent trial before me in which the plaintiffs were allowed to show that their product (an automobile wax and polish) was excluded from certain gasoline stations, what other competitive products were sold to these stations, and what profit the plaintiff-manufacturer would have made if allowed to sell in competition. Another method is to show that the plaintiff suffered loss because he was compelled to sell his product below his cost of production.[20]

Whichever method is used, the defendant has the right to contest with each of the plaintiffs the amount of damage. The Mandeville case, which counsel for the plaintiffs claim to have used as a model for their complaint,[21] indicates clearly that whether there be one defendant or several, damage must be alleged in the terms of actual loss to each individual plaintiff, in a manner that is ascertainable and can be proved. In that case, the court, after stating that the issue as to what damage the plaintiffs were entitled to and whether the damage should be based upon the difference between certain prices and the prices fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture was not being decided, makes the observation that

> "Petitioner Mandeville Island Farms prayed judgment for $315,043.80; petitioner Zuckerman for $112,192.14." [22]

So it is quite evident that in a case of this character no complaint should go before a court or jury unless it pleads adequately: (1) violation of antitrust law. As to this, the allegations of the complaint must be taken as true and are, in the man, sufficient. It must then be shown (2) that the violation affected the plaintiff and injured him in "his business or property" [23] and (3) the actual damages he suffered.

In a class action of this character, while the plaintiffs may aggregate the amount for which each sues, the complaint should state specifically the amount which each claims to be the actual damage suffered. This is not only in conformity with the law, but accords also with the principle that should prevail in all lawsuits, i. e., that they should apprise the defendant what the claim against him is. If this be true in the case of a single defendant, it is truer in the case of a group of defendants, such as we have here, whose relationship to the plaintiffs may not be the same.

Some defendants may have no contractual relations with the plaintiffs. How are they to know what they are required to answer or where the facts should come from? The fact that all are charged with conspiracy does not give each defendant an opportunity to answer the specific charge as to the manner in which his activities injured any particular plaintiff.

The basis of our jurisprudence is that the judge should determine litigation according to the allegations made and proved:

> "Judex debet judicare secundum allegata et probata."

This can only be done if the defendants are in a position to know how to meet a particular charge. This had bearing not only on the sufficiency of the complaint as an action by individuals, but also on its sufficiency as a class action, because even in a true class action the defendants are entitled to know who the members of the class are who might be expected to benefit by the judgment.

The Common Fund Theory

I believe that counsel for the plaintiffs have misconceived the theory upon which this type of class action may be brought. They have stated frankly that they thought that the small group they represent could establish (1) the price fixing and (2) the damages per ton of seed sold. Then other persons could come in and, by merely proving the amount sold at the depreciated price,[24] recover damages. But the difficulty with this line of thinking is that the courts, including the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, have held, as will appear more fully further on in the discussion, that the judgment in a class suit of this type, commonly known as the "spurious" type, is not binding on those who do not join before trial.[25] So nothing final could be determined in a suit by this limited number.

Only a Government judgment or decree has the effect of establishing prima facie violation. A judgment in a private suit, at the behest of a small number, can have that effect only as to those before the court.

There is no authority in any case that I am familiar with for the proposition that you can establish by a judgment the violation and the median damage per ton and then ask those not before the court to come and collect damages on the basis of proof of tonnage of seed sold.

Human cupidity makes it certain to assume that with such decree in effect everyone will wish to come in. But there is no power in this court to establish by a decree, at the behest of 22, the fact of violation and of median damage and then allow thousands of others to join and claim their damage according to the established formula.

The rules of interpleader[26] and intervention,[27] liberal though they are, allow no joinder of this character after judgment. In case a jury trial is demanded, to which the plaintiffs and the defendant are entitled, would the jury be kept in session after the "interlocutory" judgment until all other growers have joined, or would they be recalled from time to time, as new plaintiffs join, to determine the amount due them? More, any judgment declaring (1) violation of antitrust laws and (2) basic damage will not affect anyone who is not before the court at time judgment is rendered.

To sum up: Counsel's contention that an "interlocutory" judgment could be entered that would establish a violation of antitrust laws, fix a pattern of damage and then allow additional parties to come in, finds no justification in any principle of law with which I am familiar. As stated before, such an assumption would give this court the power to enter a decree that would have greater effect upon litigants in a private lawsuit than the Congress has given to a judgment or decree in actions by the Government. More, it disregards the fact, to be treated more fully hereinafter, that in a "spurious" class action a separate judgment must be entered as to each of the plaintiffs.

IV

The Class Action

We now consider other reasons which stand in the way of entertaining this action as a class action.

Class actions are allowed under our Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The Rule governing them reads:

> "Rule 23. Class Actions.
> "(a) Representation. If persons constituting a class are so numerous as to make it impracticable to bring them all before the court, such of them, one or more, as will fairly insure the adequate representation of all may, on behalf of all, sue or be sued, when the character of the right sought to be enforced for or against the class is
> "(1) joint, or common, or secondary in the sense that the owner of a primary right refuses to enforce that right and a member of the class thereby becomes entitled to enforce it;
> "(2) several, and the object of the action is the adjudication of claims which do or may affect specific property involved in the action; or
> "(3) several, and there is a common question of law or fact affecting the several rights and a common belief is sought."[28]

[25] McGrath v. Tadayasu Abo, 9 Cir., 1951, 186 F. 2d 766, 770.

[26] Rule 22, F. R. C. P.

[27] Rule 24, F. R. C. P.

[28] Rule 23, F. R. C. P. The principle embodied in this rule is as old as equity jurisprudence itself, as applied in the federal courts. Indeed, one of the most interesting statements of the rule, in which the nucleus of the distinction between the three types of class actions

I am of the view that in any one of the three forms of actions allowed, (1) the "true" form of class action, (2) the "hybrid" form or (3) the "spurious" class action, the court must be satisfied that the persons before it will fairly insure adequate representation of all.

In one of the oldest cases on the subject the Supreme Court, after referring to the fact that class actions are exceptions to the rule which requires that an action be instituted only on behalf or against persons who are actually before the court and referring to the three types of class actions long recognized in equity jurisprudence, states that it is the function of the court to insure that the persons before the court truly represent the rights to be adjudicated:

> "In all cases where exceptions to the general rule are allowed, and a few are permitted to sue and defend on behalf of the many, by representation, care must be taken that persons are brought on the record fairly representing the interest or right involved, so that it may be fully and honestly tried." [29] (Emphasis added)

So when the makers of the Rule under discussion referred to "adequate representation" it must be assumed that they had in mind this long-established and recognized equitable principle which applied to all three kinds of class representation cases. And the courts which have had occasion to apply the rule have so held. In a leading case on the subject, the Court said that in the case of "spurious" class actions, the court should consider the question, and held that in determining whether there is an assurance of proper representation a representation by a small number (two jobbers) in an action allegedly brought on behalf of 900 is a question of fact to be considered by the court. The Court also ruled that, aside from any other questions, the simple matter of numerical inadequacy was sufficient to order the dismissal of the action as a class action, saying:

> "It seems to us that this is a case, which, upon the foregoing facts, falls within the first category of discriminatory action. There is room for the play of discretion by the trial judge. The facts and the inferences are not free from dispute. There are numerous possibilities which are real and substantial as distinguished from conjectural or possible, from which different individuals might reach different judgments. The District Judge concluded that the plaintiffs had not shown their ability to insure adequate representation of the absent members of the class. The evidence justified Judge Igoe's conclusion.
> "If this question had not been presented to him first, and we were exercising our judgment, a like conclusion would be reached." [30]

The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit has referred to the case just cited and has stated that the judgment in a "spurious" class case is not binding upon any persons except those who actually become parties before judgment. After stating that Subdivision (3) of the Section under discussion covers cases where each plaintiff has a right to recover damages for the wrong done all,

> "even though the amount of damages recoverable differs for the different plaintiffs," [31]

they add:

> "The same principle was stated by the Seventh Circuit in Weeks v. Bareco Oil Co., 7 Cir., 125 F. 2d 84, 88." [32]

In another case in which the action was of the second type, called "hybrid", the Court insisted that the problem of representation is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court. In that case there was a fund against which all claimed. The Court held that 49 investors should not be allowed to bring suit on behalf of 13,000 investors who may have a claim to the fund.[33]

In a case from the Third Circuit in which an action was brought by a member of a local union, this statement occurs:

> "It is true, as the plaintiff argues, that the membership of an unincorporated lais found, is in Smith v. Swormstedt et al., 1854, 16 Howard 288, 301-302. And see, Supreme Tribe of Ben-Hur v. Cauble, 1921, 255 U. S. 356, 363-364; Martinez v. Maverick County Water Con. & Imp. Dist. No. 1, 5 Cir., 1955, 219 F. 2d 666, 671-672. And the old Equity Rule 38 embodied most, if not all, of the features of the present rule.

bor union may constitute a class on whose behalf representatives may bring a true class suit to vindicate the common rights of the members as such. But Federal Civil Procedure Rule 23(a), 28 U. S. C. A., provides that the representatives of the class who bring the suit must be such 'as will fairly insure the adequate representation of all.' Here the affidavits upon which the court acted make it perfectly clear that the membership of Local 103 is sharply divided on the very question involved in this case, the expulsion of the plaintiff and his associates. Indeed a majority of the members who voted on the question at a membership meeting held on January 11, 1950 voted to sustain their expulsion." [34]

Then follows a statement which has a very decisive bearing on the case before us in which 2038 persons say that they do not wish this suit continued in their behalf:

"With a class thus sharply divided in opinion, it would be absurd to say that the leader of one faction in the internecine struggle could adequately represent the whole membership. The finding of the district court on this point must be set aside as clearly erroneous." [35] (Emphasis added)

The trial court having allowed the case to proceed, its Order was set aside as clearly erroneous. A later case from the Seventh Circuit does not propound a different doctrine. The court merely held that in the particular instance there was assurance of adequate representation; significantly, however, insisting that the judgments would have to be several as to each of the plaintiffs.[36] One other observation is in order. Rule 23 must be read with another Rule which uses similar wording.[37] Rule 23 states as to a "spurious" class action, that it may be brought when the interests are

"several, and there is a common question of law or fact affecting several rights and a common relief is sought." [38]

This is nothing more than "permissive joinder". The same language occurs in Rule 20, which states:

"(a) Permissive joinder: All persons may join in one action as plaintiffs if they assert any right to relief jointly, severally, or in the alternative in respect of or arising out of the same transaction, occurrence, or series of transactions or occurrences and if any question of law or fact common to all of them will arise in the action. All persons may be joined in one action as defendants if there is asserted against them jointly, severally, or in the alternative, any right to relief in respect of or arising out of the same transaction, occurrence, or series of transactions or occurrences and if any question of law or fact common to all of them will arise in the action. The plaintiff or defendant need not be interested in obtaining or defending against all the relief demanded. Judgment may be given for one or more of the plaintiffs according to their respective rights to relief, and against one or more defendants according to their respective liabilities.

"(b) Separate trials. The court may make such orders as will prevent a party [34] Giordano v. Radio Corporation of America, 3 Cir., 1950, 183 F. 2d 558, 560.

[35] Giordano v. Radio Corporation of America, supra, Note 34, p. 560. The following language from a later case from the Fifth Circuit is also very appropriate:

"In this record, there is no proof to sustain the allegation that there are many others besides complainant, too numerous to make parties, having the identical status and possessing the necessary qualifications for admission to the same college and courses. Certainly there can be no such all-inclusive injunction covering all members of an alleged class without proof that the others desire to be so represented in substantial numbers or have requested plaintiff so to represent them. Such facts cannot be assumed." (Board of Supervisors, etc. v. Tureau, 5 Cir., 1955, 222 F. 2d 714, 719.)

"At any rate, the law of this circuit, by virtue of Weeks v. Bareco Oil Co., supra, is that where the tort complained of by each plaintiff is the same and is claimed to have damaged each of the plaintiffs in the same manner, plaintiffs may join under Rule 20(a) or maintain the suit as a spurious class suit under Rule 23(a)(3), though the judgments are several and no one is bound unless he is present." (p. 742) (Emphasis added)

A later case from the same circuit approves the principle that separate judgments must be entered:

"Here we are dealing with a spurious class action, containing common elements of fact and law, but based upon separate and individual claims growing out of the same transaction. Hughes v. Encyclopedia Britannica, 7 Cir., 199 F. 2d 295; Kainz v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 7 Cir., 194 F. 2d 737. In such an action, separate judgments are entered 'and no one is bound unless he is present.' Kainz v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 194 F. 2d, p. 742." (Hurd v. Illinois Bell Telephone Company, 7 Cir., 1956, 234 F. 2d 942, 944) (Emphasis added) from being embarrassed, delayed, or put to expense by the inclusion of a party against whom he asserts no claim and who asserts no claim against him, and may order separate trials or make other orders to prevent delay or prejudice." [39] (Emphasis added)

[37] Rule 20, F. R. C. P.

[38] Rule 23(a)(3), F. R. C. P.

Those who criticize the courts that have held it to be their function to determine, in advance of trial, whether there is adequate representation under Rule 23, overlook a very significant matter, i.e., that under Rule 20, in permissive joinder cases, the court, in the interest of justice, may order separate trials. Ultimately, the "spurious" class action, so called, is nothing more than permissive joinder. And so it is quite evident that, just as under Rule 20, when there is joined a large number of parties who have only one question of law or fact in common, the court can spare litigants the difficulty and expense of a joint trial, so, by parity of reasoning, in "spurious" class action, the court has the same right, upon a showing that there would be no true representation. This can be done by compelling the plaintiffs to (1) either name all the persons in the class for whose benefit the action is brought, or (2) dismiss it as a class action as to all except those who appear as plaintiffs.

As a matter of fact, I am of the view that our power under Rule 23 is even greater than under permissive joinder, because under permissive joinder, the judgment as to the common question would be binding upon the parties joined, while the courts have held that in "spurious" joinder, even when the representation is adequate, the judgment is not so binding.[40]

The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit has stated:

"Appellant Hinst and twenty-five other individuals brought this action for damages arising out of the loss of their employment. The complaint purports to have been brought on behalf of 2,000 other individuals similarly situated but, since each plaintiff's claim is individual and several, and no specific property can be affected by the action, the action is a 'spurious class suit' under Rule 23(a)(3) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U. S. C. A. Such a suit is merely a permissive joinder device in which the right and liability of each individual plaintiff is distinct and no member of the 'class' is bound by a judgment who does not join as plaintiff or intervenor." [41]

This succinct statement sums up the basic reason for the view that the rights in a class action of the "spurious" type are no greater than the rights under permissive joinder. As stated by the same court in a prior case:

"We agree with the Second Circuit that the relief attained in class suits under Rule 23(a)(3) extends only to the named plaintiffs actually becoming parties before judgment. York v. Guaranty Trust Co. of New York, 2 Cir., 143 F. 2d 503, 529." [42]

Summary and Conclusion

To conclude:

The complaint in this case shows inadequacy in numbers. The 26 original plaintiffs, whose number has been reduced to 22, seek to recover $28,800,000 on behalf of some 8,000 growers. This it is sought to treble to an astronomic total of $86,400,000. Two thousand and thirty-eight persons, who are allegedly within the same class, have stated that they do not desire to be represented by the plaintiffs. The action has been pending since November 14, 1956, and no other member of the class has sought to join as plaintiff or has intervened or interpleaded. On the contrary, four of the original plaintiffs have expressed their desire to withdraw. No counter-affidavits have been filed claiming coercion or compulsion of any of those expressing opposition.

It is also apparent that there is a variety of contracts. At least nine different types of growers and contracts have been identified in the affidavits: (1) Financed growers; (2) Non-financed growers; (3) Sharecroppers; (4) Corporations who do farming and who may be partially owned by other defendants; (5) Farmers who divide their business between various defendants; (6) Individuals who do farming and also have a stockholder's interest in one of the defendants; (7) Farmers who do business with the cooperative gins; (8) Persons who are inactive, but own a financial interest in partnerships engaged in the farming business; and (9) Cotton gins independently owned or operated by individuals or corporations and cooperatives and who compete for the seed of the farmer at growers level.

It appears on the face of the Complaint, and is evident from the variety of operations and contracts, that there is no uniformity in the quality of cotton seed. In view of this and of the requirement for several judgments, no single decree of this court could possibly determine a damage ratio ton-wise, that would apply to all.

An added factor also is the attempt to join the cooperatives of which the growers themselves are members. I have always thought that cooperatives in the agricultural field in California have been the means of securing easier marketing and processing and a fair market for farm products. Cooperatives may well be an evil. But if they are, and participate in antitrust violations, they should be sued by name, so that they may come in and defend, perhaps against their own grower members.

There is no need to analyze in detail the various types of contracts described in the affidavits and already enumerated. One observation may, however, be made: The record shows that there are many financed contracts, i.e., contracts whereby the buyer becomes the grower's partner, or joint venturer, and finances or advances the money to the grower. In such type of contract the law would recognize the right to impose conditions as to marketing that could not be imposed on independent growers.

So it is quite evident to the court that it would be a grave injustice to allow 22 persons to represent the large number of cotton growers, unless they voluntarily joined as plaintiffs.[43]

The only claimed common question involved is price fixing. But, we have here as defendants a variety of buyers, ginners and processors, doing everything from buying the cotton to turning it into cottonseed oil and by-products, involving a great diversity of interests.

Assuming that the plaintiffs can comply with the requirement that the damage of each of them be set forth in, it is quite apparent on the face of this record that the 22 persons before the court do not insure adequate representation. A judicial order that would allow this case to remain open further until such other persons as may be solicited join as plaintiffs would be an abuse of discretion, and subject these defendants, whose interests appear so diverse, to unwarranted hardship. In our system, a person should be summoned into court only upon the basis of a claim or a cause of action for which he is legally answerable, and which is stated specifically in the complaint.

Disregarding as untenable in law the theory that a judgment determining the criterion of damage would allow others to come in after an interlocutory judgment, thus giving a greater force to the decree than a decree in a Government criminal action or equity suit,[44] the continuance of this suit as a class action would do violence to all the ideals of fairness and justice which should prevail in American courts.

Hence the following rulings:

1. An order will be entered dismissing the complaint as to all defendants as a class action. The order will direct the entry of a final judgment of dismissal

> "upon an express determination that there is no just reason for delay and upon an express direction for the entry of judgment."[45]

The judgment shall recite, in effect, that, in the opinion of the court, the record presented by the complaint, the affidavits, depositions, and other documentary evidence shows clearly and conclusively that because of diversity of interests in the group and numerical inadequacy of plaintiffs, they do not and cannot insure the adequate representation of all the growers in the valley.

2. The complaint will also be dismissed for failure to state a claim, because it does not allege specifically the actual damage suffered by each of the plaintiffs.

However, the plaintiffs will be given 30 days in which to file an amended complaint, limiting their claim to a joint action on [43] The discretionary power of the court in disallowing "spurious" class actions is well stated by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in Knowles v. War Damage Corp., supra Note 33, p. 18:

"This type of action is spoken of as a 'spurious action'. The members' interests may be several and not interdependent, although the remaining requisites of the true class action must be met. Their joinder is a matter of economy and efficiency on the part of courts and parties,—an avoidance of a multiplicity of suits. Courts have possessed the power to afford and have afforded this remedy long before the adoption of the new Federal Rules of Civil Procedure: The joinder was and is a matter of discretion in the trial court."

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Patent License—Agreement To Maintain Prices and Not To Manufacture Competitive Products—Legality.—An agreement under which a patentee granted a company an exclusive license to manufacture and sell a cotton stuffing machine under its patent, the patentee granted the company the right to manufacture machines under patents not owned by it for a commission, the patentee prescribed the prices at which the company might sell machines made under its patent and the other patents, and the company was required to confine its manufacture of machines exclusively to the machines of the patentee's type if the company failed to secure and maintain an exclusive license under the other patents was held, in a declaratory judgment action, invalid and unenforceable under the antitrust laws because of its price-fixing provision and because of its provision limiting the right of the company to manufacture and sell machines competitive with the patentee's machine. The illegal portions of the agreement were held to be integrated with all of the other portions of the agreement and therefore not severable.

Findings of Fact

[Declaratory Judgment Action]

1. This was an action commenced by Consolidated Packaging Machinery Corporation against Richard J. Kelly, Executor of the Estate of Thomas C. Kelly, deceased, for declaratory judgment that a license agreement dated June 3, 1944, between Consolidated and Thomas C. Kelly was illegal and unenforceable, and that Consolidated had no duty or obligation thereunder to pay royalties or commissions or to assign any of its patents or patent applications to Richard J. Kelly, executor of the Estate of Thomas C. Kelly, or anyone in privity with him.

2. This Court has jurisdiction of the action and of the parties.

3. The matter came on to be heard upon the separate motions of Consolidated and of Kelly for summary judgment.

[License Agreement]

4. On June 3, 1944, Thomas C. Kelly, of Hinsdale, Illinois, entered into a license agreement with Consolidated, by which he gave Consolidated an exclusive license, under and in accordance with Kelly's United States Patent No. 2,171,572, to manufacture, use and sell "cottoners," i. e. machines designed to stuff a wad of cotton into the neck of a bottle or jar.

5. This said agreement, in paragraph 4 thereof, also recited that Kelly granted Consolidated the right to manufacture cottoners other than those manufactured under said Kelly patent No. 2,171,572; specifically those of a type known as "Lakso" cottoners which were covered by United States Letters Patent Nos. 2,269,722 and 2,304,932; Consolidated being required to pay Kelly a commission of 7½% of the gross selling price of all said Lakso machines or parts thereof.

6. Kelly had no interest or right in said Lakso cottoners or in said Lakso patents; said Kelly machine and said Kelly patent were unrelated to said Lakso machine or said Lakso patents; Kelly had no lawful right to prescribe the course of action of Consolidated with respect to said Lakso machine or said Lakso patents, and no lawful right to control or affect any other right of Consolidated with respect to said Lakso machine or said Lakso patents.

7. Said agreement further, in paragraph 9 thereof, prescribed the minimum and maximum prices at which Consolidated might sell cottoners made under either the Kelly or the unrelated Lakso patents thus constituting a fixing of prices by Kelly without patent or other statutory authorization.

8. Said agreement, in paragraph 12 thereof, further provided that if Consolidated failed to secure and maintain an exclusive license under said Lakso patents, it would be required to confine its manufacture of cottoners exclusively to machines of the Kelly type and to pay a royalty thereon in the amount of 15%.

9. Consolidated, in fact, did fail to maintain an exclusive license under said Lakso patents.

10. The recited provision of said paragraph 12 is a restriction on Consolidated's free right to manufacture and sell devices over which Kelly had no control and with respect to which he had no patent or other right.

[Provisions Not Severable]

11. Paragraphs 4 and 5 of said agreement providing for the payment to Kelly of commissions on the sale of the unrelated Lakso machines and of royalties on the Kelly machines; paragraph 6 requiring the assignment by Consolidated to Kelly of improvements of a patentable order on Kelly machines; paragraph 9 providing the price at which Consolidated might sell both Kelly machines and the unrelated Lakso machines; and paragraph 12 limiting Consolidated, in the event of its failure to maintain the Lakso license on an exclusive basis, to the manufacture and sale of Kelly machines, are integrated considerations for the license granted and are not severable.

Conclusions of Law

1. The pleadings (inclusive of a copy of said license agreement of June 3, 1944) and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, show that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that Consolidated is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law.

2. The agreement of June 3, 1944, because of its price-fixing provision and because of its provision limiting the right of Consolidated to manufacture and sell machines competitive with the Kelly machine, is invalid and unenforceable under the antitrust laws.

3. Consolidated has no duty or obligation of any nature under said agreement of June 3, 1944.

4. The illegal portions of said agreement of June 3, 1944, are integrated with all other portions and are not severable therefrom.

5. Said agreement of June 3, 1944, is of no force and effect and is herewith terminated.

6. Consolidated shall recover from Kelly its costs in this Court, to be taxed against Kelly by the Clerk of this Court.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Antitrust Law Violation as Defense—Suit for Inducing Breach of Patent Licensing Agreement—Illegality of Agreement.—A patentee could not maintain an action against a company for inducing the breach of a patent licensing agreement which the patentee had with another party, since the agreement was illegal under the antitrust laws. The objectionable portions of the agreement, unenforceable under the antitrust laws, were an integral part of the agreement and not severable. Under the agreement, the licensee was required to confine its manufacture of cotton stuffing machines to the patentee's type of machine and to sell machines produced under the patent and other patents not owned by the patentee at specified prices.

Memorandum and Order

[Summary Judgment]

WIN G. KNOCH, District Judge [In full text]: This matter came on to be heard on defendant's motion for summary judgment in its favor. The Court has had the benefit of argument of counsel on briefs, has studied the pleadings and the authorities to which counsel refer, and is fully advised in the premises.

It appears to the Court that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that defendant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.

[Action Barred]

Apart from defendant's assertion of privilege as a stockholder, it is the conclusion of the Court that no action lies for inducing breach of plaintiff's contract here because the contract itself is unenforceable.

[Contract—Antitrust Laws]

The identical contract was the subject of action for declaratory judgment as to its invalidity in Consolidated Packaging Machinery Corporation v. Richard J. Kelly, Executor of the Estate of Thomas C. Kelly, Deceased, Case No. 56 C 344, wherein this Court found for the plaintiff [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,729].

The Court found that under this identical contract Consolidated Packaging Machinery Corporation (herein alleged to have been induced by International Paper Company to breach the contract) was required to secure and maintain an exclusive license under patents wholly unrelated to that of this plaintiff's decedent Kelly, on loss of which license, Consolidated was to confine its manufacture exclusively to machines of the Kelly type and to pay him higher royalties; the contract prescribed prices not only for machines of the Kelly type, but also for the machines made pursuant to the unrelated patents and provided (in effect) for royalties to be paid the decedent on both types.

The Court also found that the objectionable portions of the contract, unenforceable under the antitrust laws, were an integrated part of the contract and not severable.

[Judgment]

It is ordered, adjudged and decreed that summary judgment be entered in favor of defendant, with costs.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Pretrial Procedures—Complaint—Judgment of Dismissal—Motion to File Amended Complaint.—A plaintiff was permitted to file an amended complaint where a motion to dismiss the original complaint had been granted and the judgment of dismissal did not reserve to the plaintiff the right to plead over. The judgment of dismissal was reopened on the plaintiff's motion to amend the judgment; therefore, the judgment of dismissal was vacated and the plaintiff could move for leave to file an amended complaint. Also, the deficiencies found in the original complaint were held to be cured by the amended complaint. The fact that the plaintiff may not be able to prove the allegations of its amended complaint cannot preclude the plaintiff's right to have its day in court.

Memorandum

[Amended Complaint]

SIDNEY SUGARMAN, District Judge [In full text]: Judge Dimock on March 22, 1957 granted the defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint herein but he did not reserve to the plaintiff the right to plead over. A judgment of dismissal was thereupon entered. The plaintiff moved for an order "to amend the judgment entered herein on March 22, 1957 to provide that plaintiff may have leave to serve and file an amended complaint . . ." Judge Dimock granted that motion on April 11th, stating that the judgment was "reopened" so as to permit plaintiff to move for leave to file an amended complaint." Judge Dimock in citing Markert v. Swift & Co., 173 F. 2d 517 (2d Cir. 1949), studiously employed the word "reopened making particular reference to page 519 of the Markert decision, whereon is found the observation that "technically the judgment of dismissal should be reopened before an amendment to the complaint is granted." I construe Judge Dimock's disposition of the plaintiff's motion "to amend the judgment" by the employment of the words "judgment reopened" as a ruling by him that the judgment of dismissal entered on March 22nd was vacated and the parties were thus in the position that they were when he granted the motion to dismiss except that the road was kept open for the plaintiff "to move for leave to file an amended complaint."

The plaintiff has now done so and I am persuaded that the deficiencies found in the complaint dismissed by Judge Dimock have now been cured by the plaintiff by it proposed amended complaint.

The extended argument in the answering affidavit that the plaintiff will ultimately be unable to prove the allegations of the amended complaint, as evidenced by certain quotations from depositions and prior affidavits in this case, cannot preclude the plaintiff's right to have its day in court. That the defendant may ultimately prevail must remain for a trial of the issues. Accordingly, the instant motion by the plaintiff for leave to file an amended complaint, in the form of the proposed amended complaint submitted by it on this motion, is granted. Defendants will have twenty days from the date of this order to answer.

It is so ordered.

Massachusetts Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade—Indirect Methods of Price Violation—Trading Stamps and Cash Register Receipts—Discounts for Cash Payment.—In fair trade enforcement actions, the trial court found that a discount for the payment of cash is to insure or encourage prompt payment of accounts in order to enable the seller to have a minimum of expense in connection with credit expenses; that retail stores which extend credit have ascertained that this costs them 3 to 4 per cent; that trading stamps, redeemable cash register receipts or tapes, and other devices of similar nature are typical discounts for cash at the retail level; and that the issuance of trading stamps and redeemable cash register receipts or tapes is one form of institutional or store promotion device and that it does not have any economic effect upon the individual product brand sold by the retailer or its good will. The question of whether the issuance of such stamps and receipts with fair traded products constitutes a violation of the Massachusetts Fair Trade Act was reserved for determination by the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court.

Findings of Fact, Rulings of Law and Report of Case for the Consideration of the Supreme Judicial Court

[Stipulation]

REUBEN L. LURIE, Justice [In full text]: These cases were tried before me upon a stipulation of facts and oral testimony. The oral testimony was introduced in accordance with a reservation in the stipulation (page 1) "that other evidence may be offered by the parties and that all reasonable inferences consistent with the agreed facts may be drawn from said agreed facts and any evidence introduced."

[Definitions]

From this oral testimony I find the following facts relative to the nature of discounts in trade practices:

By Trade Discount is meant an adjustment of price made by the manufacturer and consisting of a specified percentage deducted from a catalogue trade price or other established price which is offered to all customers. This is distinguished from a Discount to the Trade, which is a discount to a particular class or group, such as a discount given to interior decorators by furniture dealers. This latter discount does not depend upon when or how payment is made.

By Quantity Discount is meant a discount when a customer buys or orders a certain quantity. This is allowed in order to encourage placement of large orders. It has no reference to how or when payment is made and is concerned only with the size of the order.

By Quota Discount is meant a discount allowed by a manufacturer or wholesaler to a dealer who must take a fixed amount of merchandise within a limited period in order to get the discount. This also has nothing to do with terms of payment.

A Discount for Payment of Cash is to insure or encourage prompt payment of accounts in order to enable the seller to have a minimum of expense in connection with credit departments, bookkeeping and accounting expenses. The reduction of bad debt losses is obvious.

[Trading Stamps]

The trading stamp, the redeemable cash register receipt or tapes, and other devices of similar nature, are typical discounts for cash at the retail level.

Cash discounts are also given in connection with credit terms. The usual terms, 2% off if bills are paid in 10 days, is a classic example.

Upon the testimony of a leading certified public accountant, I find as a further fact that retail stores which extend credit have ascertained that this costs them 3% to 4% in well managed establishments, and a higher percentage in others.

Where trading stamps are used, a term "breakage" describes the amount for which the customer receives no stamp. If, for example, an article is purchased for forty cents, the customer receives four stamps. If for thirty-five cents, he gets three stamps.

It is obvious that redeemable cash register receipts or tapes have no "breakage."

Massachusetts has long recognized the trading stamp as a discount for cash.

Sperry and Hutchinson v. Director, 307 Mass. 408, 415; Merchants Legal Stamps v. Murphy, 220 Mass. 281, 283; Commonwealth v. Sisson, 178 Mass. 578.

I find as fact that redeemable cash register receipts or tapes as described in the present cases are discounts for cash.

[Promotional Devices]

Upon the testimony of a leading professor of marketing and advertising, I find as further fact that there are two broad classifications of promotional devices in selling merchandise at the retail level. There is Product Promotion, which is any form of retail sales promotion related to and designed to sell a particular product. There is Institutional or Store Promotion, which is any form of retail sales promotion related to and designed to promote increased patronage at a given store or mercantile establishment. Institutional or store promotion is not limited to specific products but extends to all products offered by the store and is offered not for specific merchandise but for all purchases within the store. I find as further fact that the issuance of trading stamps and redeemable cash register receipts or tapes as issued by the defendants here is one form of institutional or store promotion and that it does not have any economic effect upon the individual product brand sold by the retailer, or its good will.

[Fair Trade Law Violation]

If, upon the stipulation and the facts as further found, the issuance of trading stamps and redeemable cash register receipts or tapes by defendants with plaintiff's products is in violation of the Fair Trade Law, I find that plaintiff is entitled to the injunctive relief prayed for in its bills of complaint; otherwise the bills are to be dismissed.

Plaintiff has orally waived its prayers for assessment of its damages.

As to whether, upon the stipulation and the facts as further found, the issuance of trading stamps and redeemable cash register receipts or tapes by defendants with plaintiff's products is in violation of the Fair Trade Law, so-called, General Laws (Ter. Ed.) c. 93, ss. 14A-14D, as amended, I make no ruling, reserving these cases for determination by the Supreme Judicial Court in accordance with General Laws (Ter. Ed.) c. 214, s. 31.

Delaware Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade—Enforcement of Fair Trade Prices—Permanent Injunction—Right To Seek Modification—Issuance of Trading Stamps with Fair Traded Products.—A retailer who had been permanently enjoined from selling a fair trader's products below their established prices was entitled to produce evidence with respect to his motions (1) To vacate the injunction on the ground that the fair trader had failed to take reasonable steps to prevent competitors of the retailer from giving trading stamps in connection with the sale of the fair trader's products or (2) to construe the injunction so as to permit him to offer trading stamps with his sale of the fair trader's products. The retailer was permitted to produce evidence which was not reasonably available at the time that the injunction issued. The fact that the retailer had been adjudged guilty of contempt of the injunction and the fact that the retailer did not raise the trading stamp issue at the time of the entry of the injunction did not preclude the retailer from making the above motions.

[Fair Trade Injunction]

SEITZ, Chancellor [In full text]: Subsequent to the entry of a permanent injunction restraining the defendant from violating plaintiff's fair trade program, the defendant filed two motions in the action. The first seeks to have the court vacate the existing permanent injunction on the ground that defendant's competitors are giving trading stamps in connection with the sale of plaintiff's products; that plaintiff is paying a portion of the cost of so advertising; that such action constitutes a concession in violation of the Act and amounts to a discount; that the injunction prohibits the defendant from giving similar discounts; that in consequence the injunction should be lifted because it renders defendant subject to an unwarranted competitive disadvantage.

Plaintiff's answer denies the essential allegations of defendant's motion and raises certain affirmative defenses.

Subsequently, defendant filed a second motion asking that the permanent injunction be construed to permit him to offer trading stamps and/or U. S. savings stamps in connection with his sale of plaintiff's fair traded products. Once again plaintiff filed an answer denying the essential allegations of the motion.

[Issues]

The parties subsequently stipulated that the motions and answers gave rise to three questions. Because the first two questions challenged defendant's right to obtain decisions on the merits of his applications, they agreed that the court should initially decide those questions. This then is the decision on the following two questions:

1. Having been adjudged guilty of contempt of the permanent injunction, is the defendant equitably entitled to move to have the same vacated, modified or construed, in accordance with the prayers of the motions filed herein?

2. Having failed to show that the practice of offering and giving trading stamps in connection with sales of the plaintiff's fair-traded products in Delaware did not exist prior to and at the date of the permanent injunction entered herein, is the defendant therefore estopped by the said permanent injunction to pray its vacation, modification or construction so as to permit such practice on the defendant's part?

Plaintiff recognizes the power of the Court, in the exercise of its sound discretion, to vacate, modify or construe a permanent injunction.

[Right to Seek Relief]

I first consider whether defendant is precluded from seeking the relief requested because he has been adjudged guilty of contempt.

Plaintiff narrates at length the numerous twists and turns of the defendant during the long period between the granting of the permanent injunction and the filing of the motions in question. They show many vigorous attempts by defendant to further his own interests. But, basically, plaintiff's defense is based on the fact that defendant has been found guilty of contempt arising out of a violation of the very permanent injunction which he here seeks to have vacated, modified or construed. See State v. Klein, (Del. Ch.) [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,406], 123 A. (2) 740, aff'd. Klein v. State and Gen. Electric, (opinion dated November 21, 1956) [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,541].

Is defendant to be forever foreclosed from seeking relief with respect to the permanent injunction because of his contempt? We commence the analysis with a realization that this is the type of permanent injunction which has a continuing effectiveness. In consequence, defendant must tread softly in his future actions or run the risk of a second contempt. It must be assumed, moreover, that the defendant has been appropriately punished for his contempt. There is nothing to suggest that the contempt is continuing. Indeed, the filing of these motions indicates a determination to pursue the proper course of conduct.

Plaintiff points out that defendant is the moving party and that he comes into court with unclean hands. In this connection plaintiff cites 2 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (5th ed.), § 398 for the proposition that a Court of Equity will shut its doors against a party seeking relief where it appears that such party has violated conscience, or good faith or other equitable principles in his prior conduct. There can be no quarrel with the wisdom and vitality of the principles announced by Pomeroy. They deal with a different stage of litigation. The repentant sinner, especially where he has been duly punished, is not unwelcome in equity. The religious connotation of many of the equitable principles mentioned by Pomeroy militates against a determination that a party in contempt who is duly punished, is forever an outcast in equity.

I conclude that, under the circumstances, the defendant's contempt does not bar him from seeking the relief requested in his motions.

[Estoppel]

I next consider plaintiff's contention that the defendant is estopped to raise the questions incorporated in his motion because he has failed to allege that the practice of offering and giving stamps did not exist as to plaintiff's products prior to and at the date of the permanent injunction. I pass over any pleading problem.

Plaintiff's argument goes like this: Since defendant does not allege to the contrary, it must be assumed that the practice of giving trading stamps in connection with the sale of plaintiff's products by defendant's competitors existed at and before the entry of the permanent injunction here involved; this being so, the defendant is not now entitled to relief with respect thereto because in order to obtain the relief here sought he must show that the practice commenced after the entry of the injunction. Otherwise stated, plaintiff claims that defendant is estopped to raise the questions because he could have done so at the time of the entry of the injunction. Plaintiff relies upon the analogy of estoppel by judgment.

The parties agree that the permanent injunction now outstanding against defendant in effect follows the provisions of the Delaware Fair Trade Act. The defendant is by that injunction prohibited from taking any action which would violate the Act. Thus, defendant is enjoined from giving stamps, if to do so would violate the Act. But the question of the legality of giving stamps under the Act has not been decided in Delaware and is not free from doubt. It would therefore seem clear, without regard to what other merchants may have done, that the defendant is entitled to be told for the future whether the giving of stamps would violate the injunction and thus place him in contempt once again. I do not view this as a frivolous request and plaintiff does not so suggest.

The defendant was presumably not interested in giving stamps at the time the injunction was issued and thus had no interest in raising the issue of its legality under the Act. I must now presume that it is of importance to him. It is therefore no answer to defendant's application for a construction of the injunction to say that defendant knew when the injunction issued that stamps were being given by his competitors in connection with the sale of plaintiff's fair traded products. This is so because defendant is entitled to know whether his contemplated acts will violate the Act and thus run afoul of the injunction.

I conclude that defendant is entitled to have the injunction and the Act construed.

[Evidence]

Defendant argues in effect that even if the Act and thus the injunction be construed to prohibit the giving of stamps, the plaintiff should not be permitted to enforce the injunction because plaintiff has not "policed" the marketing of its own products, and indeed has itself participated in the illegal activity. Plaintiff vigorously denies this.

If the Act prohibits stamp plans, in whole or in part, then evidence, such as that alleged by defendant, would be material. This is so because of plaintiff's duty to take reasonable steps to police its market and abide by the Act if it seeks to secure its benefits. Compare Lionel v. Klein, (Del. Ch.) [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,085], 114 A. (2) 652. However, as plaintiff points out, defendant should not now be permitted to use for this purpose evidence which was reasonably available to him when the injunction was issued. Otherwise, defendant could assert his defenses piecemeal.

To the extent, if any, that the Act prohibits the giving of stamps it, and therefore the injunction, will be enforced unless defendant can produce appropriate evidence, not reasonably available at the injunction date, tending to show that plaintiff has failed to take reasonable steps to police its market or has itself participated in activities which are contrary to the statute. Subject to the foregoing limitation the plaintiff's second objection to the defendant's motions is without merit.

[¶ 68,735] American Crystal Sugar Co. v. The Cuban-American Sugar Co.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civil No. 108-55. Filed June 6, 1957.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Acquisitions of Stock or Assets—Stock Acquisitions—Cane Sugar Refiner's Acquisition of Stock of Beet Sugar Refiner—Legality.—A holding company, which had a wholly-owned subsidiary engaged in the production of cane sugar, violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act by acquiring approximately 23 per cent of the voting stock of a refiner of beet sugar. The two refiners were in competition with each other in the sale of sugar in a ten-state area, and they constituted major competitive factors in the sale of sugar in the area. The holding company, in purchasing the stock, had the objective of bringing about a closer connection between the two refiners, it continued to hold to this objective and was in a financial position to continue buying such stock, and it continued to demand representation on the board of directors of the beet sugar refiner. Therefore, there was a reasonable probability that, unless enjoined, the holding company would continue to buy such stock with a view to the acquisition of control of the beet sugar refiner and the eventual merger or other joint operation of the refiners, and that the effect of such joint control would be substantially to lessen competition in the sale of sugar in the ten-state area. The company did not purchase the stock solely for investment, and it was using the stock to bring about a substantial lessening of competition. The beet sugar refiner was threatened with loss or damage, and, therefore, it was entitled to injunctive relief.

See Acquisitions of Stock or Assets, Vol. 1, ¶ 4206.

Acquisitions of Stock or Assets—Stock Acquisitions—Cane Sugar Refiner's Acquisition of Stock of Beet Sugar Refiner—Line of Commerce—Section of Country—Relevant Market.—In ruling that a holding company, which had a wholly-owned subsidiary engaged in the production of cane sugar, violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act by acquiring approximately 23 per cent of the voting stock of a refiner of beet sugar, the court found that the line of commerce in which both refiners were in competition was the sale of refined sugar, that the refiners marketed substantial quantities of sugar in a ten-state area, and that this contiguous area comprised a relevant market. The relevant product was refined sugar in view of evidence that there was a high degree of interchangeability between beet and cane sugar. They were sufficiently interchangeable to be classified within the same market for the purpose of determining the competitive effects of a merger between a beet and a cane sugar refiner.

See Acquisitions of Stock or Assets, Vol. 1, ¶ 4206.

Acquisitions of Stock or Assets—Stock Acquisitions—Cane Sugar Refiner's Acquisition of Stock of Beet Sugar Refiner—Purchase for Investment.—A holding company, which had a wholly-owned subsidiary engaged in the production of cane sugar, did not purchase approximately 23 per cent of the voting stock of a beet sugar refiner solely for investment. The holding company's stock purchases were designed to facilitate a closer relationship between the two refiners, either by common control or by merger. Almost all of the securities owned by the holding company related to its sugar subsidiaries and other affiliates, the beet sugar refiner's stock enjoyed a very thin market and did not possess the liquidity desirable in an ordinary investment, and the holding company's purchases represented a majority of the stock traded on the stock exchange.

See Acquisitions of Stock or Assets, Vol. 1, ¶ 4206.250.

Acquisitions of Stock or Assets—Stock Acquisitions—Cane Sugar Refiner's Acquisition of Stock of Beet Sugar Refiner—Substantial Lessening of Competition—Reasonable Probability.—In ruling that a holding company, which had a wholly-owned subsidiary engaged in the production of cane sugar, violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act by acquiring approximately 23 per cent of the stock of a beet sugar refiner, the court found that there was a reasonable probability that the company, unless enjoined from purchasing the beet sugar refiner's stock, would continue to buy such stock with a view to the acquisition of control of the refiner and the eventual merger or other joint operation of the refiners, and that the effect of this joint control would be substantially to lessen competition in the sale of refined sugar in a ten-state area. While the stock acquisitions had not resulted in a lessening of competition, the objective of the acquisitions was to bring about a merger or a closer association between the refiners. A determination as to whether a merger would result in substantially lessening competition necessitates a consideration of not merely the competition between the two refiners, but also the competitive situation of the industry. The record in the instant case established that common control of the beet and cane sugar refiners would not only extinguish competition between them but also would lessen competition in the sale of refined sugar in the ten-state area. To the extent that a union of the refiners would produce a stronger entity, it is true that the new company would be a greater rival of other sugar refiners; however, it does not follow that competition in the industry would thereby be increased. Also, the court noted that the evidence indicated that no new sugar refiners could be anticipated in the industry, which was tending toward increased concentration with no significant countervailing pressures.

See Acquisitions of Stock or Assets, Vol. 1, ¶ 4206.140, 4206.225, 4206.275.

Acquisitions of Stock or Assets—Stock Acquisitions Under 1950 Amendments to Section 7 of Clayton Act—Test of Legality.—Under Section 7 of the Clayton Act, as amended in 1950, the test of the legality of an acquisition is whether the effect of the acquisition of the whole or any part of the stock of another corporation may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce in any section of the country. No longer is the elimination of competition between the companies themselves the test. When the statute prohibited the acquisition of not merely the whole but also any part of the stock of another corporation, it obviously envisioned a situation where less than control of a competing corporation might be sufficient to be a violation of the section. In the instant action, a holding company, which had a wholly-owned subsidiary engaged in the production of cane sugar, acquired approximately 23 per cent of the voting stock of a beet sugar refiner; and the court noted that this is an amount of stock which in many situations would be deemed "working control." The amendments permit the courts to forestall activities in the beginning rather than waiting until events proceed to such a point that there is an actual violation of the Sherman Act. Thus, the section may be invoked when one company acquires any part of the stock of another company.

See Acquisitions of Stock or Assets, Vol. 1, ¶ 4206.140, 4206.210.

Acquisitions of Stock or Assets—Stock Acquisitions—Private Enforcement of Prohibition Against Acquisitions—Injunctive Relief—Threatened Loss or Damage—Divestiture.—Where a holding company, which had a wholly-owned subsidiary engaged in the production of cane sugar, was held to have violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act by acquiring approximately 23 per cent of the voting stock of a refiner of beet sugar, the court directed that a permanent injunction be issued enjoining the holding company from voting any shares of stock of the beet sugar refiner at any meeting of the beet sugar refiner's stockholders, from acquiring any representation on the board of directors of the refiner, and from acquiring additional stock of the refiner. The holding company was not required to divest itself of the stock in view of the fact that the issuance of the above injunction constituted an appropriate remedy so that divestiture was not necessary. The beet sugar refiner was threatened with loss or damage by reason of the holding company's unlawful acquisition of the stock. The beet sugar refiner would be subjected to antitrust actions brought by the Department of Justice; the disclosure of business plans of the beet sugar refiner to the holding company which would result if the holding company succeeded in obtaining representation on the refiner's board would be harmful, and the effectiveness of the refiner in representing the views of American beet sugar interests on a sugar council would be limited.

[Acquisition—Injunction Sought]

DAWSON, District Judge [In full text]: This is an action for a permanent injunction brought by the plaintiff under § 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. § 26, in which plaintiff alleges that it is threatened with loss or damage because of the alleged violation by defendant of § 7 of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C. § 18) in that defendant has acquired a substantial block of stock in the plaintiff corporation.

Plaintiff asks the Court to grant an injunction whereby defendant's officers, directors and agents, and all others acting in its behalf, will be: (a) enjoined from voting shares of stock at any meeting of plaintiff's stockholders, (b) enjoined from acquiring representation on plaintiff's board of directors, (c) enjoined from acquiring additional stock of plaintiff company and (d) required to divest themselves of plaintiff's stock in such amounts and under such terms and conditions as the Court may prescribe.

[Preliminary Injunction]

Immediately after filing the complaint, plaintiff moved for a preliminary injunction granting the same relief pendente lite, except for divesture. This motion was denied by Judge Cashin on the ground that the court was not convinced "of immediacy of harm to the plaintiff." [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,473], 143 F. Supp. 100 (S. D. N. Y. 1956).

[Issues]

Thereafter pretrial conferences were held pursuant to Rule 16 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and the issues to be tried were formulated as follows:

1. Are the parties in competition with each other in any line of commerce in any section of the country? If so, to what extent and in what section are they in competition?

2. Whether the effect of the acquisition of plaintiff's shares made by the defendant has been such as to substantially lessen competition in any line of commerce in any section of the country. Whether the effect of such acquisition or any acquisition to be made in the future may be substantially to lessen competition in any line of commerce in any section of the country.

3. If the defendant's acquisition of the plaintiff's stock is in violation of the antitrust laws, is the plaintiff threatened with loss or damage thereby?

4. Whether the defendant in purchasing the stock of the plaintiff purchased it solely for investment.

5. Whether the defendant in purchasing such stock and owning it is not using the same by voting or otherwise to bring about or attempting to bring about a substantial lessening of competition.

A trial having been held and concluded, the Court makes the following findings of fact and conclusions of law on the issues formulated in the pretrial order.

Issue I

Are the parties in competition which each other in any line of commerce in any section of the country? If so, to what extent and in what section are they in competition?

1. American Crystal Sugar Co. (hereinafter referred to as "Crystal") is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of New Jersey, with its principal office in Denver, Colorado. Plaintiff's principal business is the manufacture of sugar from sugar beets and the sale of such sugar. Plaintiff owns and operates ten factories: four in Minnesota, two in California and one each in Montana, Colorado, Nebraska and Iowa. The beets processed in such factories are purchased from growers in surrounding areas under contracts giving the grower a percentage of the selling price of the sugar produced; the sales of such sugar are made in interstate commerce and principally in the midwestern and southeastern parts of the United States.

2. The Cuban-American Sugar Co. (hereinafter referred to as "Cuban-American") is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of New Jersey, maintaining its principal office in New York, N. Y. It transacts business and is found within the Southern District of New York.

3. The defendant is a holding company and does not directly engage in the manufacture, sale or distribution of sugar. Defendant's wholly owned subsidiary, Colonial Sugars Company (hereinafter referred to as "Colonial") is a New Jersey corporation owning and operating a cane sugar refinery at Gramercy, Louisiana, which imports raw cane sugar from Cuba or obtains it from Puerto Rico, Hawaii, the Phillipine Islands and the State of Louisiana; and which markets the refined sugar in interstate commerce in the midwestern and southeastern parts of the United States.

4. Both plaintiff and defendant's wholly owned subsidiary, Colonial, are engaged in interstate commerce. In addition, both Crystal and Cuban-American are listed on the New York Stock Exchange.

5. The parties stipulated in the pretrial order that: "Plaintiff and defendant's wholly owned subsidiary, Colonial Sugars Company, are to some extent in competition in a line of commerce in certain parts of the country."

6. The line of commerce in which both plaintiff and Colonial are in competition is the sale of refined sugar.

7. Plaintiff and Colonial market substantial quantities of sugar in a ten state area in the neighborhood of the Mississippi River, sometimes referred to as the "River Territory." These states are Arkansas, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, Oklahoma and Wisconsin.

8. The average amount of sugar by hundredweight, and the average dollar value of sugar sold by Crystal and Colonial in the ten state area, during the years 1951 through 1956, and in the year 1956, and the percentage by physical volume of each to the total quantity of sugar sold in the area for the same period are approximately as follows:

Plaintiff	$24,000,000	2,607,000 cwt.	7.3%
Colonial	19,000,000	2,059,000 cwt.	5.9%
Total	$43,000,000	4,666,000 cwt.	13.2%

	1956
Plaintiff	$31,000,000	3,383,000 cwt.	8.8%
Colonial	18,000,000	1,939,000 cwt.	5.0%
Total	$49,000,000	5,322,000 cwt.	13.8%

9. Crystal and Colonial in the aggregate sell more sugar than any other marketer in the River Territory except Great Western Sugar Company, a beet processor.

10. In the year 1956 Crystal and Colonial sold in the States of Illinois, Iowa and Wisconsin approximately $26,900,000 of sugar, which constituted 13.1% of the total quantity of sugar sold in those three states in that area. Over the last six years the sales of these two companies in those three states aggregated approximately $22,700,000, which constituted about 13% of the sugar sold in those three states for that period.

11. The sales of sugar sold by Crystal and Colonial in the State of Iowa during the year 1956 aggregated approximately $4,500,000, being about 22% of the total sales of sugar sold in Iowa in that year; and in the preceding five years the aggregate sales of these two companies in the State of Iowa were approximately $4,900,000, constituting about 25% of the total sales of sugar sold in Iowa in that period.

12. Sales by Crystal and Colonial to customers in the ten state area who at any time during the period 1951 to 1955, inclusive, bought from both companies, were in the dollar amounts shown below, and such sales represented the indicated percentages of the total volume of sales of each of the two companies in the ten state area. Corresponding percentages in the States of Illinois, Iowa and Wisconsin are as follows:

	10-state area dollar volume	%	Ill.	Iowa	Wis.
Crystal	$34,830,658	30	53%	45%	33%
Colonial	$34,844,264	37	45%	70%	29%

13. Crystal made no sales in Arkansas until 1954, and no sales in Indiana, except a nominal amount, until 1953. Since starting to sell in those two states Crystal has been increasing its sales so that in 1955 and 1956 Crystal's sales were:

	1955	1956
Arkansas	$290,513	$379,146
Indiana	$392,606	$264,288

14. Colonial has been seeking to increase its customers in the ten state area over and above the present level of sales; and the testimony of C. W. Briggs, Vice President and General Sales Manager of Crystal, is that Crystal and Colonial are very competitive in the States of Iowa, Wisconsin and Illinois.*

15. During the past five years Crystal has increased its percentage share of the beet sugar sold in the River Territory from 13.8% to 20.4%; and plaintiff plans to increase its production of sugar in Nebraska, Colorado and Minnesota.

16. The list price of beet sugar is normally 20¢ per cwt. less than that of cane sugar, but a change in the price of one produces a prompt and corresponding change in the list price of the other. Except in rare instances industrial users buy beet and cane sugar on the basis of price.

17. As a general rule it is the beet sugar processors who are responsible for price reductions and the cane sugar refiners follow those price reductions. Sugar prices are lowest in that portion of the United States where the largest quantities of beet sugar are sold; over the years the price of cane sugar in the ten state area has been

* "Q. Now when you say that they are very competitive in these three states what do you mean, Mr. Briggs?

"A. I mean that they are making all efforts to obtain as much of the business as they can, and so are we.

"The Court: Do you cut prices sometimes to get business away from each other?

"The Witness: Your Honor, if necessary, we do."

(R. 410)

lower than in any other parts of the country, due to the large quantity of beet sugar sold in the area.

Conclusion

18. The parties are in competition with each other in the sale of sugar in the ten state area hereinabove defined, and they constitute major competitive factors in the sale of sugar in that area.

Issue II

Whether the effect of the acquisition of plaintiff's shares made by the defendant has been such as to substantially lessen competition in any line of commerce in any section of the country. Whether the effect of such acquisition or any acquisition to be made in the future may be substantially to lessen competition in any line of commerce in any section of the country.

1. Plaintiff is a publicly held corporation with 364,017 shares of common stock and 58,969 shares of preferred stock issued and outstanding. Both classes of stock have equal voting rights and both are listed on the New York Stock Exchange.

2. The defendant decided in 1948 or 1949 to get into the domestic beet sugar industry by buying into one of the three largest beet sugar companies, either The Great Western Sugar Company, Holly Sugar Corporation, or Crystal.

3. In 1951 defendant proposed to the executives of the plaintiff that plaintiff and defendant consider the possibility of a closer connection between themselves by merger or otherwise. Nothing came of this proposal.

4. In 1953 defendant attempted to work out a merger or closer connection with Holly Sugar Corporation but because of the capital structure of Holly and the provisions of its bank loan agreement no such arrangement could be worked out.

5. In January 1955 defendant began to purchase plaintiff's stock. By the end of that year 10% of Crystal's common stock had been purchased by Cuban-American. From time to time authorizations were made by the board of directors of Cuban-American to its officers to purchase up to a total of 100,000 shares of Crystal stock. At the time of trial the defendant owned 97,100 shares of stock of the plaintiff; this is about 23% of the voting stock of the plaintiff.

6. The Chairman of the Board of the defendant said that his ultimate objective in the purchase of the stock was to have "a joint business venture" between the two companies which might be accomplished by merger or common control, or otherwise. He stated that when the defendant started buying the stock of plaintiff company he had in mind that this might be a step toward this closer connection between the two companies.

7. Up to date defendant has not secured a majority of the stock of the plaintiff company and although the defendant has demanded representation on the board of the plaintiff company this demand has been rejected. There has been insufficient evidence to establish that defendant's present ownership of Crystal stock has substantially lessened competition in any line of commerce in any section of the country. Whether the effect of any acquisition to be made in the future may be substantially to lessen competition in any line of commerce in any section of the country depends, of course, upon how successful the defendant will be in securing voting control of the plaintiff company, either alone or in conjunction with other parties, or in securing representation on the board of directors of the plaintiff company.

8. Defendant's avowed objective is to purchase additional shares of stock of the plaintiff company and to endeavor to bring about this "closer connection" between the two companies, either by merger, or common control, or otherwise.

9. Defendant is close to being the largest single stockholder of the plaintiff at the present time. As of May 16, 1957 defendant owned about 23% of the plaintiff's voting stock. Defendant's Chairman of the Board, his immediate family and other persons likely to accept his advice, own more than another 11,900 shares of Crystal stock. The other stock of the plaintiff is rather widely scattered: its Chairman of the Board, together with his family and organizations in which he has some interest or with which he is associated, owns approximately 22% of Crystal's voting stock, while all other directors own less than another 1%. There do not appear to be any other significant holdings.

10. Defendant is in a financial condition to continue buying additional shares of plaintiff's stock.

Conclusion

11. Since the defendant, in purchasing stock of the plaintiff, had the objective of bringing about a closer connection between the two companies, whether by merger or otherwise, and since it appears clear that the defendant continues to hold to this objective and is in a position to continue buying stock, and continues to demand representation on the board of directors of the plaintiff, the Court concludes that there is a reasonable probability that unless enjoined defendant will continue to buy stock in plaintiff company with a view to the acquisition of control of plaintiff and the eventual merger or other joint operation of plaintiff and defendant, and the effect of this joint control would be substantially to lessen competition in a line of commerce—the sale of refined sugar—in a ten state area hereinabove defined.

Issue III

If the defendant's acquisition of plaintiff's stock is a violation of the anti-trust laws, is plaintiff threatened with loss or damage thereby?

1. A merger or common control of the plaintiff and the defendant companies would result in the lessening of competition between them and the effect would be to lessen competition in a line of commerce in a section of the country and therefore to violate the anti-trust laws.

2. It would appear clear that if defendant's acquisition of plaintiff's stock is a violation of the antitrust laws, plaintiff would be threatened with loss or damage thereby. If the acquisition of the stock and future acquisitions of the stock resulted in a merger or joint control of the two companies, in violation of the anti-trust laws, the parties would both be subject to anti-trust actions brought by the Department of Justice. Any such actions might well result in loss and expense to the plaintiff.

3. Plaintiff is taking steps to increase the amount of business which it does in certain states in the River Territory. Disclosure of any such plans and any similar future plans to any representative of a competitor would be harmful to plaintiff; and it may be assumed that such disclosure would become inevitable if defendant succeeded in getting control of plaintiff or in obtaining representation on the board of directors of the plaintiff.

4. For over twenty years federal legislation has established a limit on the United States marketings of the domestic beet sugar industry and all other sugar suppliers in the United States. To overcome this restriction each supplier has attempted over the years to increase its quota. Similarly, a conflict has arisen between the domestic beet sugar industry and those having an interest in the Cuban sugar industry since any increase in the quota of the former must come in large part from the quota of the latter. The defendant is a member of the United States-Cuban Sugar Council which, acting in close cooperation with the Cuban government and Cuban sugar mill owners, represents the Cuban sugar viewpoint. Until recent years this Council was in sharp and active conflict with the interests of the domestic beet sugar companies with respect to amendments to the Sugar Act of 1948. If plaintiff came under control of the defendant it would tend to limit the effectiveness of the plaintiff in representing the views of the American beet sugar interests.

Conclusion

5. If the defendant's acquisition of plaintiff's stock is a violation of the anti-trust laws, plaintiff is threatened with loss or damage thereby.

Issue IV

Whether the defendant in purchasing the stock of the plaintiff purchased it solely for investment.

1. At all times since the defendant began purchasing the stock of the plaintiff company the Chairman of the Board of the defendant company, and the principal stockholder therein, has recognized that the stock purchases were designed to facilitate a closer relationship between the two companies, either by common control or by merger. Therefore the purpose in acquiring the stock has not been "solely" for investment but rather with the aim of bringing about this closer relationship between the two companies.

2. Except for its Crystal stock, almost all the securities owned by Cuban-American relate to its sugar subsidiaries and other affiliates. Further negating investment is the fact that plaintiff's stock enjoys a very thin market and does not possess the liquidity desirable in an ordinary investment. Defendant's purchases of plaintiff's stock between the Fall of 1954 and the institution of this suit represent a majority of this stock traded in such period on the New York Stock Exchange.

Conclusion

3. The defendant in purchasing the stock of the plaintiff did not purchase it solely for investment.

Issue V

Whether the defendant in purchasing the stock of the plaintiff and owning it is not using the same, by voting or otherwise, to bring about or attempting to bring about a substantial lessening of competition.

1. Beginning in May 1955, defendant has repeatedly demanded representation on the board of directors of the plaintiff. Defendant now asserts that it is entitled to such representation by virtue of its stock holdings.

2. Defendant by means of its substantial stock holdings has succeeded in persuading officers of the plaintiff to furnish to it interim financial statements not generally made available to the public or other stockholders.

3. Defendant, at the last two annual meetings of stockholders of plaintiff, has failed to vote its shares for the election of directors on the asserted ground that it had not been consulted in connection with the make-up of the board, indicating that it expects to be consulted about the composition of the board of directors of plaintiff company. The Chairman of the board of directors of the defendant has stated to officers of the plaintiff company that when defendant increases its ownership from 100,000 to about 150,000 shares plaintiff will not have to inquire about defendant's intentions because by that time plaintiff will know those intentions; this was a statement of purpose as well as a covert threat designed to bring about an arrangement whereby the defendant would have representation on the board of directors of the plaintiff company. Any such representation would give the nominee of defendant an opportunity to be thoroughly acquainted with the business and plans of the plaintiff company and thereby to limit the effectiveness of the competition between them.

Conclusion

4. Defendant in purchasing stock of plaintiff company and owning it, is using it to bring about or attempting to bring about a substantial lessening of competition between the companies.

[Clayton Act, Sec. 7]

Section 7 of the Clayton Act as originally enacted, prohibited one corporation from acquiring the stock of another corporation where the effect may be substantially to lessen the competition between them.* The Act was amended on December 29, 1950 to prohibit a corporation from acquiring directly or indirectly "the whole or any part of the stock" of another corporation "where in any line of commerce in any section of the country" the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly.

The purpose of the amendment can be derived from the legislative history. Senate Report 1775, 81st Cong., 2d Sess. (1950), in commenting on the proposed amendment, states in part:

> "The Committee wishes to make it clear that the bill is not intended to resort to the Sherman Act test. The intent here, as in other parts of the Clayton Act, is to cope with monopolistic tendencies in their incipiency and well before they have attained such effects as would justify a Sherman Act proceeding." pp. 4-5.

[Test]

No longer is elimination of competition between the companies themselves the test. The standard now is whether the effect of the acquisition of the whole or "any part" of the stock of another corporation may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly "in any line of commerce in any section of the country." Therefore, to determine whether this section has been violated the Court must determine (1) the line of commerce, (2) the section of the country, and (3) whether, in the light of all the competitive factors in that line of commerce in that section of the country, the particular acquisition of stock may have the effect of materially lessening competition or tending to create a monopoly. In this case the line of commerce—the sale of refined sugar—has been identified; the section of the country—the ten state area—has been defined. The remaining question is whether the effect of the acquisition of stock "may be" substantially to lessen competition in that area.

* 38 Stat. 731 (1914).

 15 USCA § 18 (1951).

[Effect Upon Competition]

Certainly there has been no proof that defendant's acquisition of stock has so far resulted in a lessening of competition. The defendant so far has only a minority interest in the voting stock of the plaintiff company; it has been refused the privilege of naming even one director to the Board of the plaintiff. But admittedly the purchase so far of the stock is but one step in the program of the defendant. The ultimate objective of that program, as admitted by Mr. Keiser, is to bring about a merger between the corporations or a "closer association" between them.

When the statute prohibited the acquisition of not merely "the whole" but also "any part" of the stock of a competing corporation if the effect of such acquisition "may be" substantially to lessen competition, the statute obviously envisioned a situation where less than control of a competing corporation might be sufficient to be a violation of this section. This intent was expressed in the Reports of the Committees on the Judiciary which accompanied the bill when it was before Congress:

> "Acquisitions of stock or assets have a cumulative effect, and control of the market sufficient to constitute a violation of the Sherman Act may be achieved not in a single acquisition but as the result of a series of acquisitions. The bill is intended to permit intervention in such a cumulative process when the effect of an acquisition may be a significant reduction in the vigor of competition, even though this effect may not be so far-reaching as to amount to a combination in restraint of trade, create a monopoly, or constitute an attempt to monopolize." H. R. Rep. No. 1191, 81st Congress, 1st Sess. 8 (1949).

> "The words 'may be' have been in Section 7 of the Clayton Act since 1914. The concept of reasonable probability conveyed by these words is a necessary element in any statute which seeks to arrest restraints of trade in their incipiency and before they develop into fullfledged restraints violative of the Sherman Act. A requirement of certainty and actuality of injury to competition is incompatible with any effort to supplement the Sherman Act by reaching incipient restraint." S. Rep. No. 1775, 81st Cong., 2d Sess. 6 (1950).

[Legality of Merger]

We thus come to the question whether a merger or common control of these two large units in the sugar industry would, if consummated, be violative of the anti-trust laws; and, if so, whether the acquisitions of stock which have so far taken place have been steps toward such restraints on competition.

The natural consequence of the profit motive in a competitive society is to lead businessmen to explore the possibilities for greater profits which might be derived from an amalgamation of competitive units, with an anticipated reduction of costs, and the establishment of a position of leadership and power in an industry which will be relatively unaffected by the competitive rivalry of smaller firms. Economists have recognized that the vigor of a competitive system exerts a centripetal force which tends, for reasons of self-interest of the parties involved, to bring about an amalgamation or union of the competitive units. Against this centripetal force the anti-trust laws have interposed a centrifugal force designed to keep the units separate and distinct and to halt the tendency toward amalgamation and union which otherwise might exist, and which, if allowed to run an unrestrained course, might result in a cartelized industrial organization which would be destructive to that individual enterprise which is regarded by most Americans as a touchstone of progress.*

The 1950 amendments to Section 7 of the Clayton Act permit the courts to forestall such activities in limine rather than waiting until events proceed to such a point that there has been actual violation of the Sherman Act. It is because the Act was designed to reach an "incipient restraint" that it may be invoked when one company acquires "any part" of the stock of another company where the effect of such acquisition "may be" substantially to lessen competition.

* Compare the formulation enunciated by Judge L. Hand:

"Throughout the history of the statutes [the anti-trust laws] it has been constantly assumed that one of their purposes was to perpetuate and preserve, for its own sake and in spite of possible cost, an organization of industry in small units which can effectively compete with each other." United States v. Aluminum Co. of America [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,342], 148 F. 2d 416, 429 (2d Cir. 1945).

[The Industry]

A determination as to whether the merger of one company with another would result in substantially lessening competition in a particular section necessitates a consideration not merely of the competition between the two companies, but also the competitive situation of the industry.

Production, refining and distribution are the three coordinated operations involved in the complete marketing of sugar. There are two important sources of raw sugar: one is sugar cane, the other is sugar beets. While some sugar cane is grown in the South, by far the largest amount refined in the United States is imported from producing areas outside the continental United States. Foremost is Cuba, with other contributors being Puerto Rico, Hawaii and the Philippine Islands.[1] Sugar beets, on the other hand, are produced in the West and Far West.

Refining is the operation by which raw sugar is transformed into its familiar consumable form. While the manufacture of sugar can conveniently be broken down into two steps, sugar distribution is a more complicated process. Refiners themselves do not sell directly. Instead they sell through sugar brokers as agents.

While many levels of activity in the sugar industry can be identified, the conduct of sugar refiners in selling their product is here of prime relevance. To a large extent, the history of the refining industry over the last fifty years is reflected in litigation under the anti-trust laws.[2] Throughout this period there have been strong pressures prompting attempts at stabilizing the price of refined sugar. At first the dominant units in the industry attempted to form and maintain a private hegemony.[3] This effort eventually proved to be unsuccessful and was thereafter followed by an attempt at industry self-government.[4] Superimposing a broader solution to the problems of the whole industry, Congress initiated in 1934 a program of extensive regulation.[5] This legislation culminated in the Sugar Act of 1948 which is the basic statute controlling the whole industry.[6] In broad outline it provides that (1) for each year the Secretary of Agriculture set a limit on the amount of sugar which can be marketed; (2) this estimate of total consumption requirements is then allocated by the Secretary in accordance with statutory shares among domestic and various offshore producers; (3) the Secretary also assigns a production limit to each domestic grower and refiner; (4) an excise tax is collected from sugar refiners at the rate of approximately one-half cent for every pound marketed; (5) subsidies are paid to domestic beet and cane growers from the proceeds of this excise tax.

[Members of Industry]

Reference to the actual structure of the refined sugar industry indicates that three firms are now pre-eminent.[7] The American Sugar Refining Co. (hereinafter referred to as "American"), National Sugar Refining Co. (hereinafter referred to as "National"), and California and Hawaiian Sugar Refining Corp. (hereinafter referred to as "C & H") have long been leaders in the refining industry. Among the others are Crystal and Colonial which, on a national basis, rank eighth and eleventh, respectively, and which, if combined, would be about the fourth ranking unit in the whole industry. To some extent concentration in the industry has resulted from recent acquisitions instead of internal growth. Thus, in 1950 American's purchases made it the majority stockholder in Spreckels Sugar Company, an important California beet processor which as an independent had ranked about tenth on a national basis. In 1956 National purchased Godchaux, a prominent Louisiana refinery ranking about twelfth nationally. These acquisitions can in part be understood as resulting from the industry-wide quota system which places a heavy emphasis on historic production. Acquisition of an existing competitor provides an enterprise with an opportunity for growth which is not possible through construction of new productive facilities. Also, to the extent that Congressional legislation indicates that beet interests will be given an increasing share of the national market, it is advantageous for a cane company to diversify and stabilize its position in the industry through affiliation with a beet refiner. These reasons, along with certain anticipated operating economies, explain the attempt to affiliate Crystal with Cuban-American.

[Relevant Market Areas]

If accomplished, coordination of Colonial and Crystal would be of significance in a wide area. There are several relevant arenas in which to measure the resultant effect upon competition. The largest of these is the ten state River Territory. It is here that Colonial and Crystal concentrate their principal sales efforts. The evidence establishes that this contiguous area comprises a relevant market. Geographically the Mississippi River territory is bordered by cane refineries, including Colonial, at one end, and beet refineries, including Crystal, at the other. The demand for sugar in that area constitutes a natural locus of distribution for these refineries. For, to maximize profits sellers try to make heavy sales in the high return local area surrounding their plants, where freight is only a minor factor, and then dispose of the rest of their production by penetrating into more distant territories which are often the home areas of other competitors. Within this ten state territory there are other arenas of economic significance in which the effects on competition of a merger between Crystal and Colonial are of importance. The Illinois-Wisconsin-Iowa triangle is one of these markets. These markets are not mere legal abstractions but correspond to the commercial realities of the sugar industry. For the evidence establishes that the sales activity in each justifies an evaluation of the competitive factors of the merger in terms of its repercussions in these areas. Thus it is proper to take the ten state River Territory as one geographical market because the impact of freight rates on sugar prices separates this territory from adjoining areas. It is difficult for East and West Coast plants to participate in the ten state River Territory. Low cost transportation is not generally available from these locations.

On the other hand, Central Western beet as well as Gulf Coast cane refiners sell heavily in this area. The Gulf Coast cane refiners, such as Colonial, are able to penetrate into this area through the use of low cost transportation available in the form of barge and private truck shipments. Thus the ten state River Territory, being the natural selling area of Colonial and Crystal, is a proper section in which to determine the effects of a merger of these two refiners. Similar justifications exist for evaluating a merger in terms of its effects in the Illinois-Wisconsin-Iowa territory as Crystal's activity here has its greatest impact upon competition.

The evidence establishes that a union of Crystal and Colonial would produce a combination ranking second in the ten state River Territory. Great Western, the largest beet sugar refiner, would still rank first. In the three state Iowa-Wisconsin-Illinois territory a combination of Crystal and Colonial would have about the third largest share of the market.

[Relevant Product]

In terms of market the relevant product is refined sugar. The evidence clearly establishes the high degree of interchangeability between beet and cane sugar. To some extent cane sugar has a higher degree of consumer acceptance. The traditionally known brands are those of the dominant cane refineries. Thus National selling under the "Jack Frost" trade-mark and American using the "Domino" brand find a high degree of consumer acceptance. Similarly, for certain cane specialties, such as brown sugar, there are no beet counterparts. However, the evidence indicates that in those areas in which a determined effort has been made to market beet sugar consumer acceptance has been forthcoming and as a result cane has been partly displaced. The contention that cane and beet are different products rests primarily upon the historic difference in list prices. Traditionally beet lists for 20¢ per cwt. under cane. This differential originated in the infancy of beet sugar when its quality failed to match that of first-rate cane. However, at the present time there is no quality difference between the two. Certainly as far as most industrial buyers are concerned cane and beet are interchangeable and are purchased on the basis of price, with no differential being accorded to one over the other.* The evidence did indicate, however, that certain purchasers who buy for resale to consumers would specify to the broker that they wanted quotations on either beet or cane. This testimony merely reflects that both products are often stocked side by side in the same store, so that it is natural for a grocer to replenish his supply of one or the other as it is diminished. To establish that for consumer purposes cane and beet are not interchangeable, it would be necessary to show that within a given range of prices consumers would not shift from one to the other. In summary it can be concluded that cane and beet are sufficiently interchangeable to be classified within the same market for the purposes of determining the competitive effects of a merger between a beet and cane refiner.

[Price Competition]

In determining the effect on competition of a merger, the behavior of other competitors in the industry is of prime importance. As established at trial, the three large cane companies do not engage in active price competition. Generally they sell at a price higher than that of other cane or beet refiners and lower their price generally only in response to price reductions by those other sellers. In contrast to American, National and C & H, Crystal and Colonial, like Great Western, are hard sellers, undercutting price where necessary to get desirable business. And, in fact, they sometimes find themselves rivals for the same business. To this extent the interchangeability between cane and beet is mirrored in the rivalry between Colonial and Crystal. These two companies manifest strong expansionistic tendencies and appear to lie athwart each other to the extent that Colonial has evidenced increasing tendencies to further penetrate into Crystal's local selling area.

To gauge the economic realities it is necessary to realize that Crystal and Colonial are prime forces in the price conscious industrial sugar market. This is an arena in which the impact of the three major companies is not as great as their relative size would warrant. To the extent that American, National and C & H concentrate their efforts on consumer sales upon which their well accepted brands return larger profits they have a commensurately smaller influence on non-consumer sales. Thus, so far as industrial sales are concerned, a significant contribution to competitive conduct is made by the independent decisions of Colonial and Crystal. While neither alone can set prices, each has an incentive to engage in aggresive price activity and frequently does. Coordination of the sales activities of these two companies would reduce this incentive without producing countervailing stimuli to engage in hard competition.

[Contention—Increased Competition]

In urging that a merger of Crystal and Colonial would not raise a reasonable probability of a substantial lessening of competition, defendant asserts that competition will be increased because Crystal and Colonial combined will be better able to compete with American, National, C & H and Great Western. Thus it is contended that a boost to a competitor of the preeminent firms in an industry is pro tanto a benefit to competition. Examination of this contention reveals that the term "competition" is therein used in two different, if not in fact adverse, ways. For, to the extent that a union of Crystal and Colonial would produce a stronger entity, it is true that the new firm would be a greater rival of other sugar refiners. It does not follow, however, that competition in the industry

* Illuminating confirmation of the rivalry between cane and beet is provided by a trade publication's analysis of a reduction in sales by Godchaux, a leading cane refiner:

". . . competition from beet sugar early in the year, resulting in abandonment of the Chicago and West market to beet sugar and more intense competition among the Gulf refiners for the remaining Southern market [reduced sales]."

Farr, Manual of Sugar Companies 1955/56, p. 72 (1957), Plaintiff's Exhibit Q-3.

would thereby be increased.* "Competition" is a descriptive term indicating the extent to which certain desirable types of market behavior occur. A union of two units of economic significance fails to give rise to a presumption that competition is thereby promoted; in the abstract such a union is inimical to independent pricing policies, price flexibility and the dispersion of market power. It is relevant to note that the legislative history of the 1950 Celler-Kefauver amendment to § 7 of the Clayton Act indicates that Congress conceived that substantial additions to concentration would be, in general, detrimental to competition. Certainly to the extent that a reduction in the number of significant firms in an industry reduces the incentive to reap a short term advantage by independent action, economic analysis indicates that increased concentration is detrimental to competition. In any event, that Colonial and Crystal when merged would form a stronger competitor does not by itself thereby establish that competition in the industry would be intensified.

["New" Competition]

In forecasting the effect merger will have upon competition it is important to determine the opportunity for new firms to enter the industry. For if there is reasonable access to an industry amelioration of market structure conditions is possible. The evidence indicates that no new sugar refiners can be anticipated. In the last thirty years no new firms have entered the industry. Currently the quota system is a staunch barrier to new entry. Furthermore, there are positive signs of deterioration of market structure conditions. In recent years several refineries have been acquired by competitors. Thus the over-all picture is of an industry tending toward increased concentration with no significant countervailing pressures.

[Clayton Act Violation]

This record leads to the conclusion that common control of Colonial and Crystal would not only extinguish competition between them but also lessen competition in the sale of refined sugar in a ten state section. Thus, violation of § 7 of the Clayton Act has been established. The purchase by the defendant of Crystal stock was undertaken, as was frankly admitted by Mr. Keiser, as a step toward bringing about the common control of the two companies; and the defendant apparently still has this objective in mind. Defendant is in a financial position to continue to purchase additional shares of the plaintiff company and is today the largest single stockholder in plaintiff company. The amount of stock which it holds in plaintiff company is an amount which in many situations would be deemed "working control" and unless restrained it may be anticipated that defendant will pursue its program until it secures actual working control of the plaintiff company. The purchase by the defendant of stock of the plaintiff company was accomplished with an illegal objective in mind. The acquisition by one corporation of all or any part of the stock of another corporation, competitor or not, is within the reach of § 7 of the Clayton Act, ". . . whenever the reasonable likelihood appears that the acquisition will result in a restraint of commerce . . ." United States v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,723], 25 U. S. L. Week, 4343, 4345 (U. S. June 3, 1957).

Conclusion

[Injunction]

The Court directs that judgment shall be entered for the plaintiff as follows:

1. Adjudging that the defendant has violated § 7 of the Clayton Act.

2. That a permanent injunction be issued enjoining defendant from directly or indirectly voting any shares of stock of the plaintiff company which it may own or control, either directly or indirectly, at any meeting of plaintiff's stockholders, and from acquiring any direct or indirect representation on the board of directors of the plaintiff, and from acquiring additional stock of plaintiff.

[Divestiture]

So much of the complaint as seeks a decree directing the defendant to divest itself of stock of the plaintiff company which it may now own is not granted in view of the fact that issuance of the injunction as hereinabove directed constitutes an appropriate remedy so that divesture is not necessary.*

Appendix

The following tabulation (plaintiff's Exhibit YY) indicates rank and order of production upon a national basis in the sugar refining industry. Both parties have accepted the ranking shown, with counsel for Cuban-American expressing the view that Sucrest Sugar should not be listed independently but rather as part of the American Molasses Company which should appear close to tenth.

To the extent that assets appear as estimates they should be disregarded as the method by which such approximations were made was not established to be of sufficient reliability to merit acceptance.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Who May Bring Suit—Stockholders.—The sole stockholders of a "closed" corporation which owned and operated an automobile service station could not maintain a treble damage action since they were not injured in their business or property within the meaning of Section 4 of the Clayton Act. Where the business or property allegedly interfered with by practices forbidden by the antitrust laws is that of a corporation, the corporation alone, and not its stockholders, has a right of recovery, even though in an economic sense real harm may be sustained by the stockholders. While the business had been operated by the plaintiffs as individuals prior to the incorporation of the business, the operation of the business was carried on by the corporation after its incorporation by the plaintiffs. Also, the fact that the plaintiffs made purchases in their own name did not change the situation because corporations, especially small, closely held ones, frequently find that persons dealing with them require personal guaranties of controlling stockholders. Furthermore, the defendants were not estopped from asserting that they were dealing with a corporation.

Affirming a decision of the U. S. District Court, Eastern District of Louisiana, 1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,483.

Before BORAH, RIVES and BROWN, Circuit Judges.

[Stockholder's Suit Dismissed]

BROWN, Circuit Judge [In full text]: Because, to the District Court, it was uncontradicted that the operation of the service station was wholly that of the incorporated company M & M Corporation, and not that of its sole stockholders who sued as individual plaintiffs, the complaint for treble damages under the Anti-trust Acts jointly against The Texas Company, the Lessor-Seller and its local consignment distributor, was dismissed on summary judgment since the plaintiffs were not injured in their business or property whatever damage might the corporation have sustained.

We agree. And so doing, this makes it unnecessary to pass upon the contentions of The Texas Company that refusal to reconduct [1] the lease of its filling station for a third year, even though motivated, as alleged, as a reprisal for the plaintiffs' objecting to stocking and selling a particular manufacturer's line of TBA (tires, batteries and accessories) could not violate the Antitrust laws since a single manufacturer is entitled to select its customers or dealers as it alone sees fit,[2] or the contrary rival claim of plaintiffs that, in its operations, the lease was but a form of restrictive dealer restraints elsewhere condemned.[3]

[Clayton Act]

A claim for treble damages, as in this one, originates in Section 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 USCA 15. By it, this punitive sanction in enforcement of the statutory Antitrust policy, is limited to "any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws." A corporation is a "person," 15 USCA 12. And it is universal that where the business or property allegedly interfered with by forbidden practices is that being done and carried on by a corporation, it is that corporation alone, and not its stockholders [4] (few or many), officers, directors, creditors or licensors, who has a right of recovery, even though in an economic sense [5] real harm may well be sustained as the impact of such wrongful acts bring about reduced earnings, lower salaries, bonuses, injury to general business reputation, or diminution in the value of ownership.

[The Corporation]

And yet, on really undisputed facts, that is what Martens and Maurin sought below. To be sure, the lease and collateral sales contract with The Texas Company was with them as individuals and contained a condition forbidding assignment without consent (but which could not be unreasonably withheld). And, for our purposes, the operations from June 1, 1952 to September 15, 1952 may even be treated initially as a partnership activity. But on that date, under specific advice of competent Louisiana counsel who cautioned them that continued operations of this filling station and another business (garment factory) just recently acquired exposed them, and their personal estates, to unlimited and possibly spectacular liabilities, they created the Louisiana Corporation, M & M Corporation.

The articles of incorporation declaring the objects and purposes for which the corporation was "organized and the nature of the business to be carried on by it" specified with precision the purpose to operate a garment factory and, here important, "to own, lease or operate a General Service Station Business * * ." And, significantly, the registered office, required by Louisiana law, was described at "311 West Thomas Street, Hammond, Louisiana" which was, of course, the service station owned by The Texas Company and leased to the plaintiffs " * * primarily for the operation of a gasoline service station and the sale of automobile accessories * * *."

When it was set up, everything was done to put the operation under the corporation. The inventory and equipment which Martens and Maurin had acquired from the predecessor lessee of the station was transferred at the original cost (approximately $3000) and credited to Martens' capital account against his stock subscription. Subsequently each contributed further cash in payment of their outstanding stock subscriptions totaling $11,000. The books of account reflect that such capital contributions were used to purchase and pay for current inventories, supplies and equipment for the service station and to finance the accounts receivable from the station's customers. Detailed accounting records show that all income from operations comprising sales of gas, oil, lubrication, candy and drinks, accessories, grease and mechanics' labor was attributed to the corporation. And offsetting such corporate income was the cost of inventory of gas, oil, candy, lubricants and accessories sold, and operating expenses, equally detailed, comprising labor, office supplies, bad checks, cash shortage, repairs, advertising, taxes, dues, utilities, telephone, licenses, insurance, bad debts, and the like. Of acute significance was the fact that the salaries and compensation for Martens and Maurin in the actual operation and supervision of the station was likewise paid by and treated as a corporate obligation.

[Income Tax Returns]

And, to cap all of this, adopting a fiscal year coinciding with the lease period (June 1 to May 31), the corporation, by sworn federal income tax return for each of the two years signed by its President Maurin "under the penalties of perjury", answered the inquiry on Form 1120 "Principal business activity" as "service station" and "filling station" respectively, and then reported all of the income and expenses of the service station as that of the corporation. Included as scheduled deductions was the compensation of the officers Martens and Maurin, depreciation on equipment including that transferred at time of incorporation and, the operating expenses detailed above, comprehending such vital operational matters as bad debts and bad checks. All of this was expressly related back to June 1, 1952, so that the parties, and their corporation, treated it as a corporate activity from its inception.

Keyed to this, though filed on a calendar year basis, were the personal federal income tax returns of Martens and Maurin which reported as income to each of them the royalties, loss of sales, reduction in percentage rent, etc., the following are a few, out of many, cases: Harrison v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., D. C. Pa. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,568], 115 F. compensation paid, or payable, by the corporation and deducted by it as an expense. Consistent with this pattern, no partnership return of any kind was filed and in no personal return did either of them take, as deductions, any of the operating expenses, depreciation, etc., claimed by the corporation.

[Personal Dealings]

And if, in the face of this staggering record, there were any possibility of contrary inferences, they were categorically destroyed by the articulate, positive admissions of the parties themselves, each an officer and director, the most emphatic[6] was the president himself.

The fact that in bank accounts, insurance policies, purchase accounts or the like, the name "M & M Service Station" might have been used is of no importance and raised no questions of fact. The trade name was, first, almost identical with the corporate name. But, in any event, when in all decisive respect, such as the treatment of income, expenses, determination of profits, losses, return and payment of taxes, the business was in fact conducted as a corporate entity, inaccuracy or carelessness, inadvertent or purposeful, in the description in the name of the business would be quite immaterial. The sale and delivery of petroleum products by The Texas Company or its distributor consignee and the insistence (assumed in testing summary judgment) that, notwithstanding the intervening incorporation, purchases would have to be billed to the two as individuals who would remain personally liable for them, adds nothing. A corporation may purchase its goods direct or through an agent (Martens and Maurin). Corporations, especially small closely held ones, frequently find that persons dealing with them require personal guaranties of controlling stockholders. The important thing was—what was done with the petroleum products? The answer to that is absolute: M & M Corporation, a corporation, sold them.

[Basis of Suit]

That disposes also of the contention that since the lease forbade assignment without consent, and Texas Company had never given such consent, it cannot assert that the operation was by a corporation. The controversy of this lawsuit was not the property rights under the lease, or whether it could or could not be assigned, or the effect of a de facto assignment. The lawsuit was that in the operation of the service station practices and actions of the defendants, monopolistic in nature and in restraint of trade, wrongfully damaged the person operating the station. And who was that person—whether Martens and Maurin individually or the corporation—depended not on the technical legal right of that person to possession but on the actual fact of the operation which is here uncontradicted.

[Estoppel]

Nor can this be twisted into some sort of estoppel as claimed.[7] For if The Texas Company knew of the intervening incorporation (it denied this), it took no action which either stopped the plaintiffs' activities or led them to change positions. Whether The Texas Company did, or did not, know, or knowing did or did not object, the bald fact remains that the actual operation by M & M Corporation, as a corporation, went uninterruptedly along with neither representation, reliance nor detriment, the essention ingredients of estoppel, Sinclair Prairie

[6] Maurin testified on pre-trial discovery:

"Q. * * * Every cent that either you or Martens got out of that service station business in those two years went into the corporation as receipts and came out of the corporation either as salaries or additional salaries, didn't it. Answer yes or no and if you have to explain, alright. Do you understand the question?

"A. What you say is true for the simple reason it shows right here.

"Q. Alright—I just want you to admit it, that's all.

"A. I mean I can't deny it for the simple reason I filed my income tax on that basis.

"Q. And without taking you over the items, item by item, can we agree on the proposition that in both years of the operation of that service station under the Texas Company's lease, that all receipts of the station eventually went into the consolidated balance sheets of the corporation, and all withdrawals by you or Martens came out of the receipts of the corporation and were charged as corporate deductions on the tax return?

"A. It shows up that way in the final analysis.

"Q. You admit that?

"A. Yes, how could we deny it."

[Affirmed]

The claim of the corporation was not before the court. All that was there presented and ruled on was the claim of Martens and Maurin individually. Since it was the corporation, if anyone, who had a claim, there was on this crucial issue no dispute whatsoever on the fact and summary judgment was clearly right. *Bruce Construction Corp. v. In the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York. Civil Action No. 16151. Dated June 6, 1957.

Sherman Antitrust Act and Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Elements and Proof of Unlawful Conspiracy—Conspiracy Between Corporation and Its Employees—Sufficiency of Allegations.—A conspiracy under the Sherman Act was not pleaded where it was alleged that a corporation, two of its employees, and other persons not presently known conspired to control and restrict the sale of radar and microwave equipment. The corporation could not conspire with itself, and there was no allegation of a monopoly under Section 2 of the Sherman Act.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.400.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Refusal to Deal—Secondary Boycott—Sufficiency of Allegations.—An allegation of a counterclaim charging that a corporation (plaintiff) and others, pursuant to an illegal monopoly, threatened to withdraw the corporation's business from two of its suppliers unless they refrained from engaging in business transactions with the defendant will not be stricken. In the absence of any purpose to create or maintain a monopoly, the Sherman Act does not restrict the right of a manufacturer engaged in an entirely private business to freely exercise his own independent discretion as to the parties with whom he will deal. Since there was no factual allegation of a monopoly on the part of the plaintiff corporation, its right to continue to do business with the suppliers or to refrain therefrom was recognized by law; and its contingent exercise apparently did not constitute a Sherman Act violation. However, the defendant alleged what may be likened to a secondary boycott and, since the plaintiff corporation did possess a restricted form of monopoly (patent) which the law sanctions, it cannot be held on the basis of the pleadings that the defendant would not be able to demonstrate at trial an effort to extend that monopoly unlawfully.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.533, 2005.785.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Patents—Discrimination—Refusal to License Patents—Sufficiency of Allegations.—An allegation of a counterclaim charging that a corporation (plaintiff), together with one of its employees, in bad faith selectively discriminated against the defendant in the issuance of licenses under the corporation's patents was stricken. Assuming the allegation to mean that the defendant has unsuccessfully sought to obtain one or more patent licenses from the plaintiff corporation, the law, thus far, has not required the compulsory licensing of patents.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.630, 2013.

Price Discrimination—Sales at Unreasonably Low Prices—Submission of Bids to Federal Government—Right to Maintain Private Action Based on Violation of Section 3 of Robinson-Patman Act.—An allegation of a counterclaim charging that a corporation (plaintiff) submitted certain bids to the Signal Corps, in competition with the defendant, at prices which were less than the cost to manufacture the affected items was held not to be insufficient as a matter of law. The plaintiff had contended that a sale to the United States Government did not fall within the scope of the Robinson-Patman Act. Also, the court cited a decision holding that a private action for treble damages can be maintained for a violation of Section 3 of the Robinson-Patman Act.

See Price Discrimination, Vol. 1, ¶ 3551; Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9011.710.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Antitrust Law Violation as Defense—Sufficiency of Pleading—Public Injury.—An allegation that a corporation and two of its employees, in carrying out a conspiracy, entered into a scheme, the intent of which was to control and unduly restrict the sale of radar and microwave equipment in its flow through interstate commerce, whereby the public interest was inevitably prejudiced was held insufficient as a pleading and therefore it was stricken as a defense. The allegation was not an adequate pleading to support testimony on the subject of public injury. In connection with an alleged breach of the antitrust laws, a general allegation, containing the conclusions of the pleader, is not sufficient. Also, it was held that the defendant failed to allege facts to relate the conduct of which it complained to the issues involved in the plaintiff's action for patent infringement

[Counterclaim and Defense]

BYERS, District Judge [In full text]: This is a plaintiff's motion to dismiss a counterclaim and strike a defense proffered as part of a second amended answer. A previous pleading of the same general character was stricken by order of Judge Rayfiel dated March 12, 1957, with leave to file a second amended answer and counterclaim, reserving to the plaintiff the right to make an appropriate motion addressed thereto. In granting the leave sought by the defendant, the judge said:

> "However, a reading of the proposed counterclaim reveals that it is so indefinite, and so utterly lacking in specificity as to be defective on its face."

The present task is to compare the two pleadings to ascertain if the defects referred to have been remedied.

[Patent Infringement]

The action is for alleged infringement by defendants of five listed patents said to be owned by plaintiff. An injunction is sought, damages, and attorneys' fees.

The defenses are invalidity and, seemingly, noninfringement.

[Antitrust Counterclaim]

The asserted counterclaim alleges violation by plaintiff of the Sherman Act, Sec. 1, the Robinson-Patman Act, Sec. 13a; and the Clayton Act, Sec. 15.

The question for decision is whether the proposed pleading now alleges facts sufficient to enable it to survive the earlier ruling.

[Conspiracy Within Corporation]

The paragraphs involved are:

Thirty-first and Thirty-second: As to both, the original charge is of conspiracy in violation of the Sherman Act. The alleged conspirators were said to be the plaintiff by its officers, etc., "together with other persons not presently known to the corporate defendant."

The revised designation of conspirators is of the plaintiff "together with one S. C. Yeaton and one W. G. Newman as well as with other persons not presently known to the corporate defendant."

The Thirty-second paragraph is changed only to add the names of Yeaton and Newman; the activities of plaintiff and the persons named with others are said to comprise a plan to control and restrict the sale of radar and microwave equipment, to the prejudice of the public.

The insertion of the names of the two individuals might be thought to introduce a hitherto missing element in the proposed pleading, except for the conceded fact that they are employees of the plaintiff. It is true that they are not so designated in the proposed pleading, but are thus described in the defendants' brief on this motion (p. 2):

> "At this point, Sperry, (plaintiff) submitting to certain schemes of its employees, Yeaton & (sic) Newman, directed attempts to crush the new company (the corporate defendant)."

The question then is whether a conspiracy under the Sherman Act is pleaded; that is, whether Sperry could have conspired with itself.

The answer is necessarily in the negative. See Nelson etc. v. Motorola, etc. [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,386], 200 Fed. (2d) 911; Cott etc. v. Canada Dry etc. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,531], 146 Fed. Supp. 300.

In the latter case, as in this, there is no allegation of a monopoly under Sec. 2 of the Sherman Act. As to this paragraph, the motion is granted.

[Refusal to Deal]

Thirty-third: This paragraph has been recast so as to allege five instead of two forms of oppression on the part of the plaintiff. The original subd. (a) alleged that the plaintiff had exercised coercion upon its customers to force them from doing business with the defendant. The new subdivision has to do with Peerless Instrument Co. and Adolf Fischer said to have been in January, 1953 "substantial suppliers and sub-contractors of the plaintiff." (It is assumed that they were purchasers of plaintiff's products.)

That the former had "agreed to give financial and manufacturing assistance and orders for material to the defendant or defendant's successor." That "pursuant to the illegal monopoly, hereinbefore set forth, (as stated there is no allegation of monopoly), S. C. Yeaton, W. G. Newman and others, in concert with plaintiff, threatened to withdraw the business of plaintiff from the aforesaid Peerless Instrument Co. and Adolf Fischer unless the latter refrained from engaging in business transactions with the defendant or defendant's successor."

The added subd. (d) is that as a result the named enterprises "were restrained from doing business with the defendant and defendant's successor."

The foregoing is specific enough to avoid the criticism of the original pleading as quoted above. Whether it states a valid claim for relief remains to be considered.

The plaintiff is entitled to pick and choose its customers, not being a public service corporation. See Federal Trade Commission v. Raymond, etc., Co., 263 U. S. 565.

The court there says that no elements of monopoly or oppression were revealed in the record before it, and that (p. 573): "It is the right, 'long recognized,' of a trader engaged in an entirely private business, 'freely to exercise his own independent discretion as to parties with whom he will deal'" (citing many cases). The only statute there involved was the Trade Commission Act of September 26, 1914, 15 U. S. C. § 41.

The subject was more recently discussed in Lorain Journal v. U. S. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,957], 342 U. S. 143, a Sherman Act case in which a newspaper publisher was enjoined from conduct found to be intended to monopolize interstate commerce, by forcing its advertisers to boycott a competing radio station.

The opinion discusses the publisher's argument that it was entitled to refuse to accept advertising from anyone. The court recognizes the right, but says that the latter is a qualified one, not absolute or exempt from regulation (p. 155).

> "Its exercise as a purposeful means of monopolizing interstate commerce is prohibited by the Sherman Act. * * * 'In the absence of any purpose to create or maintain a monopoly, the act does not restrict the long recognized right of trader or manufacturer engaged in an entirely private business, freely to exercise his own independent discretion as to parties with whom he will deal'" (citing cases).

Since there is no factual allegation of a commercial monopoly on the part of Sperry, its right to continue to do business with Peerless or Fischer, or to refrain therefrom, is recognized by the law; and its contingent exercise seems not to have been held to constitute a violation of the Sherman Act.

Since however this motion is addressed to a pleading, and can in no wise involve conjectures as to what the proof at trial might or might not disclose, it seems proper to point out that the exercise of the right for which plaintiff contends, does not furnish an automatic answer to the present problem.

The defendant alleges what may be likened to a secondary boycott, the oppressive nature of which does not find ready tolerance in equity. Since the plaintiff does possess that restricted form of monopoly which the law sanctions, it cannot be now held that the defendant would not be able to demonstrate at the trial the kind of an effort to extend that monopoly which the admonition quoted from the Lorain case would quicken into action. It is understood of course that the monopoly there discussed was not one resting in the grant of letters patent. Perhaps the distinction renders the Lorain decision entirely remote in the legal sense, from this controversy.

I am unwilling however to decide that question on a motion addressed to the pleadings. Its ultimate disposition can wait upon whatever the evidence discloses at the trial.

As to subds. (a) to (d) inclusive of this paragraph of the counterclaim, the motion is denied.

[Patent Licensing]

Subd. (e) is new. It alleges that "Plaintiff, together with S. C. Yeaton, have in bad faith selectively discriminated against the corporate defendant in the issue of licenses or agreements for licenses under United States Letters Patent under their control or ownership."

This is assumed to mean that the defendants have unsuccessfully sought to obtain one or more patent licenses from the plaintiff. Thus far the law has not declared for compulsory licensing; nor does the defendants' brief argue to the contrary. See Hartford v. U. S. [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,319], 323 U. S. 386 at 432.

[Discrimination]

As to subd. (e) the motion is granted.

Thirty-fourth: This paragraph is a repetition of the earlier one bearing the same number. It invokes the Robinson-Patman Act, §§ 13a and 15, but without factual allegations. It is obviously deficient, and the motion is granted.

[Unreasonably Low Prices]

Thirty-fifth: This is a new paragraph and purports to supply facts, i.e., that in May, 1954 the plaintiff submitted certain bids to the Signal Corps (U. S. Army?) in competition with the defendant, at less than the cost to manufacture the affected items, in bad faith and "to lessen and diminish competition."

Seemingly the defendants rely upon that portion of Section 13a which reads in part:

> "It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, * * * to sell, or contract to sell, goods in any part of the United States at prices lower than those exacted by said person elsewhere in the United States for the purpose of destroying competition, or eliminating a competitor in such part of the United States; or, to sell, or contract to sell, goods at unreasonably low prices for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating a competitor."

[Sale to Government]

The plaintiff urges that a sale to the United States Government does not fall within the scope of the Robinson-Patman Act, but cites no cases in which it has been held that sales to the Government fall outside the above quoted provision; and the contrary to that position seems to be stated in A. J. Goodman etc. v. United Lacquer, etc. [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,355], 81 Fed. Supp. 890, from which the following quotation on page 893 is pertinent:

> "The complaint sets forth sufficient facts to show that plaintiff and defendant were competitors, since they were rivals for the business of selling lacquer to the State of New Hampshire. It describes the basic facts of an alleged course of conduct by defendant which might on further proof justify a finding that defendant acted for the purpose of eliminating plaintiff as a competitor. Nor can I hold, in the absence of further evidence, that the price of $1.75 was not unreasonably low. Consequently, I hold that on this point, the complaint properly alleges a violation of Sec. 13a."

A recent discussion of this statute will be found in Moore v. Mead's etc. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,906], 348 U. S. 115. This was a case in which the defendant was charged with having cut prices in intrastate transactions and driving competition out of business, and the court discusses the different prices quoted by the defendant in its intra as distinguished from its interstate business. In reversing a decree for the respondent, the court uses this language at page 120:

"It is, we think, clear that Congress by the Clayton Act and Robinson-Patman Act barred the use of interstate business to destroy local business, outlawing the price cutting employed by respondent."

[Right To Sue]

As to the right of a private litigant to recover damages under the quoted section, see Vance v. Safeway Stores, etc. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,538], 239 Fed. (2) 144 at 146.

Without unnecessarily prolonging this opinion, it will suffice to state that the defendants' amended pleading as to these challenged paragraphs cannot be held to be deficient as a matter of law, and consequently as to them the motion to dismiss as a counterclaim will be denied.

Thus far the effort has been made to deal with the proposed counterclaim as distinguished from the office of the pleading to set up defenses.

[Public Injury]

In that aspect of the proposed pleading, it is deficient in the following respects:

As to paragraph Thirty-second, the allegation is that the plaintiff and Yeaton and Newman "in the carrying out of the said conspiracy, have entered into a scheme or plan, the intent, tendency and inherent nature of which is to control and unduly restrict the sale of radar and microwave equipment in its flow through interstate commerce whereby the public interest is inevitably prejudiced."

The foregoing is not an adequate pleading to support testimony on the subject of public injury concerning which, in connection with an alleged breach of the antitrust laws, a general allegation is not sufficient. Cf. Wilder etc. v. Corn Products Co., 236 U. S. 165. That case holds that a pleading must allege facts which the above paragraph completely fails to do.

See also, Kinnear-Weed etc. v. Humble Oil etc. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,822], 214 Fed. (2) 891. That case states that a conclusion of the pleader is not sufficient in such matters.

The defendants rely upon certain language appearing in the opinion in Georgia-Pacific etc. v. United States Plywood etc., 139 Fed. Supp. 234. In that case an amendment was permitted of the same general nature, although stated in general language amounting to a conclusion; it was said that details might be secured by interrogatories and pre-trial discovery.

That view seems to be at variance with a decision rendered in the same court, Baim & Blank etc. v. Warren-Connelly etc. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,285], 19 F. R. D. 108, in which Judge Dawson states views on page 109 to which I entirely subscribe. See also, National etc. v. International General Electric etc., 15 F. R. D. 379.

The general subject of the essential allegations in such a pleading, was treated in the case of Glen Coal Company v. Dickinson Fuel Co., 72 Fed. (2) 885.

Tested by the foregoing, paragraph Thirty-second as proposed is insufficient as a pleading, and therefore the motion to strike it as a defense is granted.

Having in mind that the plaintiff has brought this cause for patent infringement, it is further to be observed that the proposed pleading fails to allege facts to relate the conduct of which the defendants complain, to the issues appropriate to an infringement suit. This subject was clearly expounded in Radio Corporation v. Hygrade Sylvania Corp. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,062], 10 Fed. Supp. 879.

The plaintiff calls attention to the extent to which this subject has received attention at the hands of the Department of Justice as shown in the "Report of the Attorney General's National Committee to Study the Anti-Trust Laws," (March 31, 1955), to which reference is hereby made.

[Summary]

It results from the foregoing that the plaintiff's motion with respect to the second amended answer and counterclaim, is granted, in that paragraphs Twenty-seventh to Thirty-seventh, inclusive, are stricken as a separate and distinct defense; paragraphs Thirty-third and Thirty-fifth will not be stricken as counterclaims; in all other respects, the plaintiff's motion is granted.

In the Superior Court of Pennsylvania. October Term, 1957. No. 79. Filed June 11, 1957.

Appeal from Decree of Court of Common Pleas of Lehigh County, at No. 10, June Term 1955. KOCH, Judge.

Pennsylvania Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade—Enforcement of Fair Trade Prices—Violation of Injunction—Amount of Fine—Defense of Non-Enforcement of Fair Trade Prices.—A decree imposing a $500 fine on a retailer which was found guilty of contempt of court for violating an injunction prohibiting it from selling or advertising a fair trader's products below their established fair trade prices was modified to the extent that it imposed a fine in excess of $100. The contempt was an indirect criminal contempt and not a civil contempt; therefore, under the laws of Pennsylvania, only a fine not exceeding $100 could be imposed. However, the lower court did not err in refusing to allow the retailer to introduce in evidence the defense that the fair trader was not enforcing its prices against the competitors of the retailer. The fact that the fair trader may not have been enforcing its prices with respect to other retailers would not constitute a defense to an indirect criminal contempt proceeding.

[Violation of Fair Trade Injunction]

RHODES, Presiding Judge. [In full text]: This is a contempt proceeding. Defendant, Hess Brothers, Inc., was adjudged guilty of a civil contempt by the Court of Common Pleas of Lehigh County, sitting in equity, for violation of an injunction prohibiting the sale of products of plaintiff, Casco Products Corporation, at prices less than the minimum retail prices stipulated in plaintiff's contracts. Defendant admits that it violated the injunction; but it complains that the fine imposed is excessive, and that the court below erred in refusing to allow the introduction of certain evidence as a defense.

A complaint in equity was filed by plaintiff on August 24, 1955, in which it was alleged that defendant was offering for sale and selling at resale plaintiff's trade-marked "Casco steam irons," at less than the price stipulated by plaintiff in its fair trade contracts and price lists, in violation of the Pennsylvania Fair Trade Act of June 5, 1935, P. L. 266, §§ 1, 2, as amended by the Act of June 12, 1941, P. L. 128, No. 66, § 1, 73 PS §§ 7, 8. Defendant made no answer to the complaint; on September 12, 1955, a consent decree was entered. Defendant was permanently enjoined from offering for sale or selling any irons bearing plaintiff's trade-mark, brand, or name "Casco" at prices less than those stipulated for the same in plaintiff's fair trade contracts and price lists supplemental thereto. Defendant was permitted to close out its existing stock of "Casco" products at less than the stipulated prices; the decree further provided that the injunction was to remain in effect against defendant unless amended or vacated.

On May 3, 1956, plaintiff filed a petition alleging that defendant had violated the consent decree; a rule was granted upon defendant to show cause why it should not be held in contempt of court. Defendant, in an answer, admitted the sale of plaintiff's product in violation of the consent decree, but advanced the defense that its action was justified because plaintiff was not enforcing its fair trade prices against defendant's competitors in the same trading area. At the hearing the court below refused to admit evidence of the purported defense. Thereafter the court filed its opinion in which it made the following finding of fact:

"2. That on May 10, 1956, the defendant advertised in its public display windows signs which contained this phraseology: 'Casco Steam Irons. This is what the manufacturer says we must sell them for:

$15.95. Which would you rather pay? We may go to jail—but while they last Hess's price is $10.00.' "

The court also found that on April 5, 1956, defendant had sold a Casco iron for $10.30, including tax, and that this iron was not one of the close-out items specifically excluded from the operation of the original injunction. Defendant was adjudged guilty of a civil contempt and fined $500. There was no provision whereby defendant could purge itself of the contempt.

[Contentions on Appeal]

Defendant's contentions on this appeal are that the contempt is an indirect criminal contempt within the scope of the Act of June 23, 1931, P. L. 925, § 1, 17 PS § 2047, and that the fine imposed exceeds the maximum of $100 fixed by section 2 of the Act, 17 PS § 2048. An unusual aspect of the matter before us is that plaintiff agrees with defendant that the contempt with which the latter is charged is an indirect criminal contempt. However, it is plaintiff's position that the Act of 1931, 17 PS § 2047, is not applicable to this case because defendant is a corporation and not a natural person.

[Types of Contempt]

There are three types of contempt: (1) Direct criminal contempt, (2) indirect criminal contempt, and (3) civil contempt. They differ with respect to their nature, the procedure to be followed, and the penalty which may be imposed. Direct criminal contempt is readily recognized because it occurs in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to interfere with its immediate business; and punishment may be summarily imposed. See Act of June 16, 1836, P. L. 784, §§ 23, 24, 17 PS §§ 2041, 2042. Indirect criminal contempt (Act of June 23, 1931, P. L. 925, §§ 1, 2, 17 PS §§ 2047, 2048) and civil contempt, however, are often difficult to distinguish. The misconduct giving rise to both occurs elsewhere than in the presence of the court, and consists of the violation of an order or decree of the court. For example, the violation of an injunction has been held to be a civil contempt (Knaus v. Knaus, 387 Pa. 370, 378, 127 A. 2d 669) and an indirect criminal contempt (Milk Control Commission v. McAllister Dairy Farms, Inc., 384 Pa. 459, 121 A. 2d 144). Whether the violation is a civil contempt or a criminal contempt depends upon the essential purpose of the proceeding. "The dominant purpose of a contempt proceeding determines whether it is civil or criminal. If the dominant purpose is to vindicate the dignity and authority of the court and to protect the interest of the general public, it is a proceeding for criminal contempt. But where the act of contempt complained of is the refusal to do or refrain from doing some act ordered or prohibited primarily for the benefit of a private party, proceedings to enforce compliance with the decree of the court are civil in nature. The purpose of a civil contempt proceeding is remedial, and judicial sanctions are employed (1) to coerce the defendant into compliance with the court's order, and (2) in some instances to compensate the complainant for losses sustained: United States v. United Mine Workers of America, 330 U. S. 258, 303 [67 S. Ct. 677, 91 L. Ed. 884]. A judgment in a civil contempt proceeding for the benefit of a private plaintiff will, of course, incidentally vindicate the authority of the court just as on the other hand a criminal contempt judgment, which is punitive, may often advance private interests. But the test is the dominant purpose, not the incidental result: Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Company, 221 U. S. 418, 441 [31 S. Ct. 492, 55 L. Ed. 797]." Knaus v. Knaus, supra, 387 Pa. 370, 376, 127 A. 2d 669, 672.

An examination of the instant proceeding before the court below clearly indicates that the contempt was an indirect criminal contempt and not a civil contempt. The sole purpose of the proceeding was to vindicate the authority of the court; there was neither a compensatory order nor a condition provided by which defendant could purge itself of the contempt to the benefit of plaintiff.

> "The primary objective or purpose of punishment for civil contempt is to coerce the defendant into compliance with the decree of the court and thereby provide the remedy ordered for the benefit of the plaintiff. Every order which imposes punishment for civil contempt should state the condition which upon fulfilment will result in the release of the defendant or the remission of the fine."

Knaus v. Knaus, supra, 387 Pa. 370, 379, 127 A. 2d 669, 673. The Fair Trade Act of 1935, as amended by the Act of 1941, 73 PS § 7, which was the basis of the violated injunction, has as its purpose the protection of the public as well as the producer of a trade-marked product. Bristol-Myers Com- pany v. Lit Brothers, Inc. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,227], 336 Pa. 81, 85, 6 A. 2d 843. While this public interest was not stressed by the court below, its presence cannot be ignored. Aside from this consideration it is apparent that throughout its opinion the court below has indicated that it was acting primarily to defend and assert its lawful authority and to impose a penalty for the violation.[1] There is no indication that the proceeding was essentially remedial for plaintiff. While it may incidentally follow that defendant will comply with the injunction to plaintiff's benefit, the dominant purpose of the contempt decree in this instance is punitive. The court below noted the defiant advertisement of defendant in disregarding the decree.[2]

[Excessiveness of Fine]

As this is an indirect criminal contempt proceeding for violation of an injunction, the question arises whether the fine imposed is excessive. The Act of June 23, 1931, P. L. 925, § 2, 17 PS § 2048, provides a fine in such instances "not exceeding one hundred dollars." Plaintiff argues that this limitation is not applicable because the Act by its terms is operative only where a "person" is charged with the contempt. The Statutory Construction Act of May 28, 1937, P. L. 1019, § 101, as amended, 46 PS § 601, provides: ". . . unless the context clearly indicates otherwise," . . . (84) 'Person,' includes a corporation, partnership and association, as well as a natural person." The definition found in the Statutory Construction Act cannot directly control the issue here, as section 101, 46 PS § 601, specifically provides that it is applicable only to legislation "hereafter enacted." However, it is declaratory of the interpretation given to the word "person" prior to its enactment. The word "person," as a general rule, is held to include corporations. 32 Words and Phrases, Person, p. 335. In Bushel v. The Commonwealth Insurance Company, 15 S. & R. 173, 177, our Supreme Court said: "When the word person is used in a statute, corporations as well as individuals are included." This is not without exception. "The word 'person,' when used in a statute, is ordinarily sufficiently comprehensive to include corporations, but in revenue acts they are not to be included unless such intent is clearly indicated." Lehigh & Wilkes-Barre Coal Co. v. Riley, 297 Pa. 522, 524, 147 A. 605, 606. See, also, Com. v. Bailey, Banks & Biddle Company, 20 Pa. Superior Ct. 210, 216; Appeal of Fox, 112 Pa. Superior Ct. 337, 350, 4 A. 149. We are of the opinion that the Act of 1931, 17 PS § 2047, is applicable to corporations as well as natural persons. It is comprehensive legislation on the subject of indirect criminal contempt for violation of an injunction or restraining order, and it does not appear from the context that the Legislature intended to exclude corporations.[3] See Penn Anthracite Mining Co. v. Anthracite Miners of Pennsylvania, 318 Pa. 401, 409, 411, 178 A. 291. The fine of $500 for the single act of contempt found by the court below is therefore excessive. Plaintiff cites Milk Control Commission v. McAllister Dairy Farms, Inc., supra, 384 Pa. 459, 121 A. 2d 144, as indicating the inapplicability of the limitation of the Act of 1931 to corporate defendants. That case neither holds nor infers the proposition advanced. There a corporate defendant was adjudged guilty of indirect criminal contempt for violation of an injunction; and apparently a fine of $2,000 was imposed by the court and affirmed by the Supreme Court. However, the possible excessiveness of the fine was not an issue in the case; and it further appears that there were a number of violations each of which would be a contempt and thus the basis for a separate fine. See Milk Control Commission v. McAllister Dairy Farms, Inc., supra, 384 Pa. 459, 462, 121 A. 2d 144. In the instant case only one violation is involved.

[1] For example, the court below states: "The defendant is asking this Court to overlook the purpose of a contempt proceeding. It is not fundamentally an issue between the plaintiff and defendant but its purpose is to vindicate the authority of the Court."

[2] As to this the court below said: "It is difficult to comprehend a more obvious flouting of an order of court and we can only conclude that this was a deliberate design to challenge the authority of this Court."

[3] Section 2 of the Act of June 23, 1931, P. L. 925, 17 PS § 2048, provides: "Punishment for a contempt specified in section one may be by fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding fifteen days in the jail of the county where the court is sitting, or both, in the discretion of the court."

"However, the fact that the penalty provided for the violation of a statute is a fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court, does not render it inapplicable to a corporation, and the same rule applies where the statute creating the offense provides for imprisonment if the fine imposed is not paid." 13 Am. Jur., Corporations, § 1137, p. 1061. See United States v. Union Supply Co., 215 U. S. 50, 30 S. Ct. 15, 54 L. Ed. 87, 88; and Annotation, 33 A. L. R. 1211.

[Defense]

Defendant's other contention is that the court erred in refusing to allow it to place in evidence the defense that plaintiff was not enforcing its fair trade prices against defendant's competitors. We cannot agree that this was error. The fact that plaintiff may not have been enforcing its fair trade prices with respect to other retailers would be no defense to this indirect criminal contempt proceeding.[4] The contempt was deliberate and obvious as defendant's advertising establishes; and the purpose of the present proceeding was punitive. If this had been a civil contempt proceeding for the primary benefit of plaintiff, it might have been proper to introduce this evidence in defense. See Act of June 5, 1935, P. L. 266, § 2, as amended, 73 PS § 8. But it is unrelated to the criminal contempt. Moreover, the injunction which was violated provided that it was to remain in effect until modified or vacated. When defendant became aware of facts indicating that competitors were continuing to sell plaintiff's products below the fair trade prices, defendant wrote to plaintiff stating that, unless plaintiff actively enforced the prices with uniformity, defendant would petition the court for vacation of the decree. Defendant eventually took such action. It is obvious that defendant clearly understood the injunction and its significance as well as the proper and available legal remedies for relief, which it failed to pursue in a timely manner. The violation is clear beyond a reasonable doubt. The fine is excessive although the conviction is proper.

[Decree Modified]

The decree of the court below is modified to the extent that it imposes a fine in excess of $100; as modified it is affirmed. Each party shall pay its own costs.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit. No. 12944. Filed June 6, 1957.

Petition to Review an Order of the Federal Trade Commission.

Federal Trade Commission and McCarran-Ferguson Acts

Unfair Practices—False Advertising of Insurance—Jurisdiction of Federal Trade Commission To Regulate Insurance Advertising—McCarran-Ferguson Act.—The Federal Trade Commission did not have jurisdiction to regulate the advertising practices of an insurance company in those states where the advertising of insurance was regulated by state law. Under the McCarran-Ferguson Act, jurisdiction over the business of insurance was granted to the Federal Trade Commission after June 30, 1948, only where the business was not regulated by state law. It was the purpose of the McCarran-Ferguson Act to deprive federal agencies of their newly acquired jurisdiction over the business of insurance in order to restore such jurisdiction to the states if they elected to assume such jurisdiction. A Federal Trade Commission cease and desist order, based on its ruling that it had full jurisdiction over the interstate sale of insurance by means of unfair and deceptive advertising practices, irrespective of whether a state had adopted a local law regulating such practices within its boundaries, was set aside and the case was remanded to the Commission for further proceedings.

See Unfair Practices, Vol. 2, ¶ 5081.362, 5201, 5201.171, 5201.317, 5201.581, 5301.

Setting aside a Federal Trade Commission cease and desist order in Dkt. 6311.

Before: SIMONS, Chief Judge, ALLEN and MILLER, Circuit Judges.

[Appeal]

MILLER, Circuit Judge. [In full text]: The petitioner seeks a review of an order of the Federal Trade Commission requiring the petitioner to cease and desist from engaging in acts and practices in the conduct of its insurance business found by the Commission to be unfair and deceptive, in violation of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended. Sect. 45(a)(1)(6) and (c), Title 15, U. S. Code.

[FTC Proceeding]

The complaint filed by the Commission alleged that the petitioner in the course of its interstate business of selling accident and health insurance and for the purpose of inducing purchases of such insurance policies, was making statements and representations concerning the benefits of said policies of insurance which were false and deceptive, were to the prejudice and injury of the public, and constituted unfair and deceptive acts and practices in commerce within the meaning of the Federal Trade Commission Act. Petitioner by its answer admitted that it had advertised its accident and health insurance policies as charged in the complaint, but denied that its advertising was false or misleading, or was to the prejudice and injury of the public, or that it had violated the Federal Trade Commission Act. The petitioner affirmatively alleged that the Commission was without jurisdiction over its interstate insurance business because of state statutes regulating unfair and deceptive acts or practices within the respective boundaries of the states, within the scope and meaning of the McCarran Act, Sections 1011-1015, Title 15, U. S. Code.

At the hearings which followed, the facts were shown to be as follows. Petitioner is a stock company incorporated under the laws of Michigan for the purpose of selling accident, health and all types of casualty insurance, with its principal office in Detroit, Michigan. It is licensed to sell such policies in all states of the United States, the District of Columbia and Hawaii, through resident agents located therein. It sells its insurance policies by solicitation from 350 to 400 direct, but independent, insurance agents throughout the nation, who operate under contract on commission only. Petitioner prepares and sends to these agents direct-mailing cards, advertising material and applications. The agents mail locally or distribute personally this material to likely prospects, secure leads thereby and then call and personally solicit the prospect. A small percent of direct mail advertising is sent by petitioner from its offices in Detroit to the public. 80% or more of petitioners' accident and health policies are issued by it from its home office after receipt, checking and consideration by it of the prospect's signed application which has been secured by the agent. Any policy issued by petitioner is forwarded to the agent for delivery to the insured. Premium notice forms are printed by the petitioner and furnished to the agents who mail them out locally. Premium collection is the agent's responsibility, only 5% or less being remitted directly to the petitioner in cases of unusual or temporary situations.

The Hearing Examiner held that four of the five categories of advertising set forth in the complaint were unfair and deceptive as alleged. He held that the Commission's overall interstate jurisdiction was limited to the four states and the District of Columbia which had no statute regulating unfair or deceptive acts or practices in the business of insurance within their respective boundaries. He also held that the Commission had jurisdiction in all states over the advertising practices of petitioner to the extent that its deceptive advertising material was disseminated by the petitioner by the use of the United States mails. He issued a Cease and Desist order to that effect.

Upon appeal, the Commission reversed the Examiner in part, holding by a three-to-two decision that it had full jurisdiction over the interstate sale of insurance by means of unfair and deceptive advertising practices, irrespective of whether the state had adopted a local law regulating such practices within its boundaries. Since, in our opinion, this case will be disposed of on the jurisdictional issue, it is unnecessary to discuss petitioner's contentions that its advertising was not false or misleading and that the proceeding and the issuance of a Cease and Desist order did not serve any public interest. The jurisdictional question involves the construction and application of the McCarran Act referred to above.

[McCarran Act]

The background giving rise to the McCarran Act is important.

In 1869, the Supreme Court upheld the validity of a Virginia statute which regulated foreign insurance companies, on the ground that the statute did not offend the Commerce Clause of the U. S. Constitution because "issuing a policy of insurance is not a transaction of commerce." Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 183. Thereafter, in similar cases, the Supreme Court consistently ruled that the business of insurance was not commerce. In New York Life Insurance Company v. Deer Lodge County, 231 U. S. 495, 503-504, 510, the Supreme Court, as late as 1913, held to this view, stating in its opinion in that case that "contracts of insurance are not commerce at all, neither state nor interstate." However, in 1944, the Supreme Court in United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Association [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,253], 322 U. S. 533, a case involving alleged violations of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, again considered the question and in a four-to-three decision, held that the business of insurance conducted across state lines was interstate commerce subject to regulation by Congress under the Commerce Clause.

The Supreme Court's decision was vigorously protested in the insurance field. The insurance companies, relying upon the court's previous rulings, had engaged in practices which were prohibited under the federal anti-trust laws but which were permitted under the laws and regulations of the various states. The states feared the loss of large revenues under their laws taxing insurance sold within the states, which, under the new ruling, might be held discriminatory of interstate commerce and, therefore, unconstitutional. As a result of this vigorous reaction to the decision, Congress passed the so-called McCarran Act in 1945. This Act provides in part as follows:

"Sec. 1. Congress declares that the continued regulation and taxation by the several States of the business of insurance is in the public interest, and that silence on the part of the Congress shall not be construed to impose any barrier to the regulation or taxation of such business by the several States.

"Sec. 2. (a) The business of insurance, and every person engaged therein, shall be subject to the laws of the several States which relate to the regulation or taxation of such business. (b) No Act of Congress shall be construed to invalidate, impair, or supersede any law enacted by any State for the purpose of regulating the business of insurance, or which imposes a fee or tax upon such business, unless such Act specifically relates to the business of insurance: Provided, That after January 1, 1948, the Act of July 2, 1890, as amended, known as the Sherman Act, and the Act of October 15, 1914, as amended, known as the Clayton Act, and the Act of September 26, 1914, known as the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended, shall be applicable to the business of insurance to the extent that such business is not regulated by State law.

"Sec. 3. (a) Until January 1, 1948, the Act of July 2, 1890, as amended, known as the Sherman Act, and the Act of October 15, 1914, as amended, known as the Clayton Act, and the Act of September 26, 1914, known as the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended, and the Act of June 19, 1936, known as the Robinson-Patman Anti-discrimination Act, shall not apply to the business of insurance or to acts in the conduct thereof. (b) Nothing contained in this Act shall render the said Sherman Act inapplicable to any agreement to boycott, coerce, or intimidate, or act of boycott, coercion, or intimidation.

"Sec. 4. Nothing contained in this Act shall be construed to affect in any manner the application to the business of insurance of the Act of July 5, 1935, as amended, known as the National Labor Relations Act, or the Act of June 25, 1938, as amended, known as the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, or the Act of June 5, 1920, known as the Merchant Marine Act, 1920."

[Contentions]

The petitioner contends that the purpose of the Act was generally to restore the insurance business to the situation existing prior to the decision in the South-Eastern Underwriters case, and that in states in which the insurance business was regulated by state law, such business was not subject to regulation by the Federal Trade Commission.

The Commission does not challenge the validity of any state statute regulating the business of insurance, nor the validity of the McCarran Act. It points out that state laws have no extra-territorial effect and cannot regulate the business of insurance beyond the borders of the particular state; that prior to the South-Eastern Underwriters Association case, the states were authorized to regulate the intrastate aspects of the insurance business, even though state regulation might affect interstate commerce in insurance; that following the decision in the South-Eastern Underwriters Association case there was a field of interstate business of insurance which the states could not regulate and which Congress did not intend to leave unregulated; that in enacting the McCarran Act, Congress intended only to authorize the states to exercise their police power in the same manner they had exercised it when the business of insurance was not considered to be commerce, and gave the states until January 1, 1948, later extended by statute to June 30, 1948, in which to define a reasonable area of state police power, beyond which they could not go; that after that date the Commission was authorized to regulate insurance on different grounds, namely, regulating the use of the interstate channels of commerce; and that the Federal and state laws in the field of insurance supplement and reinforce one another in order to provide full protection to the public.

[Scope of Federal Regulation]

The wording of the Act clearly indicates that, regardless of the ruling in the South-Eastern Underwriters Association case, Congress did not intend to take from the states the regulation of insurance within the state. Section 1 declares that "the continued regulation . . . by the several states of the business of insurance is in the public interest, . . ." (emphasis added). Section 2 states, "The business of insurance . . . shall be subject to the laws of the several states which relate to the regulation or taxation of such business." The real question is, to what extent, if any, did Congress provide for federal regulation in addition to state regulation.

The Act is equally clear, by the express wording of Section 3, that until January 1, 1948, subsequently extended by amendment to June 30, 1948, the business of insurance was not subject to the Federal Trade Commission Act or certain other federal regulatory acts. After January 1, 1948, according to Section 2 of the Act, the Federal Trade Commission Act and the Sherman and Clayton Acts were made "applicable to the business of insurance to the extent that such business is not regulated by state law." That is the only express grant of power to the Federal Trade Commission over the business of insurance contained in the Act. It is a grant expressly limited by its terms to insurance business which "is not regulated by state law." We do not find in those words the "clear and specific grant of jurisdiction" to the Federal Trade Commission which the Commission claims is given to it by the Act. On the contrary, we find the logical and reasonable conclusion from the two sections to be that jurisdiction over the business of insurance was granted to the Federal Trade Commission after January 1, 1948, only where the business was not regulated by state law.

There is some merit in the Commission's contention that since the decision in the South-Eastern Underwriters Association case there is a field of interstate insurance, outside the jurisdiction of the states, which should be subject to federal regulation. But it does not follow that it was the purpose of the McCarran Act to accomplish such result, desirable though it might be. Congress realized that by reason of the Supreme Court decision federal jurisdiction existed over the interstate business of insurance. The enactment of the McCarran Act was to correct that situation. It expressly prohibited the exercise of such jurisdiction for a period of approximately three years. After that period it made a restrictive grant of jurisdiction. In order to sustain the contention of the Commission, we must imply a broader grant of jurisdiction to the Commission after the three-year period than is contained in the express words of the Act. We do not believe that Congress would leave to implication such an important segment of the overall question of jurisdiction which it was dealing with, when it could easily have been provided for by express words. A construction of the Act does not sustain the contention.

Section 4 of the Act provides that nothing contained in the Act shall be construed to affect the application to the business of insurance of the National Labor Relations Act, the Fair Labor Standards Act or the Merchant Marine Act. If it was intended by the Act to retain in or give to the agencies of the Federal Government jurisdiction over insurance companies engaged in interstate commerce, irrespective of its regulation by state law, this section of the Act was unnecessary and meaningless since the acts referred to would be applicable by reason of the Supreme Court's decision without the provisions of Section 4.

It is probable that in the regulation of the business of insurance by both the federal and state governments there will develop a conflict of policies. The parties agree that in such event the federal regulation would control. If so, "the continued regulation and taxation by the several states," referred to in Section 1 of the Act as being in the public interest, would no longer exist.

The general purpose of restoring to the states the right to regulate the business of insurance as it existed prior to the 1944 decision was carried out by the moratorium provided by the Act until January 1, 1948. During the moratorium there was no jurisdiction over the business of insurance in the Commission. During that period the states which did not have such laws had the necessary time in which to pass regulatory legislation. The tie-in between the moratorium and the obvious invitation to enact regulatory legislation while it existed, both recognized the need of regulating the business of insurance and indicated an intention to permit the states to do it to the exclusion of the federal government if they elected to do so. It seems more logical to conclude that it was the purpose of the moratorium to deprive the federal agencies of their newly acquired jurisdiction over the business of insurance in order to restore such jurisdiction to the states if they elected to assume it, than to conclude that it was the purpose of the moratorium to deprive the agencies of their newly acquired jurisdiction for only a short period of time after which it would be given back to them regardless of what the states did in the meantime.

This construction of the Act is in accord with statements by Senator McCarran on the floor of the Senate on February 26 and 27, 1945, in connection with the Senate's consideration of the Conference Report on S. 340. Senator McCarran stated: "The moratorium would not be continued, but if in the meantime the states themselves had regulated the business of insurance, the Sherman and Clayton Acts and the other acts would not become effective." He also said: "During the 3-year moratorium the states may, if they see fit to do so, enact legislation for the purpose of regulation. If they do enact such legislation, to the extent that they regulate, they will have taken the business of insurance out from under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, the Clayton Act, and the other acts. If during the moratorium the states do not enact legislation for regulatory purposes, then on January 1, 1948, the Sherman Act, the Clayton Act, and the other acts will become immediately applicable." 91 Cong. Rec. 1442-1444.

[Supreme Court Decisions]

The Supreme Court, since the passage of the Act, has expressed similar views. In Prudential Insurance Co. v. Benjamin, 328 U. S., 408, 429-431, the court said: "Obviously Congress' purpose was broadly to give support to the existing and future state systems for regulating and taxing the business of insurance." It referred to the nationwide existence of state systems of regulation and taxation and to the great difference in scope and character of the regulations imposed and of the taxes exacted. It then said: "Congress could not have been unacquainted with these facts and its purpose was evidently to throw the whole weight of its power behind the state systems, notwithstanding these variations." Continuing with the discussion, it later said, ". . . it clearly put the full weight of its power behind existing and future state legislation to sustain it from any attack under the commerce clause to whatever extent this may be done with the force of that power behind it, subject only to the exceptions expressly provided for." In a later case, Maryland Casualty Co. v. Cushing, 347 U. S. 409-413, the court said: "Suffice it to say that even the most cursory reading of the legislative history of this enactment makes it clear that its exclusive purpose was to counteract any adverse effect that this court's decision in United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Association [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,253], 322 U. S. 533, might be found to have on state regulation of insurance." In Wilburn Boat Co. v. Fireman's Insurance Co., 348 U. S. 310, 319, the court in reviewing the enactment of the McCarran Act said: "Passage of the bill followed United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Assn., supra, holding that, despite the constitutional doctrine embodied in the Paul v. Virginia line of cases, Congress had power under the Constitution to regulate interstate insurance transactions. In the South-Eastern case, however, all the opinions had emphasized the historical fact that states had always been free to regulate insurance. The measure Congress passed shortly thereafter, known as the McCarran Act, was designed to assure that existing state power to regulate insurance would continue."

[Related Ruling]

In making its ruling the Commission followed its prior ruling in The American Hospital and Life Insurance Company case, which at that time had not been reviewed by the Court of Appeals. On April 9, 1957, following the argument on appeal and submission of the present case, the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit handed down its opinion on its review holding that the Commission was without jurisdiction in the matter and setting aside the Cease-and-Desist Order in that case. The American Hospital and Life Insurance Co. v. Federal Trade Commission [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,675], — F. (2d) — C. A. 5th. We agree with the ruling of the Court of Appeals in that case.

[FTC Lacks Jurisdiction]

We are of the opinion that the Federal Trade Commission was without jurisdiction to regulate the insurance business of the petitioner in those states where such business is regulated by state law. The order of the Commission is set aside and the case remanded to the Commission for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

In the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts. Civil Action No. 56-172-F. Dated May 28, 1957.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Elements and Proof of Unlawful Conspiracy—Conspiracy Between Corporation and Its Officers.—While it is generally true that the acts of the agents of a corporation in carrying out their duties of formulating the policy of the corporation do not constitute a conspiracy violative of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, a corporation and its principal officers and directors were not entitled to a summary judgment in an action charging that they engaged in a conspiracy in restraint of trade because the plaintiffs also asserted that the individual defendants conspired to form the defendant corporation as a mere instrumentality to take over a partnership business as a step in securing control of the market and imposing a restraint of trade for their individual benefit.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.400.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Restraint of Trade—Test of Reasonableness.—In an action charging that the operators of an auction market for the sale of fruits unlawfully imposed a five cent charge on dealers for each package purchased, the operators' motion for summary judgment on the ground that there has been no restraint of trade because statistics show that business has increased and that many of the dealers have prospered was denied. On the basis of the facts before the court, it could not be said whether because of other factors business may not have been profitable in spite of alleged restraints. Also, there were conflicting contentions as to whether or not the five cent charge affected the dealers' selling prices or their profits. It could not be held, as a matter of law, that any restraint imposed by the imposition of the charge was reasonable or unreasonable.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.315.

Monopolies—Monopolization—Relevant Market.—It could not be decided on motions for summary judgment whether or not defendants, which operated an auction market for the sale of citrus and deciduous fruits, had a monopoly since the limits of the relevant competitive market in which the defendants offered their services could not be determined.

The complaint referred to the market in New England for the sale of such fruits, but the plaintiffs also relied on a market limited to the sale of one particular brand of citrus fruits at auction in Boston, Massachusetts. The defendants claimed that the relevant market should be considered as including all sales of citrus fruits at less than carload lots. To decide the proper limits of the market, it must be determined whether alleged competitors offer a reasonable substitute for the services offered by the defendants.

See Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2540.10.

For the plaintiffs: Lawrence R. Cohen, Boston, Mass.; Joseph Aborn, Boston, Mass.; Sigmund Timberg, Washington, D. C.; Albert R. Mezoff, Boston, Mass.; Charles George, Boston, Mass.; and Arthur L. Brown, Boston, Mass.

For the defendants: John L. Saltonstall, Jr.; Richard Maguire; Thomas J. Carens; and I. J. Silverman; all of Boston, Mass.

Memorandum of Decision on Motions for Summary Judgment

[Antitrust Action]

FORD, District Judge [In full text]: This is an action under the antitrust laws to recover damages for alleged violations of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U. S. C. A. §§ 1 and 2. The plaintiffs are dealers in fruits and vegetables. The defendants who now remain in the case are H. Harris & Co., Inc., a Massachusetts corporation (hereinafter called Harris) and three individuals, Albertson, Pontefract and Giovino, who are the directors and principal stockholders of Harris, Pontefract being president of the corporation and Albertson its treasurer.

[Defendant's Business]

The business of Harris was conducted for many years by a partnership. In 1951 the present corporation was formed (originally under the name of Fruit Auction, Inc.) by a group of customers of the partnership, with the individual defendants as principal shareholders, which purchased the partnership assets and thereafter carried on the business.

Harris conducts an auction market for the sale of citrus and deciduous fruits by shippers or receivers who act as agents for the shippers. These sellers notify Harris of shipments of produce they wish to sell. Harris then arranges with the carriers for delivery to its warehouse, unloads the produce, displays sample packages, and prepares a catalogue of items offered for sale. All produce is sold at auction, subject to withdrawal by the seller if a minimum price fixed by the seller is not bid. Any person who meets certain credit qualifications may buy. Plaintiffs are all buyers at these auctions. Upon the sale of the produce Harris keeps a record of the transaction, pays the seller, supervises delivery to the buyers, and then bills the buyers and collects from them.

Harris charges each seller a commission based on a percentage of the selling price of its produce. It also collects from the buyer a charge of five cents for each individual package purchased, regardless of the size and contents of the package. It is this five cent charge of which plaintiffs complain.

[Summary Judgment]

Each side has moved here for summary judgment. While there is no complete agreement on the facts, it appears to be the contention of each party that on the basis of certain facts asserted by it and not controverted by the opposing parties, it is entitled to judgment as a matter of law and that other facts alleged by the opposing parties are immaterial to the decisive issues of the case.

On consideration of the contentions advanced by the parties, it does not appear that the issues here resolve themselves into clear cut questions of law which can be resolved on the basis of a selection of facts which are not controverted, but rather that the solution of each of the issues involved requires a further development of the factual background.

[Conspiracy Alleged]

The first charge of plaintiffs is that defendants have engaged in a combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade in violation of § 1 of the Act. Defendants argue that there can be no conspiracy among these defendants since they are a corporation and its principal officers and directors. It is generally true that the acts of the agents of a corporation in carrying out their duties of formulating the policy of the corporation do not constitute a conspiracy violative of § 1 of the Act. Nelson Radio & Supply Co. v. Motorola [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,386], 200 F. 2d 911, 914. But plaintiffs do not rely merely on this, but claim they can prove that in fact the individual defendants here conspired to form the defendant corporation as a mere instrumentality to take over the partnership business as a step in securing control of the market and imposing a restraint of trade for their individual benefit. The validity of this contention depends on proof of facts which defendants do not concede.

[Restraint of Trade]

Similarly defendants say there has been no restraint of trade because statistics show business has increased and many of the individual plaintiffs have prospered in recent years. This is not conclusive. On the facts now before the court it cannot be said whether because of other factors business may not have been profitable in spite of restraints. So also the conflicting contentions as to whether or not the five cent charge has affected the price at which plaintiffs can resell their fruit, or the profits realized by them on resale require a knowledge of more of the facts as to how their business is carried on. Defendants also argue that if there is any restraint of trade imposed, it is reasonable. But assuming that, as defendants claim, they must have the revenue produced by the five cent charge or its equivalent from some other source, the court has no facts on which to decide whether it would be possible for them to increase their charges to the shippers or whether it would be practicable to collect a charge from the buyers on another basis than that of a flat rate per package.

Plaintiffs' position is that the collection of any charge from the buyers is illegal. Again there are not enough facts before the court to enable it to make any such sweeping ruling at this stage of the proceedings, or to hold that, even if the charge is illegal, it creates a restraint of trade in violation of the Sherman Act.

[Monopolization]

The complaint further charges illegal monopolizing on the part of defendants in violation of § 2 of the Act. To decide whether defendants have a monopoly it must first be decided what the limits are of the relevant competitive market in which defendants offer their services. United States v. du Pont & Co. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,369], 351 U. S. 377, 394. The parties are not agreed on what the relevant market is. The complaint refers to the market in New England for the sale of citrus and deciduous fruit. Plaintiffs now seem to rely on a market limited to the sale of one particular brand of citrus fruits at auction in Boston. Defendants argue that the relevant market should be considered as including all sales of citrus fruits at less than carload lots, whether by auction or negotiated sale. To decide the proper limits of the market, it must be determined whether the alleged competitors offer a reasonable substitute for the services offered by defendants. United States v. du Pont, supra. There are no facts now before the court on which it can decide this question.

[Motions Denied]

The case, therefore, is not at least at the present stage of the proceedings a proper one for summary judgment and the motions of plaintiffs and defendants for summary judgment are denied without prejudice.

Combinations and Conspiracies Under State Laws—Practices—Refusal to Deal—Sufficiency of Counterclaim.—An order striking a counterclaim of a wholesaler-retailer of gas ranges charging that a manufacturer of gas ranges and three other wholesaler-retailers of gas ranges engaged in a conspiracy in which the manufacturer refused to sell its gas ranges to the wholesaler-retailer as insufficient was reversed on the ground that the manufacturer had not made a showing which would warrant a summary disposition of the counterclaim, although the wholesaler-retailer had made no counter showing and its charge of conspiracy had been given little elaboration and substantiation in the pleading. The counterclaim stated a cause of action.

Memoranda

[Antitrust Counterclaim]

[In full text]: It being conceded on the argument of this appeal that the defendant has paid the amount demanded in the complaint, the only remaining questions are whether the counterclaim is sufficient as a pleading and whether plaintiff is entitled to summary judgment dismissing the counterclaim. We find the counterclaim sufficient as a statement of a cause of action. We doubt that subdivision 3 of rule 113 of the Rules of Civil Practice was intended to encompass a cause of action for an alleged conspiracy in restraint of trade in violation of section 340 of the General Business Law or that such an action lends itself to a motion for summary judgment under rule 113. But without deciding that question, we conclude that plaintiff has not made a showing here which would warrant a summary disposition, despite the fact that defendant has made no counter showing and its charge of conspiracy is given little elaboration and substantiation in the pleading. Order unanimously modified so as to deny the motion to strike the counterclaim and to sever the counterclaim under section 262 of the Civil Practice Act and, as so modified, otherwise is affirmed, with costs to abide the event. [¶ 68,742] Opinion of the Attorney General of the State of Texas.

Addressed to Honorable W. S. Heatly, Jr., Chairman, State Affairs Committee, House of Representatives, Austin, Texas, from Will Wilson, Attorney General of Texas, by James W. Wilson, Assistant. Opinion No. WW-123. Dated May 16, 1957.

Texas Sales Limitation Bills

Sales Below Cost—Texas Sales Limitation Bills—Constitutionality.—A proposed Texas "Sales Limitation Act," which prohibits the sale, or the advertising or offering for sale, of any item of merchandise at less than cost when the seller limits, or reserves the right to limit, any purchaser to a quantity less than the entire supply of the item, would violate the requirements of due process of law provided in Article I, Section 19, of the Texas Constitution, and the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution, since it includes within its prohibition practices which are not reasonably related to its purpose of preventing unfair competition. While the purpose of the proposed act is the elimination of practices designed to lessen or destroy competition, the operative provisions of the act are not limited to situations where limited sales are made with an intent to injure competition or where that effect is achieved. Also, the proposed act, in proscribing sales below cost in limited quantities, prohibits legitimate competitive practices.

See Sales Below Cost, Vol. 2, ¶ 7111.

Re: Constitutionality of House Bill 25 and Senate Bill 177, known as the "Sales Limitation Act."

[In full text]: With respect to your request for an opinion on the constitutionality of the proposed "Sales Limitation Act" incorporated in House Bill 25 and Senate Bill 177, we submit the following:

In essence these identical Bills provide a definition of the "cost basis" of products sold in the course of wholesale and retail business and prohibit the sale, or the advertising or offering for sale, of any item of merchandise at less than cost when the seller limits, or reserves the right to limit, any purchaser to a quantity less than the entire supply of that item. A similar Act was held unconstitutional in San Antonio Retail Grocers v. Lafferty [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,588], 297 S. W. 2d 813 (Tex. Sup. Ct. 1957) on the grounds that by limiting its effect to grocery stores alone, it provided an unreasonable and arbitrary classification. The constitutional impediment found by the court in the Lafferty case has been removed in these Bills since they are applicable to all sales in the course of business. It is necessary, therefore, to consider in this opinion questions not reached in the Lafferty case.

[Purpose of Bills]

The purpose of the Bills as evidenced by the emergency clause is to "protect retailers and wholesalers, and the consuming public, against monopolistic practices designed to lessen or destroy competition in the ordinary purchase and sale of commodities." Such a purpose is a legitimate object for the exercise of the police power, and statutes prohibiting sales below cost when such sales are intended to injure competition or when they have that effect, have generally been held to be valid legislative methods for the accomplishment of this purpose. See cases collected in annotations at 118 A. L. R. 506 and 128 A. L. R. 1126.

[Injury to Competition]

The principal difficulty with the proposed Sales Limitation Act is that though its stated purpose is the elimination of practices "designed to lessen or destroy competition," the operative provisions are not limited to situations where limited sales are made with an intent to injure competition or where that effect is achieved. This intent or effect has been a part of every statute upheld by the courts of other jurisdictions, and in many cases the courts have considered such an element to be an essential ingredient to validity. See e. g. Blum v. Engleman [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,232], 190 Md. 109, 57 A. 2d 421 (1948); Associated Merchants v. Ormesher [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,209], 107 Mont. 530, 86 P. 2d 1031 (1939); Wholesale Tobacco Dealers Bureau v. National Candy & Tobacco Co. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,191], 11 Cal. 2d 634, 82 P. 2d 3 (1938). Only two cases have been found where the statute before the court did not require a wrongful intent or an injurious effect, and in each the statute was held to be violative of due process requirements for that reason. Commonwealth v. Zasloff [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,034], 338 Pa. 457, 13 A. 2d 67 (1940); State ex rel. Lief v. Packard-Baumgardner & Co. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,240], 123 N. J. L. 180, 8 A. 2d 291 (1939). The basis for this holding was well expressed by the Pennsylvania Supreme Court in the Zasloff case as follows:

> "If the Act confined itself to prohibiting sales below cost when intended to destroy competition, it would undoubtedly be valid, as has been held in various jurisdictions where such acts have been enacted with that qualification. (Citing cases) The opinions of the courts in those cases emphasized the fact that the statutes there under consideration made criminal only such sales as were designed for the suppression of competition or other predatory purposes, and the means employed by those statutes were therefore reasonably related to their objective. In New Jersey, on the other hand, where, as in Pennsylvania, this qualification was not in the act, the statute was declared unconstitutional. (Citing the Lief case) Price cutting in itself is not an evil; on the contrary, the more intense the competition the greater the likely advantage to the purchasing public. Indeed there is no reason why merchants should not make an absolute gift of merchandise to his customers if he desires to be benevolent or thereby to advertise his business. There are many other conceivable and wholly proper reasons which might induce him to make sales without profit, as, for example, a necessity of paying importunate creditors. It is only when the object of price cutting is sinister, — to destroy a competitor by suffering a temporary loss in order to gain an ultimate monopoly . . ., or to defraud the public by seducing them into the purchase of other goods at an exorbitant price—that the selling of goods at less than cost may constitute an economic or social evil. The Pennsylvania Act, therefore, is arbitrary, and the means which it employs are grossly out of proportion to the object which it seeks to attain."

We believe this reasoning to be applicable to the proposed Sales Limitation Act unless other features of the Bills are effective to exclude such lawful practices from their effect.

[Scope of Bills]

The proposed Act differs from the statutes before the courts in the above cases principally in that those statutes prohibited all sales below cost while in the instant Bills only sales below cost in limited quantities are within the reach of the statute. It has been argued that such a provision intensifies the invalidity of the statute rather than aiding its validity by providing an unreasonable classification in not prohibiting unlimited sales intended to destroy competition. It is, of course, quite possible that a powerful seller might make unlimited sales of his product below cost until his competitors are forced out of business, but it is believed that this argument overlooks the fact that it is not required that the Legislature prohibit all forms of unfair competition in order to reach specific abuses it considers to be threatening. As stated by the Supreme Court in Central Lumber Co. v. South Dakota, 226 U. S. 157, 33 S. Ct. 65 (1912):

> "If the Legislature shares the now prevailing belief as to what is public policy, and finds that a particular instrument of trade war is being used against that policy in certain cases, it may direct its laws against what it deems the evil as it actually exists without covering the whole field of possible abuses, and it may do so none the less that the forbidden act does not differ in kind from those that are allowed."

The problem, therefore, is not whether some classes of unfair competitors are excluded from the Bills, but whether the device of prohibiting only limited below cost sales removes from the statutory ambit those practices innocent of destructive intent or effect on competition referred to in the Zasloff case. No case has been found where this feature has been considered by a court, but it is apparent that, by removing unlimited sales from the Bill's prohibition, unquestioned fair methods of competition, such as sales below cost to clear inventories of slow-moving, damaged, imperfect or short stock, or to liquidate a business, are removed from the scope of the Bill.

However, it is also apparent that other legitimate competitive practices are still prohibited by the proposed Act. For instance, an attempt to attract business through "loss leaders" would seeem to be as legitimate a competitive device as advertising, credit services, attractive surroundings and the like where there is no attempt thereby to monopolize the market. Furthermore, sales below cost made in good faith to meet competition do not appear to be adequately excluded by the proposed Act. Section 7 which purports to exclude such sales is ineffective for this purpose since it requires a business man to determine at his peril that the competing price is at cost or above before lowering his price to meet the competing price without providing any method whereby he can ascertain whether the competing price is lawful. See State ex rel. Lief v. Packard-Baumgardner & Co., supra. We find no feature in the Act which would save such below cost sales which are not intended to injure competition from its effect, and we must conclude that the Bill as written is unconstitutional as violative of due process of law. Tex. Const. Art. I, Section 19; U. S. Const. 14th Amend. In view of our holding, it is unnecessary to consider other constitutional objections which have been raised against the Bill.

Summary

The proposed Sales Limitation Act incorporated in House Bill 25 and Senate Bill 177 violates the requirements of due process of law provided in Article I, Section 19, of the Texas Constitution, and the 14th Amendment to the U. S. Constitution, since it includes within its prohibition practices which are not reasonably related to its purpose of preventing unfair competition.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Elements Which Must Be Established—Antitrust Violation and Injury to Plaintiff.—An owner of patents relating to a rotary drill bit for drilling oil and gas wells did not have a cause of action against an oil refiner for violation of the antitrust laws since the patent owner failed to prove (1) a violation by the refiner of some specific provision of the antitrust laws with consequent injury to the public and (2) injury to its business or property by reason of such a violation. The patent owner had contended, among other things, that its method of drilling, as disclosed in its patents, was wrongfully appropriated by the refiner, was monopolized or attempted to be monopolized by the refiner, and was used by the refiner to restrain trade.

Findings of Fact

[Plaintiff]

Cecil, District Judge [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: 1. Plaintiff, Kinnear-Weed Corporation, is a Texas corporation having its principal office and place of business in Beaumont, Texas. Plaintiff is the owner of U. S. Patents Nos. 2,380,112 and Re. 23,416, both issued to C. W. Kinnear, the subject matter of which is a rotary drill bit for drilling oil and gas wells. These patents constitute Plaintiff's principal assets and Plaintiff's only business is the exploitation of these patents.

[Defendant]

2. Defendant, Humble Oil & Refining Company, is a Texas corporation having its principal office and place of business in Houston, Texas. Defendant is engaged in the business of producing, refining and marketing petroleum and petroleum products. Defendant is not in the drill bit business, but does use drill bits in the drilling of its oil and gas wells. Defendant has an office and does business in the Eastern District of Texas.

[Causes of Action]

3. Plaintiff charges Defendant with breach of a confidential relationship, unfair competition, patent infringement and violation of the Federal and Texas anti-trust laws. All of these claims involve, and are inextricably connected with, the above-mentioned two Kinnear patents, Nos. 2,380,112 and Re. 23,416.

4. In addition to this suit, Plaintiff has sued Hughes Tool Company, Reed Roller Bit Company and Hunt Tool Company, all of Houston, Texas, for infringement of the same two patents, as well as for violation of confidential relationship and unfair competition. These suits are pending the United States District Court for the Southern District of Texas, Houston Division.

11. Plaintiff contends that C. W. Kinnear conceived the idea of positioning the water courses in the bit body so that the streams of drilling fluid discharged therefrom would miss the cutting elements and strike directly on the bottom of the hole in what Plaintiff refers to as "a concentrated stream" or a "direct blast." Plaintiff further contends that this concept is disclosed and claimed in the two patents in suit, was disclosed by C. W. Kinnear to Defendant in confidence prior to the issuance of either of the patents in suit, was utilized by Defendant to its own advantage in the drilling of its wells, was disclosed by Defendant to others in violation of such confidence, was wrongfully appropriated and publicized by Defendant as Defendant's own development and was monopolized or attempted to be monopolized, and was used by Defendant to restrain trade, in violation of the antitrust laws.

12. Defendant denies that C. W. Kinnear invented the concept of positioning the water courses in a bit so that the drilling fluid would miss the cutters and strike directly on the bottom of the hole, denies that the patents in suit disclose or claim any such concept, denies that C. W. Kinnear disclosed such concept (or any other information) to Defendant in confidence, denies that Defendant utilized, disclosed to others or published any information obtained by it from C. W. Kinnear, denies that it has competed unfairly with C. W. Kinnear, or his successors in interest, including Plaintiff, denies that the patents in suit are valid or have been infringed by Defendant, denies that Defendant has violated any of the antitrust laws and denies that Kinnear, or his successors in interest, including Plaintiff have been injured by any act of Defendant.

[Patent Application]

13. On January 2, 1942, C. W. Kinnear filed an application in the U. S. Patent Office entitled "Drill", disclosing a combination bit having a pair of disk-shaped outer-roller cutters mounted on the opposite side faces of a fishtail blade, with two pairs of water courses through the bit body, one pair positioned to discharge drilling fluid directly onto the tops of the outer-roller cutters and the other pair positioned to discharged drilling fluid onto and wash down the opposite side faces of the fish-tail blade and thence onto the bottom of the hole. The applicant asserted claims to the entire combination bit and to the structure of the outer-roller cutter per se. The Patent Office rejected the claims to the entire combination bit, but allowed two claims covering the roller cutter per se, and U. S. Patent No. 2,380,112 was issued to C. W. Kinnear on July 10, 1945 containing these two claims.

[Reissue]

14. On June 7, 1946, Kinnear applied for a reissue of the patent on the ground that, as the result of inadvertence, accident or mistake, the original patent did not fully set forth and claim his true invention. During the prosecution of the reissue application, the two claims of the original patent covering the roller cutter per se were rejected by the Patent Office and were abandoned by the applicant, but eventually the patent was reissued on October 16, 1951, as Re. 23,416, with 18 claims (Nos. 3-20). The two claims of original Patent No. 2,380,112 form no part of Re. 23,416.

[Transactions Between Parties]

15. In the Spring of 1945, after receiving notice from the Patent Office that the two claims covering the roller cutter per se had been allowed on his original application, Kinnear called on Douglas Ragland, an employee of Defendant. Kinnear explained his bit to Ragland and told Ragland the status of his patent application. This was the first contact between Kinnear and Defendant concerning or relating to the subject matter of this suit. The purpose of Kinnear's visit was to induce Defendant either to finance the manufacture of Kinnear's bit or to purchase and test some of his bits. Ragland explained to Kinnear that, as a matter of policy, Defendant was not interested in financing manufacture of the bit, but that Defendant would be willing to test the bit. Thereafter in 1945 and 1946, Defendant purchased approximately 52 bits from Kinnear. These bits were made in accordance with Patent No. 2,380,112, substantially as shown by the wooden model, Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 9. Defendant used approximately 22 of these bits in tests and junked the remaining 30, after concluding that the Kinnear bit was less satisfactory than competitive bits.

16. At no time did Defendant request Kinnear to furnish any information to Defendant. All information given by Kinnear to Defendant was volunteered by Kinnear in his efforts to interest Defendant in financing the manufacture of, or in purchasing, his bits. Kinnear did not ask Defendant to keep any information confidential and Defendant did not promise or agree to keep confidential any information received by it from Kinnear.

17. The information disclosed by Kinnear to Defendant consisted of the contents of Kinnear's original patent application (including the notice of allowance of the two claims on the roller cutter per se), some machine shop drawings showing the actual dimensions of his bit and his wooden model, Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 9. At no time did Kinnear furnish to Defendant any information concerning his invention which was not contained in the patent application or shown by the drawings and/or the wooden model.

18. The drawings and the wooden model which Kinnear showed Defendant simply illustrated the bit disclosed in his application. Accordingly, Patent No. 2,380,112 discloses everything of substance which Kinnear told any employee of Defendant with reference to his invention.

19. Prior to his first contact with Defendant in the Spring of 1945, Kinnear had discussed his bit with the leading bit manufacturers in the Houston area, including Hughes Tool Company, Reed Roller Bit Company and Hunt Tool Company, and had disclosed to each of these substantially the same information he later disclosed to Defendant, including his patent application, drawings of his bit and his model.

20. All of Defendant's acts of which Plaintiff complains, including the alleged publication and disclosure to others of information received from Kinnear, and use of "jet" bits and "jet" drilling, occurred after the issuance of Patent No. 2,380,112.

21. Kinnear sold a few of his bits to other oil operators in addition to the bits he sold to Defendant in 1945 and 1946. Each of these bits disclosed to the public the way in which it was constructed. Any competent mechanic could have duplicated the Kinnear bit after examining one of the bits which Kinnear sold and any competent driller on seeing such a bit would have known how to use it for drilling wells.

["Jet Drilling"]

22. The term "jet drilling" as used in the industry means a technique which consists of utilizing the available horsepower on a given drilling rig in the most efficient manner by correlating properly all of the various factors affecting the rate of penetration, including (1) rate of fluid circulating through the bit, (2) fluid velocity through the bit nozzles, (3) speed of rotation of the bit, (4) amount of weight maintained on the bit, and (5) annular rising velocity.

23. The term "jet bit" as used in the industry means a bit having the following characteristics:

(1) water courses properly sized to give the maximum product of nozzle fluid velocity and rate of circulation for a given hydraulic system,

(2) water courses lined with erosion resistant material so that they will retain their most efficient diameter throughout the useful life of the bit, and

(3) water courses so positioned that the high velocity fluid issuing therefrom will not destroy or damage the cutting elements of the bit through erosion, which means, as a practical matter, that the streams of drilling fluid issuing from the water courses should not strike the cutting elements of the bit.

24. Kinnear did not furnish Defendant any information concerning "jet drilling" or "jet bits".

25. Neither of the patents in suit contains a disclosure of "jet drilling" or "jet bits".

[Defendant's Activities]

26. The technique of "jet drilling" was developed by Defendant as the result of a research program into the hydraulic factors affecting the rate of penetration in rotary drilling, which was commenced in 1943, was formalized as Research Project 4025 on January 1, 1946 and was intensified as equipment and personnel became available in the years immediately following the War. This program involved primarily a series of "short interval" tests conducted on a number of Defendant's drilling rigs under actual field conditions, wherein all but one of the various factors known to affect the rate of penetration would be held constant while the remaining factor would be varied from minimum to maximum within practical limits and the results recorded. The data obtained from these tests enabled Defendant's engineers to determine the relative importance of the several factors involved, and to correlate these factors in order to achieve optimum efficiency in drilling. For example, it was discovered that the rate of penetration was greatest when the product of nozzle fluid velocity and rate of circulation (frequently referred to as "QV") was at a maximum, rather than when either of these factors alone was at a maximum. These data also enabled Defendant's engineers to predetermine the most efficient set of drilling conditions for any given drilling operation, including, in particular, selecting the diameter of the nozzle in the bit which would produce the maximum QV.

27. Defendant's engineers also discovered, as a result of this research project, that when the bit was equipped with nozzles of the proper diameter to produce a jet stream having the maximum QV, the velocity of the jet stream was so great that (a) the nozzles had to be lined with an extremely hard, erosion resistant material or they would become enlarged very quickly and would no longer be the proper size, and (b) the cutting elements of the bit had to be protected from the abrasive effects of the high velocity jet streams, either by hard surfacing or, preferably, by directing the streams so as to miss the cutting elements and hit the bottom of the hole. Both the lining of nozzles with erosion resistant material and the positioning of the nozzles so as to discharge drilling fluid directly onto the bottom of the hole, missing the cutters, were old long before the inception of Defendant's research program. For example, in 1938 the Defendant used a large number of so-called "parabolic blade" bits having water courses so positioned as to discharge streams of drilling fluid directly on the bottom of the hole ahead of the blade. Hard metal nozzles were used to protect bit water courses from fluid erosion at least this early.

28. Defendant's initial experiments were with drag bits and Defendant obtained from various bit manufacturers drag bits equipped with tungsten carbide nozzles of varying diameters for use under different drilling conditions, the nozzles being positioned so as to direct the high velocity jet streams onto the bottom of the hole, ahead of the blade, rather than onto the blade. These bits obtained and used by Defendant commencing in 1946, were the first of the so-called "jet" bits.

29. Defendant's drilling crews, using "jet" drag bits and applying the technique of "jet" drilling, achieved significant increases in rate of penetration and over-all drilling efficiency in a number of instances.

30. Commencing in 1948, Defendant's engineers published a series of technical papers containing the results of Defendant's research program and explaining the principles of "jet" drilling with "jet" drag bits.

31. In 1948 Defendant requested several of the leading bit manufacturers, particularly Hughes Tool Company and Reed Roller Bit Company, to furnish Defendant with rock bits suitable for use in "jet" drilling. The conventional rock bit in general use at that time had relatively larger water courses than those used in "jet" drag bits with which Defendant had previously experimented. Moreover, the water courses in conventional rock bits in most instances were not lined with abrasion resistant material and they discharged in whole or in part upon the cutting elements. In order to convert their conventional rock bits to "jet" bits, the bit manufacturers relocated the nozzles so that the jet streams would not strike the cutters, equipped the nozzles with erosion resistant material and, generally, reduced the total nozzle area. None of these changes presented any difficult or unusual problems to the bit manufacturers since bits had been made for many years which incorporated water courses positioned to discharged drilling fluid onto the bottom of the hole missing the cutters and nozzles made of erosion resistant material. Moreover, bits had been made for many years with water courses as small as those found desirable for "jet" drilling. The first "jet" rock bits were furnished to Defendant by the bit manufacturers during the latter part of 1948 and early 1949. Defendant's tests indicated that these "jet" rock bits, when used in accordance with the "jet" drilling technique, would drill faster than conventional rock bits under many drilling conditions.

32. As the result of Defendant's successful use of the experimental "jet" rock bits, the bit manufacturers went into large scale commercial production of "jet" rock bits. Hughes Tool Company's first production line jet rock bit was the so-called "Iron Pants", which came on the market early in 1950. Reed Roller Bit Company followed suit with its "Liquid Blast" cross-roller jet bit about the same time. These were followed by Hughes "Integral Jet" rock bit and by Reed's "Twin Blast" rock bit in 1952.

33. Approximately 30 per cent of the rock bits now being manufactured are of the "jet" type. The large percentage of conventional rock bits still being manufactured is due to a number of factors, including the additional cost of "jet" bits, the increased over-all cost of "jet" drilling and the failure of "jet" bits to out-perform conventional bits under many drilling conditions.

34. In addition to the technical papers published by Defendant's engineers, Defendant published two articles in its house organ, "The Humble Way", one in 1950 and another in 1952, summarizing in non-technical language the results of Defendant's work with "jet" bits and "jet" drilling. This magazine is distributed by Defendant throughout all 48 states to its stockholders and to others interested in the oil business.

35. Defendant summarized the results of its research work, including its development of "jet" drilling, in periodic reports submitted to its affiliate, Standard Oil Development Company, pursuant to a contract between these two corporations providing for the sharing of the benefits and the expenses of research conducted by each. This information was in turn transmitted by Standard Oil Development Company to other members of the Standard group with which it had similar arrangements.

[Summary of Findings]

36. No information disclosed by Kinnear to Defendant was used by Defendant in developing or practicing "jet" drilling, in using "jet" bits, in obtaining "jet" bits from bit manufacturers, nor was any such information included in Defendant's reports to its affiliates, in the technical articles on "jet" drilling, or in the two Humble Way articles on "jet" drilling.

37. None of the information furnished by Kinnear to Defendant in connection with Kinnear's alleged invention and/or the bit which he sold to Defendant and which Defendant tested and then discarded, was used by Defendant for any purpose other than the testing and evaluation of the Kinnear bit. Defendant made no unauthorized disclosures of this information to others and made no agreements with bit manufacturers which pertained to Kinnear's alleged invention and/or bit or to anything which Kinnear disclosed to Defendant.

38. Defendant has not manufactured any bits, and has not "palmed off" as its own or as those of bit manufacturers any bits incorporating any invention or idea of Kinnear or of Plaintiff.

39. Defendant has committed no fraudulent or unfair trade practice in connection with jet drilling or jet bits, or in connection with any invention of Kinnear, or in connection with anything disclosed by Kinnear to Defendant.

40. Plaintiff has never made or sold a bit. The business which Plaintiff claims was interrupted or damaged by Defendant was new and unestablished. Kinnear never manufactured or sold bits on a commercial basis, and he lost money on the bits he did manufacture and sell.

41. Plaintiff has suffered no injury or damage as a result of any act of Defendant alleged in Paragraphs 10, 11 and 12 of the Complaint.

42. The publication by Defendant of articles on "jet" drilling, complained of by Plaintiff, occurred more than two years before the filing of this suit and such publication was known to Plaintiff or its predecessors at or shortly after the time it occurred.

43. Defendant did not enter into any of the unlawful agreements, combinations or conspiracies alleged in Paragraph 12 of the Complaint.

44. Defendant did not monopolize or attempt to monopolize trade or commerce, as alleged in Paragraph 12 of the Complaint.

45. Defendant did not interfere with the consummation of a business deal between Plaintiff or its predecessors and Houston Oil Field Material Company, as alleged in Paragraph 12 of the Complaint.

46. Defendant did not interfere with the sale of bits by Plaintiff and/or Plaintiff's predecessors, as alleged in Paragraph 12 of the Complaint.

47. Defendant has committed no act prohibited by the Federal or Texas anti-trust laws nor has Defendant injured the public by any of the acts alleged in Paragraph 12 of the Complaint.

[Patent Infringement]

48. In its claim of patent infringement, Plaintiff charges that Defendant has infringed both Patent No. 2,380,112 and Re. No. 23,416 by using drill bits having water courses so positioned that the streams of drilling fluid issuing therefrom strike directly upon the bottom of the hole without first striking the cutting elements of the bit. Plaintiff has specified 19 different bits, each of which it contends infringes its patents. These bits are made by 8 different bit manufacturers. All of the accused bits are "jet" bits. Some of them are drag bits, some are cone bits, some are cross-roller bits, and some are combination bits.

49. Defendant contends that it has not infringed either of Plaintiff's patents by its use of any of the accused bits or by any other act. Defendant further contends that Patent No. 2,380,112 was extinguished by the grant of Reissue No. 23,416, and that Reissue No. 23,416 is invalid because of anticipation and lack of invention over the prior art.

Conclusions of Law

1. Plaintiff has no cause of action against Defendant for alleged breach of confidence (Paragraph 10 of the Complaint) * * *.

2. Plaintiff has no cause of action against Defendant for alleged unfair competition (Paragraph 11 of the Complaint) * * *.

3. Plaintiff has no cause of action against Defendant for alleged violation of the anti-trust laws (Paragraph 12 of the Complaint) for the following reasons:

(a) Under the Federal anti-trust laws the essential elements of a private civil action for treble damages are:

(i) a violation by the defendant of some specific provision of the Federal anti-trust laws with consequent injury to the public, and

(ii) injury to the business or property of the plaintiff by reason of such violation.

The plaintiff has the burden of proving each of these elements. In this case, Plaintiff has failed to prove the existence of either of these elements.

(b) The Texas anti-trust laws make no provision for a private civil action for violation thereof. Moreover, no violation of the Texas anti-trust laws has been shown.

4. Plaintiff has no cause of action against Defendant for alleged infringement of Patent No. 2,380,112 because the grant of a reissue patent extinguishes the original. Plaintiff No. 2,380,112 was extinguished by the grant of Re. 23,416. Therefore, Plaintiff can predicate no claim on Patent No. 2,380,112.

12. Plaintiff's suit for alleged infringement of Patent No. Re. 23,416 must be dismissed for invalidity of the patent as well as non-infringement by Defendant.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Pretrial Procedures—Depositions—Notice—Suppression.—A notice for the taking of a deposition which was served the day before the deposition was to be taken was not unreasonably short where counsel for the parties were all in Oslo, Norway, for the purpose of taking foreign depositions and it was understood that the party serving the notice was to proceed with its depositions at that time. Also, a motion to suppress the depositions of two witnesses because the refusal of two other witnesses to produce certain documents prevented adquate cross-examination of the witnesses whose depositions were taken was denied. The request for the production of the documents was informal, and the witnesses whose depositions were taken had no connection with the witnesses who were requested to produce the documents.

Memorandum Regarding Depositions

[Motions]

IGOE, District Judge [In full text]: There are pending motions to suppress the depositions of the witnesses Steen, Broberg and Noren, as well as a motion for the production of documents under Rule 34 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. They have been argued and counsel for both sides have presented very elaborate affidavits and statements of position.

As to the motion for production of documents, sought by RCA, counsel for Zenith have assured the court that except for some documents which are being made available for inspection now, and others which will be made available in connection with the answers to interrogatories, the documents called for have already been produced, to the extent they are available, and have supported this with affidavits. On this showing, the entry of an order would be an empty gesture.

RCA has also moved to suppress the depositions of the witnesses Broberg and Noren, "or in the alternative for an order authorizing RCA to re-examine the witnesses Nygren, Carajo, Broberg and Noren." The grounds asserted are the failure of the witnesses Nygren and Carajo (called by RCA) to produce documents necessary to the cross-examination of the witnesses Broberg and Noren (called by Zenith). The Steen deposition is said to have been taken by Zenith on insufficient notice to RCA.

[Notice of Taking Deposition]

From the affidavits of Messrs. Sokolow and Curtis, it appears that written notice of the Steen deposition was served on counsel for RCA in Oslo, Norway, on February 27, 1957, where counsel for both sides were then engaged in taking depositions in this case. The notice called for the appearance of Steen on the next day, February 28, 1957. Counsel for RCA called counsel for Zenith at about 6:00 p.m. on February 27, and protested the short notice, saying that he would not attend. He did not attend, although he and his associates were in Oslo at a place nearby the American Embassy where the deposition of Steen was taken.

The Federal rules do not specify any minimum notice of the taking of depositions, and the court must determine in any case what is reasonable under all of the circumstances. In this case, counsel were all in Oslo for the taking of the foreign depositions, and it was apparently understood that Zenith was to proceed with its depositions at the time. Under these circumstances it is not clear that the notice was unreasonably short. Certainly there appears to have been no justification for counsel deliberately staying away from the proceedings in order to prevent any taking of the deposition. The motion to suppress the Steen deposition is denied.

[Suppression of Depositions]

RCA moves to suppress the Broberg and Noren depositions, not because of any irregularity in the notice or taking of those depositions, but because it is claimed that the refusal of the witnesses Nygren and Carajo to produce documents relating to the approval of Zenith sets by SEMKO, an organization which has to do with electrical standards in Sweden, prevented adequate cross-examination of Broberg and Noren.

From the conflicting affidavits of Messrs. Sokolow and Curtis, it appears that Zenith radios were approved by SEMKO prior to 1939 but that no tests have been made on them since. SEMKO witnesses refused to produce records relating to the pre-1939 Zenith approval without Zenith's consent. Zenith attorneys consented, subject to the production of similar records regarding approval of RCA sets. This consent by Zenith was withdrawn, and the documents were not produced, when it appeared that similar records relating to RCA could not be located.

According to the testimony, as set forth in the affidavits, the records of SEMKO were incomplete and it would be "fantastic work" to locate the requested records. Apparently the requests for document production were not made in the subpoenas to the witnesses, but were made informally a few days prior to the hearing.

On the basis of these facts the court is asked to suppress the testimony of two other witnesses, who apparently had no connection with SEMKO, but who testified that they had sold Zenith radios, which had been approved by SEMKO.

The motion to suppress the Broberg and Noren depositions is denied, as is also the motion for alternative relief in the form of permission to go back to Sweden for the purpose of re-examining Broberg, Noren, Nyberg and Carajo. To follow the latter course would be to disrupt completely the schedule which this court has already laid down for the commencement of the trial of this action on June 17.

In the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey. Civil Action No. 110-57. Filed March 15, 1957.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Injunctive Relief—Pretrial Procedures —Preliminary Injunction.—A newspaper publisher was not entitled to a preliminary injunction in its action charging that an association of newspaper carriers agreed to refuse to handle the publisher's newspaper at an undetermined future date in violation of the antitrust laws. A preliminary injunction is an extraordinary process, and the granting of such relief rests in the sound discretion of the court. In the instant action, the publisher failed to establish irreparable injury, there was a conflict of material facts, and there was serious and intricate questions of law, particularly as to the applicability of the Norris-La Guardia Anti-Injunction Act. A preliminary injunction is never granted where the plaintiff's contentions, in fact and in law, are seriously disputed.

Memorandum Opinion

[Boycott Alleged]

ALFRED E. MODARELLI, District Judge [In full text]: Plaintiff has petitioned for a preliminary injunction. 15 U. S. C. A. § 26. Plaintiff publishes daily and Sunday editions of a newspaper in Newark which are distributed by the defendants. In February, 1956, a number of the defendant dealers organized into a voluntary association. Subsequently, on August 16, 1956, defendants incorporated as the Allied Newspaper Carriers of New Jersey, hereinafter referred to as Allied. The group has a membership of approximately forty members who distribute approximately 24% of plaintiff's newspapers throughout New Jersey.

In the summer of 1956, disagreements between the parties as to allocation of territories for routes and delivery charges to subscribers culminated in a refusal of defendants to handle the newspaper. This "boycott," as it was termed, lasted from July 13—July 28, 1956. In its petition, complainant alleges that on January 29, 1957, the membership of Allied ratified a resolution to boycott plaintiff's newspaper at a date to be determined by Allied's president, James L. Hutchings. It is this contemplated action which is the immediate stimulus for bringing this petition. An order to show cause was entered on February 14, 1957, by Judge Meaney.

Plaintiff cites 15 U. S. C. §§ 4 and 26, commonly known as the Sherman Act and the Clayton Act, as the bases of the relief sought. In addition, plaintiff quotes extensively from numerous decisions to establish the applicability of these statutes to its activities as constituting interstate commerce and to denominate the conduct of defendants as restraints and monopoly proscribed by the anti-trust laws. The principal cases relied upon include Lorain Journal Co. v. United States [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,957], 342 U. S. 143 (1951); United States v. Women's Sportswear Mfrs. Ass'n [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,390], 336 U. S. 460 (1949); Mandeville Island Farms, Inc. v. American Crystal Sugar Co. [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,251], 334 U. S. 219 (1948); Paramount Pictures, Inc. v. United Motion Pictures Theaters [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,173], 93 F. 2d 714 (CA 3 1937). In brief, plaintiff contends that the defendants seek to redistribute territories among themselves and to require plaintiff to refuse to furnish newspapers to anyone else [i. e., newsboys] in the territories. Plaintiff further alleges that defendants threaten a boycott if newsboys are used to supply the demand for deliveries in areas already served by defendants, thus creating a monopoly in the latter.

[Answer and Defense]

In reply, defendants deny the characterization of their activities as restraints or attempts to create a monopoly. They concede that there are grievances which arise from two practices of the plaintiff, viz., an alleged inflexible price of fifty cents for weekly deliveries, a sum inadequate to constitute a living wage, and the practice of using newsboys, many assertedly under age, to compete with defendants. Defendants oppose the petition on the following grounds: (1) That plaintiff is barred because of the equitable doctrine of unclean hands; (2) that if the preliminary injunction is granted, they will be foreclosed from publicizing their grievances; (3) that this is a labor dispute which makes applicable the terms of the Norris-La Guardia Act, 29 U. S. C. A. § 101 et seq. Decisional law is cited in support of these arguments, notably New Negro Alliance v. Sanitary Grocery Co., 303 U. S. 552 (1938); Olmstead v. United States, 277 U. S. 438 (1928); Mitchell v. Gibbons [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,388], 172 F. 2d 970 (CA 8 1949); Miller Parlor Furniture Co. v. Furniture Workers Industrial Union, 8 F. Supp. 209 (D. C. N. J. 1934).

[Preliminary Injunction]

A preliminary injunction is an extraordinary process, and the granting of such relief rests in the sound discretion of the court. Rice & Adams v. Lathrop, 278 U. S. 509 (1929); American Visuals Corp. v. Holland, 219 F. 2d 223 (CA 2 1955). The court has before it numerous affidavits of the contending parties. In fact, at the present posture of the matter, in the absence of oral testimony, it may be said that it presents a "battle by affidavit." And where the equities of a bill are denied fully and explicitly under oath, a court usually does not issue an injunction in limine but allows the matter to await a final hearing. Behre v. Anchor Ins. Co., 297 Fed. 986 (CA 2 1924). This is the view of the Third Circuit expressed in numerous decisions. At no time was it more explicitly enunciated than in Lare v. Harper & Bros., 86 Fed. 481, 483 (1898), where the court said:

> "It is a rule, subject to few exceptions, that a preliminary injunction should not be awarded on ex parte affidavits, unless in a clear case."

In Murray Hill Restaurant v. Thirteen Twenty One Locust, 98 F. 2d 578 (CA 3 1938), the Circuit Court reiterated its view that the petition for preliminary injunction should be denied especially where it is supported only by affidavits. The reasoning of that court was spelled out further in Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc., et al. v. Gittone, et al. [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,004], 110 F. 2d 292, 293 (1941), which warrants quotation:

> "Furthermore we think that a preliminary injunction should not have been granted upon evidence largely in the form of affidavits as was done in the case before us. The evidence was conflicting and the trial judge, in order to enable him to resolve these conflicts, should have been afforded the opportunity of testing the credibility of witnesses by having the benefit of their cross-examination and, if possible, their presence in court. In the absence of such opportunity the affidavits of each side were entitled to equal weight."

[Irreparable Injury]

On numerous occasions the Third Circuit has cautioned that the granting of a preliminary injunction is an exercise of a very far-reaching power, never to be indulged in except in a case clearly demanding it. See New York Asbestos Mfg. Co. v. Ambler Asbestos Air Cell Covering Co., 102 Fed. 890, 891 (CA 3 1900); Barker Painting Co. v. Brotherhood of Painters, 15 F. 2d 16 (CA 3 1926). To justify the granting of such an injunction there must be a showing of irreparable injury during the pendency of the action and a finding of fact to such effect. Sims v. Greene, 161 F. 2d 87, 89 (CA 3 1947); Murray Hill Restaurant v. Thirteen Twenty One Locust, supra. The burden is upon the complainant to prove its contentions and I find that the element of irreparable injury has not been sustained.

[Question of Fact and Law]

Obviously the case is controlled by the rule repeatedly announced in the district and circuit that a preliminary injunction is never granted where the petition and affidavits disclose that plaintiff's contentions, in fact and in law, are seriously disputed. Eutectic Welding Alloys Corp. v. Zeisel, et al., 11 F. R. D. 78 (D. C. N. J. 1950); United States, et al. v. Republic Oil Refining Co., 8 F. Supp. 897 (D. C. N. J. 1934); Fleetway, Inc. v. Public Service Interstate Transportation Co., 4 F. Supp. 482, (D. C. N. J. 1933), aff'd. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,061] 72 F. 2d 761 (CA 3 1934), cert. denied 293 U. S. 626 (1935).

This case illustrates the futility of considering a motion for a preliminary injunction in cases of this kind upon ex parte affidavits. Not only is there a conflict of material facts, but there are serious and intricate questions of law involved, particularly as to the applicability of the Norris-La Guardia Anti-Injunction Act. It has been said that in weighing an application for a preliminary injunction, to doubt is to deny. Madison Square Garden Corp. v. Braddock, 90 F. 2d 924 (CA 3 1937), affirming 19 F. Supp. 392 (D. C. N. J. 1937). In view of the foregoing discussion, and without touching upon the merits as they may develop upon final hearing, I am constrained to deny the motion.

If the plaintiff believes that it can establish irreparable loss or immediate danger at a final hearing, the case may be set down for that purpose on short notice.

An order may be submitted in conformity with the opinion herein expressed.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit. No. 5188. Dated June 14, 1957.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts. WYZANSKI, District Judge.

Massachusetts Fair Trade Act and McGuire Act

Fair Trade—Resale Price Fixing Between Competitors—Producer's Suit To Enjoin Retailer from Selling Below Fair Trade Prices—McGuire Act—Competition Between Parties—Test.—Where a United States Court of Appeals had ruled (1) that an oil company could not maintain a suit to restrain an operator of two retail gasoline stations from selling the company's gasoline at less than the fair trade prices established under the Massachusetts Fair Trade Act since the oil company and the station operator competed with each other in the sale of gasoline to commercial accounts, and (2) that the company was not entitled to partial injunctive relief, that is, relief as to the separate class of business for which it and the operator did not actually or potentially compete, the Court granted the oil company leave to file a supplemental record appendix to its brief noting that it had asked the trial court for partial injunctive relief and that the court denied it. Also, the Court denied the company's petition for rehearing, and noted that it had not accorded controlling significance to the company's failure to ask the trial court for partial injunctive relief.

See Resale Price Fixing—Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3015.80, 3100.

For the appellant: Robert W. Meserve, with whom Charles W. Bartlett; John R. Hally; Austin Broadhurst; Nutter, McClennan & Fish; and Ely, Bartlett, Thompson & Brown, Boston, Mass., were on the brief.

For the appellee: Albert U. Rosa, East Boston, Mass.

Denying a petition for rehearing of a decision of the U. S. Court of Appeals, First Circuit, 1957 Trade Cases ¶ 68,695, affirming U. S. District Court, District of Massachusetts, 1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,547.

Before Woodbury and Hartigan, Circuit Judges, and Aldrich, District Judge.

Opinion of the Court on Petition for Rehearing

Woodbury, Circuit Judge [In full text]: In the majority opinion of the court [1957 Trade Cases ¶ 68,695] and also in Judge Aldrich's concurring opinion it is stated in substance that the plaintiff-appellant did not ask the court below for injunctive relief limited to the separate class of business for which it and the defendant-appellee were not in either actual or potential competition. On this petition for rehearing the plaintiff-appellant asserts that actually it did ask the court below for such limited relief and that the court denied it, and it points to the typewritten transcript to prove its assertion. For relief it asks us to amend our opinions to conform to the fact thus established and for leave to add to the record appendix to its brief by printing as a supplement thereto the portions of the typewritten record on which it relies.

Our Rule 24(1) permitting appellants to proceed on record appendices to their briefs requires that relevant docket entries, the charge or judgment below, and certain other matters, be printed therein, and also "such other parts of the record, material to the questions presented, as the appellant or petitioner deems it essential for the judges of the court to read in order to decide those questions." Certainly whether the plaintiff-appellant asked the District Court for the limited injunctive relief which is asserted on appeal it was entitled to is material. The plaintiff-appellant should, therefore, have printed in its original appendix the matter which it now asks for leave to print in a supplement. While we are free if we wish to scan the original record made in the court below, we are not under any obligation to thumb through that often voluminous record to see whether an appellant has failed to print in the appendix to his brief some part of it material to the questions he presents to us on appeal. Were that our duty the appendix system would have little or no point. It is the appellant's duty to print in his appendix the parts of the record essential for us to read in order to decide the questions he presents, and if he fails to do so, he runs the risk of coming before this court on an inadequate record on appeal.

However, we are disposed to be lenient in this particular case, for even though we did not accord controlling significance to the appellant's failure to ask the court below for limited injunctive relief, which we assumed from the record appendix to its brief to be the fact, we nevertheless see no reason why the relief for which it asks in this petition for rehearing should not be granted to the end that the actual fact may appear on the records of this court.

Leave is granted to the plaintiff-appellant to file a supplemental record appendix to its brief in the form submitted with its petition for rehearing, and an order will be entered denying the petition for rehearing.

[¶ 68,747] Clein v. Kapiloff et al.

In the Supreme Court of Georgia. No. 19719, A-8. Decided June 10, 1957.

Georgia Antitrust Law

Combinations and Conspiracies Under State Laws—Practices—Covenant Not To Compete—Legality.—A retailer who owned a jewelry store and a clothing store located in the same block sold his jewelry store business. The buyer agreed not to engage in the retail clothing business on the jewelry store premises or within a radius of one-half mile of the premises for a period of approximately nine years, and the seller agreed not to engage in the retail jewelry business within a radius of one mile of the jewelry store for a period of approximately nine years. The restriction imposed on the buyer was reasonable as to time and territory, it was reasonably necessary to protect the interests of the seller, and it did not impose greater restrictions than were necessary for the protection of the seller. There was no allegation that the public would suffer in having one less clothing store in the area for the time specified.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2319.12.

For the plaintiff in error: Harold Karp and A. Tate Conyers, Atlanta, Ga.

For the defendants in error: Marvin O'Neal, Jr., and Marvin P. Nodvin, Atlanta, Ga.

By the Court:

1. The covenant of the defendant not to engage in the retail clothing business in competition with the plaintiff's being limited in time and restricted as to territory and being otherwise reasonable, it is not invalid as being a contract in general restraint of trade. The general demurrers to the petition were properly overruled.

2. It was not error to grant an interlocutory injunction.

[Appeal]

ALMAND, Justice [In full text]: The bill of exceptions assigns error on orders overruling general demurrers to an equitable petition, and granting an interlocutory injunction.

[Restrictive Covenants]

The petition of Harry Kapiloff and Sam Turetsky sought to restrain the defendant Sidney A. Clein from engaging in the retail clothing business in violation of a restrictive covenant entered into by the defendant Clein and other named defendants with the plaintiffs. In substance, the petition alleged: that the plaintiffs, prior to August 28, 1950, owned and controlled Macey's, Inc., a corporation engaged in the retail jewelry business at 110 Whitehall Street in the City of Atlanta; that the plaintiffs sold said business to Sterling Jewelry Company, a corporation owned and controlled by the named defendants; that the written contract of sale, signed by both corporations through plaintiff Kapiloff as president of Macey's, Inc., and defendant Clein as vice-president of Sterling Jewelry Company, Inc., contained the following covenant:

> "4. Restrictive Covenants. Seller covenants and agrees that it will not, throughout the term of the lease assigned hereunder [July 31, 1959], engage in the retail jewelry business, or in the sale of any items normally sold by a retail jewelry company, other than television sets, within a radius of one mile from the premises herein described, and Buyer covenants that it will not engage in the operation of a retail clothing business on the premises, nor will it engage in the sale of items normally sold in a retail clothing store on the premises or within a radius of one-half mile of the premises, throughout the term of the lease [July 31, 1959] herein assigned." (Italics and parenthesis supplied)

Following the corporate signatures in the contract of sale, all of the named plaintiffs and defendants agreed in writing that the "restrictive covenants mentioned in paragraph 4 of the within agreement are hereby adopted and agreed to by us individually, and any one acting for us, or any firm, corporation, or partnership in which any of us may have an interest." The seller conveyed to the buyer all of his accounts receivable, the plaintiff Kapiloff agreed to assign the lease in 110 Whitehall Street to the buyer, and the defendant Clein agreed to endorse the purchase money notes. At the time of the sale, the plaintiffs were engaged in the retail clothing business at 114 Whitehall Street under the trade name of Hollywood Credit Clothiers. It was alleged that, at the time of the sale, the defendants "knew that the accounts of customers of said jewelry business were in a great part the same as the accounts of the petitioners' retail credit clothing business and petitions as a consideration of said sale and agreement insisted that defendants covenant not to engage in the clothing business because a great number of the accounts of the two said stores were of the same customers. Petitioners show that defendants knew that if they were allowed to sell clothing to petitioners' jewelry accounts after said jewelry business was sold to them, that they would be dealing with many of the customers of petitioners' said credit clothing business, as aforesaid, and they knew that petitioners insisted upon said covenant to protect themselves from that situation." It was further alleged that the defendant Clein is now engaged in the business of selling clothing at retail at 132 Whitehall Street, which is within one-half mile of the premises at 110 Whitehall Street, in violation of this covenant, and that the defendant Clein, by engaging in the retail clothing business in competition with the plaintiffs, will cause them irreparable damage and injury.

[Reasonableness of Restraint]

1. As a general rule, a contract in general restraint of trade is void, but a contract only in partial restraint may be upheld provided the restraint is reasonable and the contract is valid in the other essentials. In determining the reasonableness of a restrictive covenant, a greater latitude is allowed when the covenant relates to the sale of a business than in cases where the covenant is ancillary to a contract of employment. Orkin Exterminating Co. v. Dewberry, 204 Ga. 794, 802 (51 S. E. 2d 669); Griffin v. Vandegriff [1948-1949 Trade Cases ¶ 62,407], 205 Ga. 288, 195 (53 S. E. 2d 345). The agreement must be considered with reference to the situation, business and objects of the parties in light of all of the surrounding circumstances. The restrictive covenant in the instant case is reasonable as to time and territory, its area of operation being within a radius of one-half mile, and its time being limited to July 31, 1959. The true test of the validity of the contract is whether it is supported by a sufficient consideration and whether the restraint is reasonable. In determining whether the covenant is "otherwise reasonable," the covenant must be reasonably necessary to protect the interests of the party in whose favor it is imposed, and must not unduly prejudice the interests of the public, and must not impose greater restrictions than are necessary for the protection of the promisee. Rakestraw v. Lanier, 104 Ga. 188, 197 (30 S. E. 735).

In this case, the plaintiffs bound themselves not to compete with the defendants in the retail jewelry business within one mile of 110 Whitehall Street during a period ending July 31, 1959, and the defendants, knowing that the plaintiffs were then engaged in the retail clothing business at 114 Whitehall Street, agreed that, within a like period of time, they would not engage in the retail clothing business within one-half mile of 110 Whitehall Street. The covenant is reasonable in all respects, and there are no allegations in the petition which indicate that the public would suffer in having one less retail clothing store in this limited area for the time specified. We have here simply a case where the sellers and the buyers of a business have entered into a valid contract containing mutual obligations, and one party has chosen to ignore his obligation. In such a case, equity will exercise its restraining arm and require him to abide by his promise.

The petition sets forth a cause of action for the relief prayed, and the court did not err in overruling the general demurrers of Clein.

[Injunction]

2. On the interlocutory hearing, the case was submitted upon an agreed stipulation of facts. Under the evidence submitted, the court did not err in granting an interlocutory injunction.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

[¶ 68,748] J. H. Whiteley and Wayne Whiteley v. Foremost Dairies, Inc., Guy Horner, and Keith Skelton.

In the United States District Court for the Western District of Arkansas, Fayetteville Division. Civil Action No. 334. Dated June 19, 1957.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Practices—Refusal to Deal—Conspiracy Within Corporation—A corporate dairy and one of its employees did not violate

Section 1 of the Sherman Act by informing a milk hauler that the dairy would no longer purchase milk from the hauler and by arranging for another hauler to take over the route of the former hauler upon learning that the hauler was about to have his milk permit suspended and that many of the milk producers from which he collected milk were dissatisfied with his services. There was no conspiracy or combination by the dairy and its employee to convert the hauler's route to the dairy's own use. The dairy's employee could not conspire with the dairy in violation of the Sherman Act because a conspiracy under the Act cannot be committed by a corporation and its agent when the agent is acting for the corporation in the ordinary scope of his duties.

Furthermore, there was no evidence that the dairy and its employee either intended to or did monopolize any part of trade or commerce in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. They did not receive more milk as a result of the alleged conversion, the alleged conversion only brought about a change in the person hauling the milk, and the new hauler was not shown to be an agent or employee of the dairy.

Abstract of Pleadings

[Defendant]

JOHN E. MILLER, District Judge [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: The complaint was filed December 15, 1956. The plaintiffs asserted jurisdiction upon two grounds: (1) diversity and the amount involved, and (2) the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act, Title 15, U. S. C., Sections 1, 2, 12, and 15. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendant dairy at all times material had been engaged "in the purchase, collection, and transportation of whole milk produced by farmers, dairymen and other producers, and the transportation of said milk in interstate commerce, in its trucks and other equipment, from Springdale, Arkansas, to Dallas, Texas, and to other points outside the State of Arkansas."

[Milk Routes]

That there had been for many years various milk routes throughout Washington County, Arkansas, on which the "owners gather, collect and transport whole milk from the farmers, dairymen and other producers, and which said whole milk is transported and delivered to various milk buyers, outlets, and consumers located outside the State of Arkansas." That under the long and well-established custom all of said milk routes, including the milk route herein involved, have become and are valuable property rights "belonging to the person who operates the trucks and other vehicles thereon for the gathering, collection, picking up and transportation of the whole milk from the farmers, dairymen and producers thereon."

Prior to November 1, 1954, Lloyd Sloan and O. J. Snyder owned and operated milk route No. 800, having purchased the same from the original operator of the route; that the said Sloan and Snyder throughout the period of their operation of the route delivered the Grade A milk collected thereon to the defendant dairy's place of business in Springdale, Arkansas.

That on or about November 1, 1954, the plaintiffs purchased the said route for a cash consideration of $6,000, which purchase by the plaintiffs and sale by Sloan and Snyder was well known and consented to by the defendant dairy.

[Contemplated Sales]

During the latter part of 1955, one Carl Ishmael offered to pay plaintiffs $7,000 in cash for said route, and at the request of plaintiffs the defendant dairy gave its consent for the sale of said route to the said Ishmael, but the said Ishmael could not raise the necessary $7,000, and the contemplated sale was not consummated.

In the early part of January, 1956, the plaintiffs began negotiations with one Robert Oxford for the sale of the route for the sum of $7,500, whereupon all of the defendants refused to give their consent to the sale of the said route to the said Oxford, and by reason of the wrongful and unlawful conduct on the part of the defendants the plaintiffs lost the sale of the said route to the said Oxford. On or about January 9, 1956, the defendants orally notified plaintiffs that they "intended to take possession of and assume operation of said milk route themselves, beginning on the morning of January 10, 1956; and on January 10, 1956, the defendants did wrongfully and unlawfully take possession of said milk route and began the operation of their own milk trucks thereon and wrongfully and unlawfully ejected the plaintiffs from said milk route and prevented and prohibited the plaintiffs from operating their trucks on said milk route and from picking up the milk from same, and converted said milk route to their own use".

That the said Sloan and Snyder from whom plaintiffs acquired the route had acquired, encouraged, arranged, solicited, induced, and procured the business and good will of the producers on the said milk route, and had by reason of such efforts caused the producers to sell their milk to the defendant dairy.

[Alleged Antitrust Violations]

"On and prior to January 9, 1955, the defendants, in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act, Title 15, U. S. C., Sections 1, 2, 12, and 15, combined, confederated, and conspired among themselves and with other parties at present to the plaintiffs unknown, with the wrongful and unlawful intent and purpose to convert the said milk route No. 800 to their own use and thereby to hinder, burden, restrain, and interfere with the flow of and interstate commerce in said milk from the State of Arkansas to other states, and the actions of the said defendants in the conversion of said milk route to their own use and in depriving the plaintiffs of the benefits and enjoyment thereof has constituted and now constitutes a serious and material hindrance, burden, restraint, and interference with trade and commerce in said milk between the State of Arkansas and other states, and on account of said conversion the plaintiffs herein have been injured and damaged in their business and property in the sum of $7,500, which was the actual, fair market value of said milk route at the time of the wrongful conversion thereof by the defendants."

The plaintiffs pray for the recovery of $7,500 as their actual damages and for treble damages under Title 15, U. S. C., Section 15, in the sum of $22,500.

[Amendment to Complaint]

On February 26, 1957, the plaintiffs filed an amendment to their complaint by adding thereto numbered paragraphs 12, 13, and 14.

In numbered paragraph 12 of the amendment to the complaint the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants owned and operated a number of other milk routes in Washington County, Arkansas, from which they collected, acquired, and purchased whole milk; that the amount of milk so obtained by defendants constitutes a substantial and material amount of the whole milk produced in Washington County, Arkansas, and in Northwest Arkansas.

In numbered paragraph 13 the plaintiffs alleged that the 26 farmers, dairymen, and other producers on milk route No. 800 herein involved produced a material and substantial amount of all the whole milk produced in Washington County, Arkansas.

In numbered paragraph 14 the plaintiffs alleged that the conversion by the defendants of milk route No. 800 herein involved "was but part and parcel of the said combination, confederation, and conspiracy by the defendants hereinabove mentioned, and the said milk route No. 800 was so converted by the defendants to their own use with the wrongful, willful, arbitrary, capricious, and unlawful intent and purpose to cause and result in, and has caused and resulted in, all of the following, in violation of the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act:

"(a) The creation and establishment by the defendants of a monopoly in the purchase, acquisition, picking up and transportation in interstate commerce of all of the whole milk produced by all of the farmers, dairymen, and other producers of whole milk in Washington County, Arkansas, and in Northwest Arkansas.

"(b) The destruction of all competition with the defendants in the purchase, acquisition, picking up and transportation in interstate commerce of all of the whole milk produced by all of the farmers, dairymen, and other producers of whole milk in Washington County, Arkansas, and in Northwest Arkansas.

"(c) The destruction of the said milk route No. 800 belonging to the plaintiffs, and the denial of the right of the plaintiffs to acquire and pick up all of the whole milk produced by all of the producers situated thereon and to transport said milk, or to cause said milk to be transported, in interstate commerce by persons or firms other than the defendants.

"(d) The narrowing and restraint of the market for all of the whole milk produced by all of the producers of whole milk located upon and along the said milk route No. 800.

"(e) The narrowing and restraint upon the transportation in interstate commerce of all of the whole milk produced by all of the producers of whole milk located in Washington County, Arkansas, and Northwest Arkansas."

[Answers]

On April 24, 1957, the defendant Keith Skelton filed his separate answer in which he admitted the allegations of citizenship contained in the complaint of plaintiffs, but denied that the Court has jurisdiction under the provisions of Title 15, Sections 1, 2, 12, and 15, U. S. C. He denied that he is or has been at any time an agent, servant, or employee of the defendant dairy. He denied specifically all other allegations in the complaint.

On April 25, 1957, the defendants, Foremost Dairies, Inc., and Guy Horner, filed their joint answer in which they admitted the residence of the parties and the presence of an amount in excess of $3,000, but denied that the Court has jurisdiction of the action under the provisions of Title 15, U. S. C., Sections 1, 2, 12, and 15. They denied that they had converted said alleged milk route or that they had done any act in contravention of the terms and provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

They further alleged that the plaintiffs by verbal arrangement with the defendant began delivering Grade A milk to the defendant dairy on or about November 1, 1954; that the plaintiffs were to furnish a properly equipped truck for the transportation of said milk, and that such arrangement continued until about January 9, 1956, at which time the defendant dairy advised the plaintiffs that "it no longer could purchase milk which plaintiffs hauled on the route in question for the reason that at the instance of the producers on said route, Skelton Brothers would become a hauler of the milk on the route in question and the defendant, Foremost Dairies, Inc., would not receive and purchase any further milk hauled by the plaintiffs on said route."

During the period of operation by the plaintiffs the producers made many complaints with reference to the manner in which plaintiffs transported their milk, stating "that the truck operated by plaintiffs was kept in an unsanitary condition, that the driver thereof was likewise unsanitary in his operations, that plaintiffs carelessly and negligently spilled the milk of the producers, lost their containers filled with milk, and failed to pick up the milk at the time or times when it was necessary to do so in order to maintain the quality of the milk, and failed to deliver to producers weight records of their milk, and the producers advised the defendant that unless some other arrangement was made for transporting their milk that they, the producers, would sell their milk to other dairies and cause same to be transported in a proper manner. The complaints as set forth herein were made not only to the defendant, Foremost Dairies, Inc., but likewise to the plaintiffs herein on many occasions, and thereafter plaintiffs failed and refused to change their method of operation to the satisfaction of the said producers."

That prior to the time plaintiffs purchased the equipment from Sloan and Snyder, they were advised that the said Sloan and Snyder did not own a route and that all plaintiffs would acquire would be the equipment for hauling milk.

"That the plaintiffs had no contract, either written or oral, with the producers for hauling said milk, and the producers could at any time they saw fit haul their milk with their own equipment or employ anyone else other than plaintiffs to haul it, and the defendant, Foremost Dairies, Inc., further states that the plaintiffs had no route which they could sell and none which the defendants could convert, and this defendant denies that it ever converted any route as alleged in the complaint." The defendant dairy further alleged:

"That at the time plaintiffs herein ceased to serve the route of the producers in question in a satisfactory manner to said producers that Skelton Brothers took over and began the hauling of milk on the route in question at the instance of the producers, and on the same terms and conditions as had been in effect with the plaintiffs and the defendant, Foremost Dairies, Inc., during the period in which the plaintiffs served said route, and that the defendant, Foremost Dairies, Inc., had no interest in the matter other than that the producers be properly served to the end that it, the defendant, would receive Grade A milk in a proper manner and in such condition as to meet the inspection and approval of the health inspectors of said products."

That the plaintiffs breached the terms of the contract with the defendant by failing to perform thereunder, and as a result of said breach said contract was terminated by the defendant on the 9th day of January, 1956.

The defendant, Guy Horner, alleged that at all times during the period in question he was an employee of the defendant, Foremost Dairies, Inc., and that his efforts on behalf of the defendant, Foremost Dairies, Inc., "was attempting to aid the producers and the haulers of their milk to the end that the highest quality of milk would be produced, maintained by said producers and delivered to Foremost Dairies, Inc., in Dallas, Texas, in a manner that would meet inspection of the health authorities and that producers would receive therefrom proper compensation for their products".

[Dismissal of Defendant]

Upon the issues as joined by the pleadings, the case proceeded to trial on May 14 and 15, 1957, to the Court without a jury. At the conclusion of the introduction of all the evidence, the plaintiffs dismissed their complaint and amendment thereto as against the defendant, Keith Skelton, leaving only before the Court the claims of plaintiffs as against the defendants, Foremost Dairies, Inc., and its employee, Guy Horner. The Court took the case under advisement pending receipt of briefs from the parties in support of their respective contentions. The briefs have been received and considered along with the pleadings and evidence, and the Court now makes and files herein its Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law, separately stated.

Plaintiffs are citizens and residents of the State of Oklahoma. The defendant, Guy Horner, is a citizen and resident of the State of Arkansas, and the defendant, Foremost Dairies, Inc., (hereinafter referred to as defendant dairy) is a New York corporation doing business in the State of Arkansas.

In the spring of 1951 the defendant dairy explored the possibility of opening a milk route in Washington County, Arkansas, to obtain Grade A milk for sale in the City of Dallas, Texas. Various producers were contacted, and several meetings were held with producers and prospective producers of Grade A milk in the area. At these meetings various things were discussed, such as how the milk would be hauled, and what requirements would have to be met by the producers in order that their milk might meet the specifications of Grade A milk. These requirements included, in many instances, major changes in dairy barns and equipment. It was decided that the milk route would be feasible, and in the spring or summer of 1951 such a route was initiated.

The first milk hauler was a man named Ross Reed. Subsequently he sold whatever rights he had to Lloyd Sloan and O. J. Snyder. These two men operated the route until November 1, 1954, on which date they sold their equipment used on the route to plaintiffs herein, Wayne Whiteley and J. H. Whiteley, as evidenced by the following instrument (plaintiffs' Exhibit 1):

"We, Lloyd Sloan and O. J. Snyder, party of the first part, agree not to pickup any milk in the territory that is served by them, in what is called the Lincoln route or #800 Route. Now located south of #62 highway and East of Arkansas #59 highway. This territory is being sold to Wayne Whiteley of Westville, Oklahoma.

Bill of Sale

We, Lloyd Sloan and O. J. Snyder of Westville, Oklahoma, sell and Transfer their ownership of Milk Route #800 with 1953 G. M. C. Truck, to Wayne Whiteley of Westville, Oklahoma, effective of Nov. 1, 1954.

Signed by /s/ Lloyd Sloan
/s/ O. J. Snyder

3.

As a matter of fact, Wayne Whiteley was purchasing the route and equipment for himself and his father, J. H. Whiteley, as partners. The amount paid for the route and equipment was $6,000.00, which was substantially in excess of the value of the equipment alone.

Such milk routes are often bought and sold in northwest Arkansas, and it is quite common for a buyer to pay more than the value of the equipment, the excess payment being for the good will and agreement of the seller not to pick up any milk produced on the route.

Plaintiffs hired drivers to operate the milk route in question. There were approximately 25 to 27 milk producers on the route, and each day plaintiffs' driver would pick up the milk from each of the producers. He would drive the milk truck up to the producer's dairy barn and put the milk on the truck, the milk being in ten-gallon metal cans. Since the milk was Grade A milk, it was necessary at all times to keep the temperature of the milk below 50 degrees.

After the driver collected the milk from all the producers, he would take the milk to Springdale, Arkansas, where it would be loaded on large semi-trailer trucks belonging to Skelton Brothers, Inc. Milk was taken from there to the defendant dairy's place of business in Dallas, Texas, where it was ultimately sold to consumers.

At Dallas, Texas, the milk would be weighed and graded. Weight tickets would be made out for each producer showing the amount of milk received from him. Also, the milk cans would be washed.

Then the empty milk cans and weight tickets would be returned by semi-trailer truck to Springdale, Arkansas, where they would be picked up by plaintiffs' driver and returned to the producers.

There are approximately 235 Grade A milk producers in Washington County, Arkansas, and of this amount approximately 110 sell their milk to the defendant dairy. The remainder of the Grade A producers sell their milk to other companies, such as College Club and Meadow Gold.

In addition to the Grade A producers, there are approximately 1,500 Grade C milk producers in Washington County, Arkansas.

The defendant dairy employed a field representative in the area, and at the times material herein the defendant, Guy Horner, was the field representative. His duties included the obtaining of new producers, working with the Dallas Health Department in seeing that the requirements of that department were met, and working with the milk producers, particularly in advising them of the equipment, etc., necessary for production of Grade A milk.

7.

Since the milk was ultimately sold in Dallas, Texas, the Health Department of that City employed an inspector who made periodic checks of conditions in Washington County with respect to the handling of the milk in order to determine whether the Grade A requirements were being met. During the time in question Percy J. Leach was the inspector for the City of Dallas. All the producers and haulers of Grade A milk for consumption in Dallas were required to have permits from that City and to comply with the requirements of the Milk Ordinance and Code of the City. Plaintiffs in the instant action had such a permit.

8.

The charge for the hauling of the milk was paid by the producers. The total cost was $1.00 per hundred pounds, 60 cents of that amount being for the haul from Springdale, Arkansas, to Dallas, Texas, and 40 cents being for the milk hauler who picked up the milk from the producers and took it to Springdale.

Plaintiffs, through their employees, began operating the milk route on November 2, 1954, and continued to operate it until January 10, 1956. During that time their service became progressively worse, and they received many complaints from producers. A few of the producers even made trips to the home of the plaintiff, Wayne Whiteley, in Westville, Oklahoma, to discuss various complaints. Among other things the producers complained that plaintiffs spilled substantial amounts of milk; failed to return weight tickets in order that the producers would have a record of the milk sold by them; lost the producers' milk cans; mixed up the milk cans and lids of different producers; returned the cans in a dirty condition; picked up the milk at irregular hours, thus making it difficult to keep the milk at proper temperatures; allowed the trucks to become dirty; failed to put the empty cans in proper racks; and were generally negligent and unsanitary.

In addition to registering complaints with plaintiffs, a substantial majority of the producers also complained to the defendant, Guy Horner, to the inspector, Percy Leach, and apparently to anyone else who might be able to do anything about the unsatisfactory situation.

Keith Skelton (who was originally a defendant in this action) operated a milk route near the route being operated by plaintiffs. A number of the producers on plaintiffs' route talked to Skelton and attempted to get him to haul their milk. At first Skelton refused to do so, since the producers were not on his route and since his route was already full.

As a general rule a milk hauler will not invade the territory of another milk hauler who is hauling milk to the same company.

Some of the producers contacted the defendant Horner and requested him to obtain a new hauler. Some of them recommended that he get Keith Skelton as a hauler.

The producers did not care who hauled their milk as long as the hauling was done properly.

10.

In the latter part of 1955 plaintiffs had negotiations with Carl Ishmael concerning the possible sale of the milk route by plaintiffs to Ishmael. Ishmael contacted the defendant Horner, and was advised that said defendant had no objection to Ishmael's purchase of the milk route. However, Ishmael was unable to raise the money and the sale was never consummated.

Around the last of December, 1955, or first of January, 1956, the inspector, Leach, after having failed in previous attempts to get plaintiffs to comply with all pertinent regulations, informed the defendant Horner that he was going to suspend plaintiffs' permit. As a result of this information from Leach and the various requests from producers, Horner arranged with Keith Skelton or Skelton Brothers, Inc., to have said Skelton begin picking up milk on the route in question on Tuesday, January 10, 1956.

In the meantime, plaintiffs had been negotiating with Robert Oxford for the sale of the milk route to the said Oxford. Oxford tentatively agreed to pay $7,500 for the route and equipment. He was of the opinion that the equipment was worth approximately $3,500, and the remainder of the purchase price would have been for the route. On Sunday, January 8, Oxford contacted the defendant Horner to ascertain whether he had any objection to Oxford's purchase of plaintiffs' route. The defendant Horner advised Oxford that arrangements had been made for Skelton to operate the route beginning on Tuesday. After receiving this information Oxford did not proceed further with the purchase of the route.

On Monday, January 9, 1956, the plaintiffs went to see the defendant Horner and were told by Horner of the plan to have Skelton operate the route. Plaintiffs stated that they would also operate on the route, but they were advised by Horner that if they did so operate, he would not purchase the milk hauled by them. Plaintiffs also asked the defendant Horner to give them something in writing showing that the route was being taken over by defendant, but Horner refused to do so.

Skelton, in fact, began picking up the milk on January 10, 1956, and plaintiffs made no further effort to pick up milk on this route.

The producers would not have objected to the sale of the route by plaintiffs to Oxford provided Oxford did a proper job of handling their milk.

The producers had been well satisfied with the previous haulers, Reed, Sloan, and Snyder. They have also been well satisfied with the service of Keith Skelton or Skelton Brothers, Inc., since January 10, 1956.

Plaintiffs had no written contract with any of the producers, and in fact did not even contact the producers prior to purchasing the route. Likewise plaintiffs had no written contract with the defendant dairy.

The defendant dairy has never recognized the ownership of a route by a milk hauler.

14.

For various economic reasons producers are usually reluctant to stop selling milk to one company and to begin selling to another.

15.

Skelton Brothers, Inc., or Keith Skelton, now receives from the producers the same amount for picking up and hauling the milk that was received by plaintiffs when they were operating the route. Neither the defendant dairy nor the defendant Horner received any money by reason of the route being taken over by Skelton Brothers, Inc., or Keith Skelton. However, by the change in the haulers, the defendant dairy received assurance that the milk would be delivered in accordance with the requirements of the Dallas Health Department and in such a manner as to meet the specifications of Grade A milk. Likewise the producers were assured of a continuing market for their Grade A milk because of the readiness and willingness of Skelton Brothers, Inc., or Keith Skelton, to meet all requirements in the hauling and handling of Grade A milk.

16.

The plaintiff, Wayne Whiteley, testified that the plaintiffs received a gross income of from $600 to $900 per month while they operated the route. However, there was no positive testimony as to the net income received by plaintiffs but it seemed to be conceded by all parties that they did receive a substantial net income from the operation of the route.

Discussion

[Causes of Action]

Plaintiffs contend that they are entitled to recover against the defendants under either of two theories: (1) the law of conversion, and (2) an intentional invasion or interference by the defendants with the property and property rights of the plaintiffs. Plaintiffs also contend that the defendants acted in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act and plaintiffs are entitled to recover treble damages.

The defendants contend that they did no unlawful or wrongful act and that they are not liable to the plaintiffs under any possible theory of law.

[Sherman Act]

Little need be said with regard to plaintiffs' contention that defendants violated the Sherman Antitrust Act. There was absolutely no evidence that the defendants either intended to or did monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several states. As a matter of fact, insofar as the record shows defendants have not received one ounce more milk since the alleged conversion than they received prior thereto. The only change brought about by the alleged conversion was a change in the person hauling the milk, and the new hauler was not shown to be an agent or employee of the defendant.

Moreover, the only defendants now before the Court are the corporation, Foremost Dairies, Inc., and its agent, Guy Horner. Plaintiffs' theory is that Horner and the corporation were engaged in a conspiracy in restraint of commerce, but it is well settled that a violation of the conspiracy portions of the Sherman Antitrust Act cannot be committed by a corporation and its agents when said agents are acting for the corporation in the ordinary scope of their duties. Marion County Co-Op Asso. v. Carnation Co., D. C. W. D. Ark. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,556], 114 F. Supp. 58, 63. In the instant case Horner at all times was acting for the defendant dairy, and thus defendants could not be engaged in a conspiracy within the meaning of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

In the last analysis the Court is inclined to agree with the statement in defendants' brief that "the plaintiffs were the architects of their own misfortune". Plaintiffs' own mismanagement of the route was the sole proximate cause of any loss sustained by them, and there is no legal theory by which plaintiffs can shift their loss to the defendants.

Conclusions of Law

1. The Court has jurisdiction of the parties and the subject matter herein.

2. The defendants did not violate the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

3. The defendants did not convert any property owned by plaintiffs and did not invade or interfere with any property or property rights of the plaintiffs.

4. Plaintiffs are entitled to recover nothing of and from the defendants.

5. The complaint of the plaintiffs should be dismissed with prejudice.

A judgment in accordance with the above should be entered.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies — Elements of Unlawful Conspiracy — Conspiracy Within Single Corporation.—A manufacturer's counterclaim alleging that a corporate distributor conspired with two of its officers to disrupt its business of manufacturing metal bed frames was held insufficient since a conspiracy was not alleged. A corporation cannot conspire with its own agents, that is, it cannot conspire with itself. Legally, no conspiracy was pleaded, there being no allegation of monopoly on the part of the distributor.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.400.

For the defendants: Jack H. Hantman, and Mendelsohn, Krotinger & Lane (Myron N. Krotinger, of counsel).

[Motion]

BYERS, District Judge [In full text]: Here the defendant, Harvard Manufacturing Company, to be called Harvard, seeks leave to file an amended answer and counterclaim, in a diversity of citizenship action which purports to assert a Sherman Act conspiracy on the part of Harvard, and two individuals described in an affidavit as their New York sales representatives.

The complaint was filed January 25, 1957.

[Proposed Pleading]

The proposed pleading contains a prolix assertion in which much evidentiary matters are set forth, to the general effect that the plaintiff and two of its officers, Stillman by name, entered into a tortious conspiracy to injure Harvard, i.e., to effect a disruption of its business in the Metropolitan area.

It is said (Para. 9(o)) that the filing of this suit by the plaintiff was in pursuance of the alleged conspiracy.

It is also sought to bring in the two Stillmans as additional parties.

The somewhat complex recitals in the various papers can thus be stated in lowest terms.

Harvard is an Ohio corporation which manufactures a metal bed frame.

The plaintiff, Hudson etc. Co., to be called Hudson, a New Jersey corporation, has been distributing the Harvard product in New Jersey, apparently under a special agreement; whether that was written does not appear, nor whether it was limited in duration or territory.

Sedgwick Furniture Corp., a New York corporation, is also a distributor of the Harvard product in New York, but again the terms and conditions of the relationship are not disclosed.

Seemingly in 1956 Hudson, the plaintiff, successfully sought to do business in New York, in the Harvard product, through a clandestine arrangement involving one Francois and an alleged secret partnership with an undisclosed resident of Brooklyn.

This activity interfered with Sedgwick's business, and was protested to Hudson by the individual defendants Segal.

Seemingly the friction so engendered between Hudson and Sedgwick was deemed by Harvard to be inimical to its general pattern of distribution.

The matter was discussed between Hudson and Harvard, but was not adjusted. In November of 1956 Harvard in effect discontinued relations with Hudson. Why it was not entirely free to do so is not disclosed or even discussed in the papers now before the court.

[Complaint]

Hudson filed this complaint as stated, charging a conspiracy on the part of the defendants named, to eliminate Hudson as a competitor of Sedgwick in the business of selling Harvard products.

[Original Answer]

The original answer of Harvard and the Segals is said to have been filed on February 20, 1957, but the Clerk's Office seems to contain no such pleading.

[Conspiracy Within Corporation]

Sufficient for present purposes has been stated concerning the proposed counterclaim. As to the conspiracy aspect of Paragraph 8, it will be seen that Hudson is charged with conspiring with its own officers and directors, the Stillmans; in other words, with itself. Legally, no conspiracy is thus pleaded, there being no allegation of monopoly on the part of the plaintiff.

See Nelson etc. v. Motorola etc. [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,386], 200 Fed. (2) 911; Cott etc. v. Canada Dry etc. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,699], 146 Fed. Supp. 300.

[Other Allegations]

The subject matter of paragraph 9, subdivisions (a), (b), (c), (d) and (f) are properly matters of defense. Other matters in this paragraph are largely evidentiary and do not tender issues respecting the alleged conspiracy attributed to Hudson.

[Counterclaim Insufficient]

It thus appears that the opposition to the proposed counterclaim must be sustained.

Since the only reason for adding the Stillmans as individual defendants, is to identify them as parties to an alleged conspiracy with the corporation of which they are officers and directors, that aspect of the motion is also denied.

Settle order.

In the United States District Court for the District of Connecticut. Civil Action No. 6408. Filed June 19, 1957.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Practices—Acquisition of Assets of Competitor—Legality.—A publisher of an automobile repair cost manual and other publications did not violate Section 1 of the Sherman Act when it acquired all of the assets of a publisher of a competing automobile repair cost manual and discontinued the publication of its own manual. The merger did not result in an unreasonable restraint on commerce. Competition remained vigorous after the merger, and the merger did not put the acquiring publisher in a position of dominance in the trade to affect its flow, to divert it, or to dictate prices. The probable immediate consequence of the merger was to spur improvement of the product sold by competitors. The fact that the acquiring publisher refused to deal with a distributor of the acquired publisher after the merger was not sufficient to constitute a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.600, 2005.785.

Monopolies—Monopolization, Attempt To Monopolize, Conspiracy To Monopolize—Acquisition of Assets of Competitor—Legality.—A publisher of an automobile repair cost manual and other publications did not violate Section 2 of the Sherman Act when it acquired all of the assets of a publisher of a competing automobile repair cost manual. The acquiring publisher, as a result of the merger, acquired no power to fix prices or to exclude competition, nor could it lessen quality or restrict production throughout the industry in the relevant market. Furthermore, the acquiring company did not exercise or attempt to exercise the power to compel the acquired publisher to choose between selling out or being run out of business. There was no attempt to monopolize because there was no evidence that the publisher intended to use the acquisition itself to monopolize the field. Although the two publishers acted in agreement in bringing about the merger, their actions and purposes were not those of a conspiracy to monopolize the field. They neither expected nor intended to dominate the field. The refusal of the acquiring company to sell its new manual to a person who had been a distributor of the acquired company was not unlawful. The acquiring company had its own sales staff and no longer needed a distributor through which to make its sales, and it had no dominance in the field nor price fixing purpose.

See Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2510.500, 2515.40, 2520.30, 2610.120, 2610.720.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Acquisitions of Stock or Assets—Asset Acquisition—Applicability of Clayton Act to Acquisition of Individually Owned Assets—Corporate Assets Constituting Insignificant Part of Sale.—A corporate publisher of an automobile repair cost manual and other publications did not violate Section 7 of the Clayton Act when it acquired all of the assets of an unincorporated publisher of a competing automobile repair cost manual. Sec. 7 was not applicable since it applies only to the acquisition by a corporation of the stock or assets of another corporation. The assets acquired by the corporate publisher were those of an individual and not those of a corporation. There was insufficient evidence that a sales corporation, which was created by the individual publisher, owned some of the assets which eventually went to the corporate publisher as a result of the merger. In view of the nature and function of this corporation and the circumstances surrounding its existence, it was concluded that this ancillary and wholly dependent entity was not the kind of corporate entity, nor was its temporary handling of any of the individual's business property the kind of ownership of assets, contemplated by Congress for the purposes of Section 7. The corporation neither owned nor transferred to the corporate publisher any assets which were of any significance. However, this does not mean that a family corporation or a corporation owned or controlled by a single individual is not subject to this section of the Clayton Act.

For the plaintiff: Lewis E. Caplan, of Caplan & Garvey, New Haven, Conn.

For the defendant: Morris Tyler, New Haven, Conn.

Findings of Fact

[Nature of Publications]

ROBERT P. ANDERSON, District Judge [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: 1. In 1953 Edmund J. Riedl of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, individually, under the trade name of Crash Book Service, published and offered for sale to those interested in current costs of automobile repairs, a reporting service in the form of a loose-leaf book entitled Crash Book Service.

2. At that time and at all times up to October 10, 1956 there were four competing publications: Motor's Body Shop Flat Rate and Parts, published by the defendant; National Parts and Labor; Chilton; and Glenn-Mitchell.

3. Glenn-Mitchell was distributed almost entirely in western states with very few subscribers in the east.

4. Only Crash Book Service and National Parts and Labor were loose-leaf; and Crash Book was distinguishable from the others by presenting all necessary cost items for parts and labor for each model of each kind of car for a particular year on one page and by furnishing revisions containing current price corrections at least once each month and more frequently if necessary. The other publications made such corrections at longer intervals.

5. The principal users of these publications were insurance companies, automobile repair shops and automobile damage appraisers.

6. Early in December 1953 the plaintiff, who was an expert automobile damage appraiser and who was forty years of age, became a part-time distributor of Crash Book Service. He continued in this status until October 1, 1954 when he was persuaded by Riedl to give up his well paying appraisal work to become a full time distributor of Crash Book Service.

7. The plaintiff thereafter devoted his full time and effort to this work until October 8-10, 1956. He had three full time and twenty part time employees or agents.

8. The distributorship agreement between the plaintiff and Riedl, at its inception, was partly established through letters and partly through oral conversations. On April 20, 1955 Riedl drafted in letter form and sent to the plaintiff a detailed statement of the terms of the distributorship agreement (Plaintiff's Exhibit B). This was signed by Riedl but, although written acceptance was added for the plaintiff's signature, he would not sign it at that time without certain modifications as to the territory which in Riedl's letter was described as follows:

> " . . . on the north by the Canadian border; on the south by the state line separating Virginia and North Carolina and on the west by a straight line drawn south from the point where Lake Champlain meets the Canadian border, continuing south through Harrisburg, Pennsylvania and continuing south from there to the point where it would intersect the state line dividing Virginia and North Carolina."

9. Shortly thereafter the plaintiff and Riedl orally agreed upon an amendment of the territorial provision by adding western New York State, exclusive of the City of Buffalo. The plaintiff agreed to sign the agreement as amended, but Riedl said it was not necessary. The terms set forth in Riedl's letter of April 20, 1955 with the amendment as to territory then became the contract between Riedl and the plaintiff concerning the plaintiff's distributorship; and, except for a minor modification relative to handling and recording of renewals by the home office of Crash Book Service in Milwaukee instead of by the plaintiff at his office in Guilford, Connecticut, this contract remained operative until October 6, 1956.

10. In effect the agreement substantially put into express terms what the plaintiff and Riedl had been doing since October 1, 1954.

11. The pertinent provisions of the agreement for the purpose of this case include: the territorial limits of the distributorship; the retail price for the service of $25. with $20. for renewals, and the price to the distributor of $15. apiece for both original and renewal subscriptions which carried one year of revision service; special wholesale prices for volume sales for which the distributor received $3. per volume on original sales and $1. on renewals; and a special retail price limit of $20. for the original and $17.50 for renewal by an insurance company in automobile damage claim work and the same for appraisers of automobile damage.

12. The agreement was to continue so long as the distributor remained active in his territory to be evidenced by maintaining a reasonable number of subscribers. Upon the death of a distributor the agreement terminated, but the distributor's widow and children were to be paid for a period of two years following the distributor's death a distributor's share of the return from renewals of sales made by the decedent in his lifetime. A distributor could withdraw from his distributorship and thereafter would be entitled to his share of the return from renewals for one year. There were general provisions concerning records, accounting, handling of Crash Books on consignment and on open account, etc.

[Volume of Sales]

13. As of October 1, 1954 in the territory covered by the plaintiff's distributorship: 99% of Insurance Companies used National Parts & Labor; 20-25% of Automobile Repair Shops and Appraisers used Chilton; 50-60% of Automobile Repair Shops and Appraisers used National Parts & Labor; 20-25% of Automobile Repair Shops and Appraisers used Motor's Body Shop Flat Rate and Parts; and 1% of Automobile Repair Shops and Appraisers used Glenn-Mitchell.

14. As of October 1, 1956 in the territory covered by the plaintiff's distributorship: 90% of Insurance Companies used National Parts & Labor; 10% of Insurance Companies used Crash Book Service; 25-30% of Automobile Repair Shops and Appraisers used National Parts & Labor; 50% of Automobile Repair Shops and Appraisers used Crash Book Service; 10% of Automobile Repair Shops and Appraisers used Chilton; 10% of Automobile Repair Shops and Appraisers used Motor's Body Shop Flat Rate and Parts; and 1-2% of Automobile Repair Shops and Appraisers used Glenn-Mitchell.

15. The plaintiff in his territory during 1953 sold 64 Crash Book Services, in 1954 he sold 275 Crash Book Services, in 1955 he sold 1725, and between January 1 and August 31, 1956 he sold 1850. There were also renewals which annually ran in excess of 75% of the Crash Book Services outstanding at the end of the previous year.

16. The total national outstanding distributions of Crash Book Service for the period January 1, 1956 to October 1, 1956 was 6891 of which approximately 3755 were sales by the plaintiff in his territory.

17. In 1953 Riedl doing business as Crash Book Service lost $5053.83; in 1954 he made a profit of $684.31; in 1955 he made a profit of $22,317.18; and for the first six months of 1956 he made a profit of $30,818.36.

18. The approximate total national circulation of each of the publications in this field on October 1, 1956 was: National Parts and Labor—30,000; Chilton—10,000; defendant's Motor Body Shop and Flat Rate Manual—10,000; Glenn Mitchell—7500; and Crash Book Service—7000.

19. Of the individuals or corporations producing these publications all except Riedl sold the publication as only one of a multiple line of publications designed for sale to the automotive trade.

20. It was a part of the understanding between Riedl and the plaintiff in establishing plaintiff's distributorship that it would be to their mutual advantage in quickly achieving a wide distribution of Crash Book Service for the plaintiff to give to his agents the whole or a substantial part of the commissions on the original sales and to depend, himself, upon getting his return from renewals.

21. Riedl represented to the plaintiff that selling Crash Book Service was like selling insurance, that in the first few years the plaintiff would not make any money but that the percentage of renewals was very high and after the first few years the plaintiff would make his money from the repeat business.

22. The plaintiff, therefore, ploughed back into the distributorship all of his profit by paying large commissions to his salesmen and incurring other expenses in pushing the distribution of Crash Book Service so that by September 30, 1956 his two years of full time work showed a cash loss of a few hundred dollars but he had produced over a half of all of Crash Book Service sales.

[Sales Corporation]

23. In March of 1956 Riedl organized a corporation under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, named Crash Book Sales, Inc.

24. Riedl intended that temporarily and on an experimental basis the corporation would act as sole sales agent for Crash Book Service. It did some printing and it gathered together in the loose-leaf folders material prepared and owned by Crash Book Service; it mailed the volumes out to subscribers and took care of accounts with subscribers. It retained as a commission for performing these functions the difference between what it collected from a subscriber and what it paid to Crash Book Service, which in an ordinary transaction were respectively $25. and $16. It had the use of Crash Book Service's subscription and renewal records and lists. It did not act as agent for sales made by plaintiff's distributorship.

25. Riedl's purposes in experimenting with the corporate entity were to attempt to achieve tax savings for himself and to divert income to members of his immediate family.

26. The corporation owned nothing by way of tangible property and only $1,000, was paid in for its organization. It was owned by Riedl and the members of his immediate family and was wholly under his control. It had the sole right as agent to sell Crash Book Service except for plaintiff's distributorship but Riedl could revoke this agency at will. Riedl decided to terminate its existence at the time an agreement was made with the defendant on September 25, 1956 and it was dissolved in October 1956.

[Defendant's Acquisition]

27. In March 1956 the defendant Hearst Corporation concluded that its Motor Body Shop and Flat Rate manual was not meeting the needs of subscribers; and it decided to discontinue it in its then existing form and to put out in place of it a loose-leaf volume with costs of parts and labor for particular automobiles quickly ascertainable and with monthly revisions.

28. The defendant estimated that it would take about two years to accomplish this change to produce a manual similar to that of Crash Book Service, which it considered the best of that type of publication. To obviate this delay and avoid the adverse effect of competition meanwhile, the defendant, which put out many publications and had resources running into many millions of dollars, decided to negotiate with Riedl, a small independent publisher with a single line product, to purchase Crash Book Service.

29. Negotiations with this end in view were commenced in May 1956 and culminated in a written contract for the sale of Crash Book Service to the defendant, entered into, drafted and executed at Milwaukee, Wisconsin on September 25, 1956.

30. In the course of the negotiations the defendant learned that while Riedl was fully aware that Crash Book Service had become overwhelmingly successful and was rapidly taking business away from its competitors, he was very fearful of the ultimate competition which he would have to meet when the other publishers in the field adopted in their own manuals the unique advantages which Crash Book Service possessed. The competitors had already adopted plans to change their publications by incorporating these advantageous features as soon as they could do so.

31. The defendant concurred in the prospect for competition from other publishers and mentioned its own plans for a new manual. It persuaded Riedl that with Crash Book Service in the defendant's hands with its very large sales force covering the whole country with multiple lines of publications, they could get ahead of the competition.

32. Under the contract Riedl received $42,500 for the trade names, copyrights, technical data, records and printed forms and good will; the defendant received an option to purchase the furniture and equipment. It agreed to pay Riedl a royalty of fifty cents per volume for Crash Book Service sold for the next ten years or until the payments totalled $100,000. whichever might first occur, and to hire Riedl as editor for two years at a salary of $10,000. per year.

[Termination of Distributorship]

33. In the course of the negotiations between May and September 25, 1956, the defendant learned of the distributorship contract existing between Riedl and the plaintiff and was familiar with its terms.

34. Although Riedl made some effort to preserve the rights of the plaintiff and some others to continue to deal in Crash Book Services, the defendant induced Riedl to repudiate his contract with the plaintiff.

35. Riedl was induced to breach the distributorship agreement with the plaintiff by the considerations given Riedl by the defendant in the contract of September 25, 1956 for the purchase of Crash Book Service and by a specific provision therein that the defendant would pay up to $2500. on any amount recovered by the plaintiff in any legal action against Riedl brought by the plaintiff on the claim arising out of his distributorship agreement, and the defendant further agreed to defend such action and if this occurred, Riedl agreed to assign to the defendant any claims Riedl had against the plaintiff.

36. The defendant, at the time it induced Riedl to repudiate and breach his contract with the plaintiff, knew the number of sales of Crash Book Service made by the plaintiff in his territory and knew the number of subscriptions then and there in force.

37. The defendant also knew that the plaintiff had a reasonable expectancy of profit from the renewals of these outstanding subscriptions in his territory and a probable return of substantial proportions. It also knew that the plaintiff had a reasonable expectancy of and probable profits from additional sales in his territory.

38. By the terms of the contract of September 25, 1956 with Riedl, the defendant became entitled to the portion of the profit on the renewals of outstanding subscriptions which otherwise would have gone to the plaintiff.

39. The defendant induced the breach of Riedl's contract with the plaintiff wilfully and maliciously and with the specific intent of garnering for itself the harvest which the plaintiff in more than two years of work and sacrifice of profit had labored to prepare. It was the defendant's purpose to gain for itself the very benefits which were insured to the plaintiff by the contract.

40. The plaintiff was not notified of the sale of Crash Book Service by Riedl to the defendant or of Riedl's repudiation of the distributorship agreement with the plaintiff until sometime shortly after October 6, 1956.

41. Upon acquiring Crash Book Service, the defendant changed the name of the service and the title on the volumes to "Motor's Crash Book Service" and on October 11, 1956 the defendant sent written notices to all subscribers for Crash Book Service, including the plaintiff's customers, concerning the change of name and instructing them to have no subscription dealings with or to pay any money due to anyone other than an authorized representative of Motor. The defendant refused to deal with the plaintiff.

42. The plaintiff was neither paid nor credited with any of the profit due him on renewals under his contract with Riedl after August 31, 1956.

43. The plaintiff at the time of the breach had Crash Book Service volumes in his possession on consignment all of which together were carried as an inventory of $4,275.00.

44. The action of Riedl and the defendant in changing the name of the service and the title of the volumes, in causing the breach of the distribution contract, and in refusing to deal with the plaintiff and furnish him revision material rendered these volumes obsolete, in whole or in part, and of no value.

45. On September 25, 1956 the plaintiff was continuing to fulfill his duties under his distribution contract with Riedl and he had done nothing during the life of the contract to cause a breach thereof or to terminate said contract or justify a repudiation by Riedl or to participate in or work a rescission of said contract.

Conclusions

1. As to all four counts the court has jurisdiction of the subject matter and the parties.

2. As to the first count it is concluded that a valid and enforceable contract existed between the plaintiff and Edmund J. Riedl on September 25, 1956; that the defendant on said date wilfully and maliciously, without justification or excuse, induced Riedl to breach that contract in consequence of which the plaintiff has been damaged in the amount of $87,500.00. Judgment may enter for said sum with interest from September 25, 1956 and costs in favor of the plaintiff.

3. Damages provide an adequate remedy for the violation of the plaintiff's rights as alleged and proved under the first count.

4. The second count may be dismissed without costs.

5. As to counts three and four it is concluded that the defendant did not violate any of the provisions of the Sherman Act or the Clayton Act and those counts may be dismissed without costs.

Discussion

[Causes of Action]

The complaint is in four counts. Recovery is granted on the first count and the other three are dismissed; the third and fourth for insufficient supporting evidence and the second, because it is largely repetitious of the first which alleges a cause of action for tortious inducement of a breach of contract. The evidence amply supports the plaintiff's claim.

[Antitrust Claims]

Counts three and four describe causes of action based upon alleged violations of Section 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U. S. C. A. Sections 1 and 2) and the 1950 Amendment to Section 7 of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C. A. Section 18). It has been concluded that the evidence did not fully support the claims made in these two counts and they are dismissed.

[Restraint of Trade]

As to Section 1 of the Sherman Act it is apparent that the merger of Crash Book Service into the defendant corporation did not result in an unreasonable restraint on commerce among the states. The area of effective competition between Bender's Crash Book Service and the defendant's Motor Body Shop Flat Rate and Parts market consisted of those states in the plaintiff's distributorship territory, the remaining portions of states a part of which was in the plaintiff's territory, and Arizona, Colorado, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Ohio, Tennessee, Texas and Wisconsin. As a result of the merger Motor Body Shop Flat Rate and Parts has been eliminated and Crash Book Service is now distributed in the District of Columbia and in all of the states except Montana and is now pitted in competition in a nation-wide market against National Parts and Labor, the leader in this field, and against Chilton and, in the west against Glenn-Mitchell. Following the merger Crash Book Service, with Motor's Body Shop Flat Rate and Parts eliminated, constituted about 28% of the national market. But even in the relevant market area where, as may be inferred from distributorship area and nation-wide sales figures, Crash Book Service prior to the merger had made significant inroads on the older publications, there was still a vigorous competition left. This was also true of the nation-wide competition after the merger. Moreover, competitors were in the process of changing their publications to include the advantageous features of Crash Book and by late 1957 or shortly thereafter Motor's Crash Book Service could look forward to intensified competition. Riedl and the defendant in merging brought together Riedl's superior product with the defendant's nation-wide sales force, which could distribute Crash Book Service much more cheaply than Riedl could because defendant's salesmen handled several other publications at the same time, and defendant's other publications could be used as advertising media for Crash Book Service. It was this awareness of mutual advantage which ultimately brought about the merger.

The combination gave Motor's Crash Book Service a temporary jump on others in the field. But it did not put the defendant in a position of dominance in the trade to affect its flow or to divert it or restrain it or to dictate prices, and its probable immediate consequence was to spur improvement of the product sold by competitors. With the continued increase in motor vehicles on the highways, it appears that there was at the time of the merger an expanding market with an increase in consumer demand. There is nothing to indicate that the defendant had acquired any control over the sources of supply to meet that demand.

After the merger, as before, consumers could get as many Crash Book Services or competitors services as they wanted even though the plaintiff was no longer able to sell Crash Book Service. Violated as the plaintiff's rights were, there was no unreasonable restraint of trade under Section 1 of the Sherman Act. United States v. Columbia Steel Co. [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,260], 334 U. S. 495, 527.

The fact that Motor's Body Shop Flat Rate and Parts was discontinued, the fact that its planned successor in imitation of Crash Book Service never saw the light of day and thus never got into competition, and the fact that the defendant after the merger refused to deal with the plaintiff are not sufficient in the circumstances of this case to constitute a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. These conditions did not have sufficient harmful effect on freedom of commerce and vigor of competition in the auto body manual industry in the relevant market to be regarded as "restraint of trade or commerce" within the intent of Section 1. United States v. Columbia Steel Co., supra; Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,039], 310 U. S. 469, 493; Standard Oil of New Jersey v. United States, 221 U. S. 1.

[Monopoly]

With regard to the allegations under Section 2 of the Sherman Act, it does not appear that the defendant has by the merger monopolized or attempted to monopolize or combined or conspired to do so. The defendant, as a result of the merger, acquired no power to fix prices or to exclude competition, United States v. E. I. DuPont de Nemours & Co. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,369], 351 U. S. 377, 389; American Tobacco Co. v. United States [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,468], 328 U. S. 781; nor could it lessen quality or restrict production throughout the industry in the relevant market. Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,039], 310 U. S. 469. While an effect of the merger was to eliminate Riedl as a competitor, this came about through negotiation and an agreement voluntarily entered into for business reasons of mutual advantage. Defendant neither had nor attempted to exercise the power to compel Riedl to choose between selling out or being run out of business.

Nor is there any evidence here of an attempt to monopolize. Since it has been found that there was no monopolization, a finding of an attempt to monopolize would have to rest on a showing that there was a plan to reach out beyond this acquisition by additional mergers or the equivalent or that the defendants intended to use the acquisition itself to monopolize even though it did not in fact achieve its goal. United States v. Griffith [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,246], 334 U. S. 100, 107; United States v. Columbia Steel Co., 334 U. S. 495 [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,260], 531-33; United States v. Aluminum Co. of America [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,342], 148 F. 2d 416. 431-432 (2nd Cir. 1945). Similarly, though Riedl and the defendant acted in agreement, their actions and purposes were not those of a conspiracy to monopolize the auto body manual industry. They neither expected nor intended to dominate that field.

Defendant's refusal to sell its particular publication to plaintiff in wholesale lots is the ordinary business consequence of the fact that it has its own sales staff. Here defendant has no dominance of the industry nor price-fixing purpose such as existed in Eastman Kodak Co. v. Southern Photo Materials Co., 273 U. S. 359. Moreover, Hearst was never contractually obligated to Bender and appears from the evidence not to deal at all through distributors but rather entirely through employee-salesmen.

There is not apparent in the evidence concerning this merger and its surrounding circumstances anything from which it can be said that there is a violation of Sections 1 or 2 of the Sherman Act.

[Applicability of Clayton Act]

Section 7 of the Clayton Act does not apply to this case as the provisions of the section extend only to the acquisition by a corporation of the stock or assets of another corporation. The assets conveyed by Riedl to the defendant were owned by Riedl as an individual; and Congress did not include within the terms of this statute the transfers of individually owned assets to a corporation. There was Crash Book Sales Inc. which, the plaintiff claims, owned some assets which eventually went to the defendant as a result of the merger, but there is not sufficient evidence to find this. Crash Book Sales Inc. was organized as an experiment to be tried out for a short while by Riedl. It was designed to act as sole distributor and sales agent. It collected accounts receivable which were owned by Riedl, doing business as Crash Book Service. In anything it did, it was really acting as agent for Riedl, an individual. It was entirely his creature and separated from him, as Crash Book Service, it had no life. The contract which gave it sustenance could be cancelled by Riedl on ten days notice. Considering the nature and function of this corporation and the circumstances surrounding its existence, it must be concluded that this ancillary and wholly dependent entity unable to stand on its own feet, was not the kind of corporate entity nor was its temporary handling of any of Riedl's Crash Book Service property the kind of ownership of assets contemplated by Congress for the purposes of Section 7 of the Clayton Act. This is not to say that a family corporation or a corporation owned or controlled by a single individual is not within the terms of the Clayton Act. Such is by no means the law. The distinguishing characteristics of Crash Book Sales Inc. which remove it from the application of the statute are its temporary, limited functions as an agent for Riedl coupled with the fact that it neither owned nor transferred to the defendant any assets which were of any significance as sinews of war in the field of trade and competition involved.

Except for this it is apparent that this case would fall within that class of mergers which have not attained the effects which bring them within the provisions of the Sherman Act, but which may have the effect of substantially lessening competition within the terms of the 1950 amendment to Section 7 of the Clayton Act. Transamerica Corp. v. Board of Governors of Federal Reserve System [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,536], 206 F. 2d 163, 169 (3rd Cir. 1953); Hamilton Watch Co. v. Benrus Watch Co. [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,485], 114 F. IV

[Price Fixing Practices]

The defendants are jointly and severally enjoined and restrained from entering into, adhering to, maintaining or furthering, directly or indirectly, any contract, agreement, understanding, plan or program among themselves or with any other person to:

(A) Control, fix, raise, adopt, stabilize or maintain prices, mark-ups, margins of profit, terms or conditions at which alcoholic beverages are sold or offered for sale to third persons;

V

Each of the defendant retailers is enjoined and restrained from maintaining, posting, or adhering to any price lists or

Clayton Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Plaintiffs—Assignor of Antitrust Claims.—An individual who assigned his claimed rights in causes of action under the Sherman Act to a corporation was a proper party plaintiff in the corporation's suit based on the assigned claims. The retention, in the corporation's suit, of the individual as a plaintiff and of claims made on behalf of the individual could not prejudice the defendants. The individual had asserted that the assignment to the corporation might be invalid.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9005.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages and Injunctive Relief—Pretrial Procedures—Striking Immaterial or Prejudicial Matters—Claims on Behalf of Public and Historical Material.—Where a retailer's complaint alleged past and future damages to itself and also sought injunctive relief in favor of all retail customers of the defendant, a motion to dismiss the complaint on the ground that it set forth claims on behalf of the public was denied. The paragraphs of the complaint concerning injury and damages related to the retailer alone, and the prayer for injunctive relief also was made in favor of the retailer. Also, motions to strike portions of the complaint purportedly dealing with claims made on behalf of the public and dealing with the defendants' operations in other areas of the country were denied since no prejudice to the defendants was shown.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9013.595, 9022.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Evidence—Government Antitrust Consent Decree.—In a suit for treble damages, it was improper to allege in the complaint that a consent decree had been entered against the defendant in a Government antitrust action since Section 5 of the Clayton Act prevents the consent decree from being used as prima facie evidence against the defendant. Also, it was held that a date may be used in place of a reference to the decree for the purpose of indicating the point of time when the defendant ceased certain acts, and that the use of the decree as an admission against interest was an evidentiary matter and should be left to the discretion of the trial court.

[Defendants' Motion]

GREGORY F. NOONAN, District Judge [In full text]: Defendants herein have moved this court pursuant to Rules 12(b)(6) and 12(f) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U. S. C., for an order dismissing the complaint in part, and/or striking certain portions of the complaint in the plaintiffs' private anti-trust suit.

Specifically, and in addition to a general prayer for relief, the defendants seek:

1. To dismiss the complaint insofar as it asserts a claim on behalf of plaintiff Michael Schwartz, on the ground that Mr. Schwartz, prior to the commencement of this action, assigned all claims herein to the corporate plaintiff;

2. To dismiss the complaint insofar as it purports to set forth a claim on behalf of the public, on the ground that plaintiffs have no right to sue therefor;

3. To strike from the complaint certain portions thereof alleging claims on behalf of the public, as immaterial and prejudicial;

4. To strike from the complaint certain portions thereof on the ground of immateriality and prejudice; and

5. To strike from the complaint portions thereof on the ground of immateriality and prejudice, and as being outside the scope of Section 5 of the Clayton Act.

[Assignor as Proper Party]

Taking these motions seriatim, we turn first to the motion to dismiss as to Michael Schwartz. He asserts that although he intended and attempted to assign his rights in the causes of action to the corporate plaintiff, such assignment may not have been valid in law. At all events, he asserts, he is at least a "proper party" to the action and his retention as a party cannot possibly prejudice the defendants. The court agrees.

While a treble damage action under the Sherman Act appears to this court to be lawfully assignable, it is possible that for some reason, the assignment herein may have been invalid. At any rate, no harm can befall the defendants by the retention of the individual plaintiff as a party herein; in fact, as urged by that party, the defendants not only are not prejudiced thereby, they are protected against a possible future action by the individual plaintiff, and hence are assured of litigating the claim once and for all at this time. This portion of defendants' motion should be denied.

[Relief in Favor of Others]

In the second phase of their motion, the defendants urge that plaintiffs are attempting to set forth claims on behalf of the public. This clearly may not be done, but the plaintiffs deny that any such claims are made.

While it is true that the paragraphs alleging injury and damage (pars. 42, 43 and 44) allege past and future damages to the plaintiffs, and seek treble damages in favor of the plaintiffs certain sections of the plaintiffs' "wherefore" clause seek injunctive relief in favor of all retail store customers (Sections 3 through 6 thereof), and a large portion of the complaint deals with the defendants' relations with others.

Inasmuch as those paragraphs of the complaint concerning injury and damages assert such to the plaintiffs alone, and since the "wherefore" clause does seek relief in favor of the plaintiffs themselves, we do not believe that the complaint should be dismissed as failing to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.

In the recent case of Radovich v. National Football League [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,628], 352 U. S. 445, at page 453, the Supreme Court, in discussing technical objections to the pleading therein, quoted from the opinion of Mr. Justice Holmes in Hart v. B. F. Keith Vaudeville Exchange, 262 U. S. 271, 274, to the effect that, "we are not prepared to say that nothing can be extracted from this bill that falls under the act of Congress * * *". Clearly such broad wording is sufficient to sustain the plaintiffs' position and this portion of defendants' motion should be denied.

The third part of the motion seeks to strike certain portions of the complaint (on the ground of immateriality) purportedly dealing with claims made on behalf of the public and of the plaintiff Michael Schwartz. Penetrating the verbiage, and based on past experience with these types of cases, it is apparent that the plaintiffs are asserting as broad a claim as possible in order to justify future requests for extremely broad discovery proceedings, and the defendants are seeking to limit the complaint in order to avoid having to open huge portions of their business records to hostile scrutiny.

Insofar as this motion deals with the claim of Mr. Schwartz, that portion was dealt with earlier.

Insofar as it deals with claims purportedly made for the benefit of the public, it is the opinion of this court that the portions thus attacked do not prejudice the defendants. Although the defendants state that these allegations are prejudicial, they do not state in what way they are, and no such prejudice appears evident to the court.

Insofar as the motion attempts to have stricken those portions of the "wherefore" clause referred to earlier herein as dealing with relief to other retail customers, the defendants can be sure that any relief that ultimately may be granted to these plaintiffs will be only that to which the court concludes they are entitled.

> "It cannot be said that the allegations have no relation to the controversy or that a failure to strike will unduly prejudice the defendants."

Citrin v. Greater New York Industries, 79 F. Supp. 692, 696.

> "Matter will not be stricken from a pleading unless it is clear that it can have no possible bearing upon the subject matter of the litigation. If there is any doubt as to whether under any contingency the matter may raise an issue, the motion should be denied."

American TCP Corporation v. Shell Oil Company [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,938], 127 F. Supp. 208, 209, quoting 2 Moore's Fed. Prac., 2d Ed. (1948) Par. 12.21 (2), pp. 1217-1218.

In this respect, it is regarded as so basic that prejudice must be shown in order to successfully move to strike on such grounds, that the Supplement to the Moore volume page reference set forth above cites several recent cases in point and then states:

> "This proposition is so firmly established in the law that further annotation is deemed unnecessary."

Supplement to Volume 2, p. 189.

Accordingly, the defendants' motion in this respect also should be denied.

[Geographical Scope of Complaint]

The fourth part of the motion seeks to strike certain portions of the complaint, again for alleged immateriality and prejudice, dealing with defendants' operations in other areas of the country.

Again, as in the part of the motion immediately preceding this portion, no prejudice is shown beyond the bare allegation that it exists. The motion and trial judges are well able to prevent abuse of discovery proceedings and introduction of immaterial matter as evidence. Further, the plaintiffs assert that operations in other areas of the country may cut into possible mail order sales.

On the grounds set forth above, the reasoning and authorities given in the preceding paragraphs, and also for the reason that such allegations are permissible as background material in a complaint of this nature, this section of the motion should be denied.

[Consent Decree]

Turning now to the last portion of the motion, seeking to strike from the complaint reference to a consent decree entered in favor of the United States against the first-named defendant, clearly section 5 of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C. Sec. 16) prevents the consent decree from being used as prima facie evidence against that defendant. Prejudice to that defendant is apparent.

Furthermore, while the plaintiffs assert that they refer to the decree largely for convenience in indicating a point of time when the defendant ceased certain acts, and also as a form of admission against interest, the former purpose may be served by using a date in place of the reference to the decree, and the latter function is purely evidentiary and ought best be left to the discretion of the trial judge.

In short, it would appear that no useful purpose is served by the reference, the possibility of prejudice is apparent, and the materiality is not apparent.

[Complaint To Be Amended]

Accordingly, and on the reasoning of Alden-Rochelle v. American Soc. of C. A. & Publishers, 3 F. R. D. 157, the motion to strike that portion of paragraph 41 of the complaint set out in paragraph 5 of the defendants' motion paper should be granted, and the plaintiffs should have leave to amend their complaint, substituting a date in place thereof.

The defendants' motion is denied except as specified in the preceding paragraph, in which respect the motion is granted with leave to the plaintiffs to amend paragraph 41 of their complaint in accordance with this opinion.

So ordered.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Counterclaim for Damages Under Antitrust Laws—Right To File in Patent Infringement Action.—In a patent infringement suit, a trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying the defendants' motion to amend their pleadings to conform to the proof by adding an antitrust damage counterclaim alleging that the plaintiffs had violated the antitrust laws with respect to their patents. While some matters which might be material to the antitrust issue were presented during the trial of the patent issue, the trial court, in denying the motion, ruled that it did not try the antitrust issue. Furthermore, a counterclaim for treble damages under the antitrust laws is permissive in nature so that the failure by a defendant to plead it in a prior patent suit does not bar a subsequent independent suit by the defendant under the antitrust laws.

Opinion of the Court

[Patent-Validity]

Hartigan, Circuit Judge [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: This is an appeal from a judgment of the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts, entered on January 22, 1957, holding plaintiffs' Letters Patent No. 2,667,653 valid and infringed.

* * *

Due to our conclusion that LeFebvre's patent is invalid we need not discuss the findings below as to defendants' infringement of the patent in suit.

[Antitrust Counterclaim]

However, there remains one further question presented by the defendants on appeal.[2] On December 21, 1956, approximately two months after the trial had ended, defendants filed a motion under Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(b) to amend the pleadings to conform to the evidence. This proposed amendment to the pleadings set forth an affirmative defense and counterclaim for damages, alleging, among other things, that plaintiffs had violated the anti-trust laws by cross-licensing with another company on separate patents, including the patent in suit, and simultaneously agreeing not to compete with each other on sales of this mop in the same markets. The district court, after a hearing, denied the motion, stating, "I did not try an anti-trust case. I was sure of that."

[Separate Action Permitted]

It has been stated that "[i]t is ordinarily within the sound discretion of the trial court to permit an amendment to conform to the proof where evidence has been introduced without objection as to facts not presented, or insufficiently presented, by the pleadings." Simms v. Andrews, 118 F. 2d 803, 807 (10 Cir. 1941). Without undertaking a detailed discussion of this point, we believe that here the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendants' motion to amend the pleadings, notwithstanding that in the course of the trial there were presented some items which might be considered material to the anti-trust issue. Certainly the defendants are not prejudiced by our holding since the Supreme Court has clearly stated that a counterclaim for treble damages is permissive in nature so that failure by a defendant to plead it in a prior patent suit does not bar a subsequent independent suit by him under the anti-trust laws. Mercoid Corp. v. Mid-Continent Co. [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,201], 320 U. S. 661 (1944).

A judgment will be entered reversing the judgment of the district court and remanding the case to that court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

New York Fair Trade (Feld-Crawford) Act

Fair Trade—Sales Which May Be Excepted from Price Restrictions—Damaged or Deteriorated Merchandise—Notice to Public.—A manufacturer of fair traded bathing suits was entitled to a temporary injunction restraining a retailer (a nonsigner) from violating the New York Fair Trade Act where it was found that the retailer advertised that the bathing suits were purchased at auction from a company which obtained them as the result of a fire damage claim and that the bathing suits would pass any first quality test, that the retailer offered for sale and sold the bathing suits at less than the manufacturer's fair trade prices, that the bathing suits were not damaged or deteriorated in quality, and that no notice to the public that they were damaged or deteriorated in quality had been given.

Memorandum

[Preliminary Injunction—Motion]

ARCHIE O. DAWSON, District Judge [In full text]: This is a motion for a preliminary injunction to restrain the defendant, its agents, servants and employees from advertising, offering for sale or selling at retail, merchandise bearing the plaintiff's trade-

[2] Although in their answer defendants, alleging that plaintiffs had interfered with their business by threats of infringement, counterclaim for an injunction and other relief, they do not pursue this question on appeal and accordingly we do not consider it.

marks for less than the minimum fair trade prices stipulated in plaintiff's Fair Trade contracts and supplements thereto.

[Findings of Court]

The Court finds the following facts:

1. Subsequent to the enactment of the New York Fair Trade Act (General Business Law § 369 (1940)), plaintiff entered into Fair Trade contracts with retailers of sportswear and swim suits in the State of New York. Thereafter such Fair Trade contracts have been maintained with retailers in the State of New York.

2. The defendant has been advised by the plaintiff and knows that the plaintiff is "fair trading" its bathing suits in the State of New York.

3. On or about May 20, 1957, defendant advertised in various newspapers in the City of New York. A representative advertisement bore the catchline "Bought at Auction! Save 40% to 63%!" and offered bathing suits bearing the trade-marks of various well-known manufacturers with plaintiff's leading the list. As part of the copy, the statement appears that these swim suits were "purchased at auction from the Underwriters Salvage Company, who obtained them as the result of a fire damage claim. We inspected every garment thoroughly and we guarantee that they will pass any first quality test."

4. Thereafter defendant offered for sale and sold certain bathing suits bearing the name and trade-mark of plaintiff at less than fair trade prices; the bathing suits so sold were not damaged or deteriorated in quality, nor was any notice given to the public that they were damaged or deteriorated in quality, but rather, they were advertised to the public as being able to "pass any first quality test."

5. Even after this action was started defendant continued to sell bathing suits bearing plaintiff's name and trade-mark at less than fair trade prices.

[Fair Trade Violation]

The Court concludes that the defendant has, in the State of New York, knowingly advertised, offered for sale and sold certain bathing suits bearing the name and trademark of plaintiff at less than the prices stipulated in the contract or contracts entered into with other retailers pursuant to the provisions of § 369(a) of the General Business Law of the State of New York, and that defendant, therefore, has engaged in unfair competition as defined in § 369(b) of said statute; that defendant continued to practice such unfair competition even after commencement of this action and there is reason to believe that it will continue to do so unless restrained by the Court, and that plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law.

[Injunction To Be Issued]

The Court therefore directs that the injunction as prayed for herein shall be issued and that the stay granted in the order to show cause shall be continued until such injunction is issued.

Settle temporary injunction on notice. The bond shall continue at $5,000.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Equity No. 85-73. Filed June 28, 1957.

Case No. 423 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Injunctive Relief—Injunctive Decrees—Modification—Extension of Period Within Which To Apply for Further Relief.—Where an aluminum company was found to have unlawfully monopolized the aluminum ingot market, the court required certain stockholders of the company to divest themselves of certain stocks, denied the Government's application for divestiture, but granted the Government the right to renew its application for divestiture or to apply for further relief within a five-year period. A subsequent Government application to extend, for an additional five years, the period within which it could apply for divestiture or other relief was denied on the ground that almost every relevant occurrence during the five-year period militated against a determination that the Government was entitled to further relief in the form of an extension of the five-year period. Jurisdiction was assumed under the five-year relief provision rather than under the standard retention of jurisdiction provision. The court ruled that relief other than divestiture could be sought under the five-year relief provision, that the retained jurisdiction of the court was defined by the terms of the judgment and the nature of the relief sought, and that the Government had the burden of proof. The Government had contended that the five years provided for in the relief provision were not typical years, that the company still maintained its superior competitive position, that the industry was still pre-empted, and that the stock disposal relief had proven ineffective.

[Government Motion]

CASHIN, JOHN M., District Judge [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: This is an application by the United States under Section X of the Final Judgment of July 6, 1950 for an order modifying Section VIII of that Final Judgment so as to extend the jurisdiction of this Court an additional five years within which period, if conditions so warrant, the United States may petition this Court for further remedial relief.

[Final Judgment]

Section X of the Final Judgment of July 6, 1950 entered by Judge Knox of this Court provides:

> "Jurisdiction of this cause is retained for the purpose of enabling the plaintiff or Alcoa to apply to the Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or complete execution of this judgment, for the modification or termination of any of the provisions thereof, for the enforcement of compliance therewith and for the punishment of any violations thereof".

Section VIII of the Final Judgment of July 6, 1950 provides:—

> "The divestiture of plants and properties of Alcoa, for which the plaintiff has petitioned, is presently denied; however, jurisdiction of this cause is retained for five years from the date of adoption by the Court of a plan, pursuant to paragraph V of this judgment, for the disposal of stock interests, within which period, if conditions so warrant, plaintiff may petition this Court for further and more complete relief."

Brief History of Case

This anti-trust action has been actively litigated for over twenty years. Numerous ancillary proceedings have been held and determined. Fortunately, the purposes of this Opinion will be served by a brief summary of the main course of events in its litigated history.

This case was commenced by the United States against the Aluminum Company of America (hereafter called "Alcoa") and numerous other defendants, on April 23, 1937. The United States charged Alcoa with numerous violations of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act and after twenty-six months of trial this Court, through Judge Caffey, dismissed the Government's case on July 23, 1942.

The Government appealed and, in the absence of a qualified quorum of the Supreme Court, the appeal by Special Act of Congress, 58 Stat. 272, Act June 9, 1944, 15 U. S. C. A. § 29, was heard and determined by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit sitting as the court of final appellate jurisdiction. On November 12, 1945 the Circuit Court of Appeals, through Judge Learned Hand, affirmed in part and reversed in part the trial court's determination.

Insofar as is material here, the basis of the Circuit Court's reversal was that it found that Alcoa had unlawfully monopolized the aluminum ingot (primary aluminum) market in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. The Circuit Court found that Alcoa's market control in aluminum ingots exceeded 90%. However, the Circuit Court directed that determination of what remedial relief was to be afforded the Government was to be held in abeyance pending the results and effects on competition of the Government's disposal of the huge aluminum manufacturing facilities constructed by it during World War II.

In 1947 Alcoa applied to this Court for a determination that it no longer had a monopoly and that competitive conditions had been restored in the aluminum industry. In 1948 the Government filed a petition for divestiture and other relief, contending that competitive conditions in the aluminum industry had not been established. Issue having been so joined Judge Knox of this Court, after extensive hearings and in an exhaustive and learned Opinion granted the Government's application for relief—insofar as is material here—only to the extent of requiring that certain stockholders of Alcoa divest themselves of either their Alcoa stock or Aluminum Limited stock. The Government's application for divestiture was denied, as was Alcoa's petition for a determination that it no longer had a monopoly and that competitive conditions had been restored in the aluminum industry.

In denying the Government's application for divestiture Judge Knox stated ([1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,646] 91 F. Supp. 333, 419):

> "Nevertheless, the Government, for a period of five years, if conditions so warrant, may petition the Court for further and more complete relief".

No appeal was taken by either party from Judge Knox's decision. The Government on this application, made within the five year period, seeks no further or more complete relief other than an extension of the five year period to make such an application.

Judge Knox in his Opinion made an exhaustive study and comprehensive analysis of the entire aluminum industry as it then existed. He correlated that analysis of the aluminum industry with a most learned exposition of the antitrust law especially with respect to the function of a court in relief proceedings.

For the purposes of this motion the parties have stipulated and agreed to certain facts and tables substantially within the framework of those factors considered by Judge Knox and which for the most part merely bring up to date those factors considered in 1950. The Tables so stipulated to are included in the Appendix of this Opinion [not reproduced]. The facts are as follows:

* * * [Stipulated Facts—1-34 not reproduced.]

Jurisdiction

The Government in its moving papers affirmatively disavows that it is seeking further relief in accordance with Section VIII of the Final Judgment, stating:

> "Despite the fact that the experience of the past five years has not provided a well-founded assurance that, in future years, competitive conditions of an effective and lawful nature will be certain to prevail in the aluminum industry, a prayer for further relief in accordance with Section VIII of the Final Judgment of July 6, 1950, is not made at this time since such a request would be premature." (Government's motion papers paragraph 21).

The Government's application is made pursuant to the provisions of Section X of the Final Judgment of 1950. Section X is the standard anti-trust retention of jurisdiction provision which sets forth the perpetual jurisdiction possessed by any court of equity over the enforcement of its judgments. Indeed, a court of equity has such jurisdiction even in the absence of any provision in its Final Judgment. United States v. Swift & Co. [1932-1939 Trade Cases ¶ 55,005], 286 U. S. 106, 114.

Alcoa challenges the jurisdiction of the Court and points out under the Government's interpretation of the powers reserved in Section X the present application could be made at any time since Section X has no time limitation. The defendant argues that such an interpretation carried to its logical conclusion renders all the provisions of Section VIII mere surplusage.

However, in resolving the question of jurisdiction we do not think it is necessary to rely on either the semantics of the terminology used in Section X or the broad scope of retained jurisdiction in anti-trust cases under provisions similar to those in Section X. It suffices to state that in each case the retained jurisdiction of the Court is always defined by the terms of the judgment and the nature of the relief sought. United States v. United States Gypsum Co. [1954 Trade Cases ¶ 67,813], 124 F. Supp. 573, 581, 582.

Here, Judge Knox's Opinion and the resultant Final Judgment specifically provided for an application by the Government for further relief and set down a five year time limit within which such an application was to be made. We do not agree with Alcoa's contentions that the only relief available to the Government under Section VIII is divestiture. The words "further and more complete relief" can fairly be considered as including an application for an extension of the time limit imposed.

The Government in its brief correctly points out that, despite the position assumed in its moving papers, its application does in fact meet all the preliminary prerequisites of an application under Section VIII. The application was made within the five year period and the claim is made that conditions warrant the relief sought. Jurisdiction is, therefore, assumed under the provisions of Section VIII for the purposes of determining whether or not the conditions relief on by the Government warrant the further relief requested. (Rule 53(b) Federal Rules of Civil Procedure).

The issue is a narrow one and, in this Court's opinion, almost every relevant occurrence of the last five years militates against a determination that the Government is entitled to further relief in the form of an extension of the five year period.

Judge Knox's Opinion

Judge Knox's Opinion, besides being a most learned and authoritative treatise on anti-trust remedial proceedings, is the law of this case. The completeness and clarity of his Opinion greatly simplifies this Court's task.

Judge Knox, in denying the Government's application for divestiture, found that the Government disposal of its aluminum manufacturing facilities, pending which the Circuit Court had stayed remedial proceedings, had, in fact, resulted in the creation of two substantial and completely integrated aluminum manufacturers in vigorous competition with Alcoa.

He stated:

> "The Reynolds and Kaiser organizations are operating successfully and profitably, and there is little or no reason to think that either of them will be unable, under existing trade circumstances, to continue to thrive, and even to prosper. The Government disposal program has launched them with excellent properties, low investments, and safeguards for their future stability." ([1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,646] 91 F. Supp. 333, 418).

He also stated:

> "The relative market positions for the period under review do not show prima facie monopoly power in Alcoa. But Alcoa's two major competitors—Reynolds and Kaiser—together have secured only 35% of a market in which Alcoa enjoys 50%. Nevertheless, Reynolds and Kaiser have consistently enlarged their shares." ([1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,646] 91 F. Supp. 333, 364).

Alcoa in the proceeding before Judge Knox had affirmatively moved for a determination that competition existed in the aluminum industry. He refused to give Alcoa such a positive determination, in that he found that the evidence presented was insufficient to give him a well-founded assurance that, in future years, competitive conditions would be certain to prevail. ([1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,646] 91 F. Supp. 333, 416).

As we read Judge Knox's Opinion his only concern about the future competitive conditions of the alumnium industry was the continued success of Alcoa's two competitors, Reynolds and Kaiser. He saw > "* * * no likelihood of domestic competition arising in the aluminum industry, as now constituted, to challenge the present three producers." ([1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,646] 91 F. Supp. 333, 401).

Judge Knox's immediate concern was the obvious opportunity for common control of Alcoa and Aluminum Limited of Canada, the largest aluminum producer in the world, to the detriment of Kaiser and Reynolds by virtue of a few persons' ownership of controlling interests in both companies. He expressed this fear as follows:

"The effective future competitive efforts of these two companies will be greatly enhanced if the shadow that now hangs over them in Alcoa's potential control of Aluminum Limited be removed.

"It is inevitable that investments are deterred, expansion retarded, and stability impaired by the power in Alcoa's controlling stockholders, if they choose to exercise it, to overwhelm, and put to naught, the best efforts of both Reynolds and Kaiser. Such power, whether or not exercised, and whether or not likely of execution, is omnipresent." ([1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,646] 91 F. Supp. 333, 418).

He ordered these persons to dispose of either their Limited or Alcoa stock interests.

Judge Knox also expressed the hope that such a stock disposal would create another competitor in the domestic aluminum market, as follows:

"Moreover, if the common control of Alcoa and Limited be eliminated, it is fairly possible, and even probable, that there will be introduced into the domestic market, a rival that is fully worthy of Alcoa's steel. The competitive potential of Limited could not be duplicated in this country by the organization of an additional producer, except at the risk of serious danger and disruption to the present effectiveness of the industry. Today, the United States provides a natural and ample market for part of the huge surplus of metal produced in Canada. The activities of Limited can furnish a supplement to present competitive efforts in offering stimulants to efficiency and lowered prices, from which the general public will gain, and this, of course, is one purpose of the anti-trust laws." ([1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,646] 91 F. Supp. 333, 418).

Having provided a remedy for this immediate threat to Kaiser's and Reyonlds' future, Judge Knox proceeded to set forth the reasons for and purposes of his retention of jurisdiction for five years, as follows:

"These possibilities (that Limited's competition might impair the domestic competitive situation or Limited might not compete because of high tariffs), plus the fact that there has been such a short time over which the operation of Reynolds and Kaiser are open to appraisal, require that, for another five years, jurisdiction of this case shall be retained by the Court. Within that period, note can be taken of the progress—or otherwise—of Reynolds and Kaiser. If, for any reason, it should appear that their competition with Alcoa is feeble, uncertain and ineffective, appropriate action, in addition to that now about to be accorded the Government, will be in order." ([1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,646] 91 F. Supp. 333, 418). (Parentheses added).

ISSUE

As we have stated, the Government on this application seeks no additional relief other than a five year extension of the period set down by Judge Knox. The Government does not claim that Kaiser's and Reyonlds' competition with Alcoa is "feeble, uncertain and ineffective" but rather it takes the position that the developments of the five year period have been such as not to remove the doubts Judge Knox expressed in 1950 and therefore this Court should extend its jurisdiction for another five years.

We have found such an application to be within the contemplation of Section VIII of the Final Judgment of 1950. However, contrary to the Government's position, we are also of the opinion that under the law of this case the Government assumes the burden of showing either that the competitive future of Reynolds and Kaiser is, at least to some degree, more doubtful today than it was in 1950, or that, for some reason unforeseen in 1950, the five year period has proven an inadequate test period. It is our opinion that the finality of the Judgment of 1950, and the mere passage of the five year period, fixed Alcoa's rights at least to that extent.

The Government, although disavowing any burden of proof, advances as one of its main arguments in support of its application, that the five years provided for in the 1950 Judgment were "atypical" years. The Government's other reasons are Alcoa's continued economic superiority, that the primary aluminum industry is still pre-empted and the relief by that stock disposal, provided for in the 1950 Judgment, has proven ineffective.

We shall briefly examine the Government's position in conjunction with the Stipulated Facts above.

Atypical Years

The Government points to the Korean conflict (Stipulated Fact 1); Government Control (Stipulated Fact 2); a seller's market (Stipulated Fact 3); and governmental incentitives [sic] to expansion in the aluminum industry (Stipulated Fact 4) all as unforeseen events in 1950 which so altered market conditions during the five year period as to render those years of no value for the purpose Judge Knox intended.

The main purpose of retaining jurisdiction, we think, is clear. It was to see if Kaiser and Reynolds would thrive and prosper. We agree that the particular events, with the execption of Government controls, relied upon by the Government, were probably not foreseen in 1950 but we think the effect of such events was not only foreseeable but was actually foreseen. All the events relied upon, with the exception of Government controls, had one ultimate effect on the aluminum industry—expansion.

Kaiser's and Reynolds' future in an expanding aluminum industry was exactly what Judge Knox was doubtful about in 1950, and he so expressed himself—

> "In concluding this subject (Financial Resources), it is sufficient to say that the financial data before me show Reynolds and Kaiser to be capable of carrying on their operations with fair success under market conditions reasonably foreseeable. Nevertheless, Alcoa's financial strength is of a high order of superiority, and to the extent that the aluminum industry is considered an expanding one, the potentialities for Alcoa's growth out-distances any expectations which may be held for the other two companies." ([1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,646] 91 F. Supp. 333, 386). (Parentheses added).

The realities are that Kaiser and Reynolds more than maintain their competitive position in the phenomenal expansion of the industry. (Stipulated Facts 5-22).

We have stated that the particular events relied on by the Government were not foreseeable but certainly events of their general nature were and would necessarily be considered as possible at the present time during any future five-year period. A court would be naive, indeed, not to foresee as possible, Government controls, Government incentives, war (cold or hot), and a seller's market within the next five years.

All of the events relied upon by the Government operated with equal effect on Alcoa as well as on Kaiser and Reynolds. In view of Kaiser's and Reynolds' progress and development, it is our opinion that, only if the Government could show that the conditions of the last five years were such as to have created a form of "economic hothouse" within which Reynolds and Kaiser alone thrived, could the Court at this stage of these proceedings be justified in discounting the results of the five year period provided for in the Final Judgment. None of the events relied on by the Government, or any combination of them, came even close to effecting such a result.

Alcoa's Superior Competitive Position

It is the Government's position that its application should be granted because Alcoa still maintains its superior competitive position. Here, again, we feel the Government relies on a fact that has no significance of and in itself. Once the fact is put within its proper frame of reference for the purposes of this application—Judge Knox's Opinion—it completely fails to support the Government's position.

The purpose of the five year period was to observe Kaiser's and Reynolds' progress or lack of it. Alcoa's competitive position is significant only insofar as it may have increased at the expense of Reynolds and Kaiser. The facts are that Alcoa's relative share of the aluminum market has declined; Kaiser's has increased substantially; and Reynolds' has remained about the same.

The following excerpts from the Stipulated Tables (See Appendix [not reproduced]) speak for themselves:

The inescapable conclusion from the facts reflected in these Tables and in those contained in the Stipulated Facts 5 to 16 is that Kaiser and Reynolds have not only thrived and prospered but they have removed all reasonable doubts as to their capacity to effectively compete with Alcoa in the future.

Preemption of Primary Aluminum Industry

Failure of Stock Disposal Remedy

The Government argues that the primary aluminum industry remains closed to prospective producers unless they are the beneficiaries of Government assistance.

It is difficult to perceive how this contention in and of itself can in any way aid the Government's position within the boundaries of Judge Knox's Opinion. We have already noted that a basic premise of the remedial relief afforded was that the existing producers of primary aluminum had preempted the field and in all probability no other domestic producers of primary aluminum would come into being. Time has proven that premise to have been erroneous. Other producers have entered, or are about to enter, the field. (Stipulated Facts 5, 6 and 7). That the Government itself, through Supply Contracts and Rapid Tax Amortization privileges, has been the cause to some degree may be laudatory but we think immaterial to the issue raised by this application.

The material fact is that there is no indication that the existence or contemplated existence of these new producers has in any way lessened the competitive status of the primary aluminum market or benefited Alcoa. At the present time there is no reason to believe these new producers will not increase competition in the primary aluminum market at Alcoa's expense as much as Reynolds' or Kaiser's.

In this same vein the Government also argues that the stock disposal ordered in the Final Judgment has not been effective in that Aluminum Limited has not become a competitor of Alcoa.

The main purpose of the stock disposal was clearly expressed to be the elimination of the possibility of or the effects of even the fear of the possibility that Alcoa and Limited would "gang up" on Kaiser and Reynolds. There is not a scintilla of evidence before this Court that Alcoa and Limited have acted in unison to the detriment of Reynolds or Kaiser. On the basis of the facts before us it must be presumed that the stock disposal remedy completely achieved its main purpose.

While it is true that Judge Knox expressed the hope that by virtue of the stock disposal plan Limited would become a more active competitor with Alcoa in the domestic market, it is clear that this purpose was secondary and of necessity based on the belief that Limited was the only possible new competitor. In addition, the facts show that Limited has increased its competition with Alcoa in the domestic market since 1950. In the last nine months of 1949 Alcoa received 78.3% of the primary aluminum sold by Limited in the domestic market. In the last nine months of 1956 Alcoa received 36.2% of the total primary aluminum sold by Limited in United States. The total quantity of primary aluminum sold in the domestic market by Limited increased from 90,774 thousand pounds in the first nine months of 1949 to 348,465 for the same period in 1956. (Stipulated Table X).

Nor has Limited's increased competition in the domestic market during the five year period in any way reduced Reynolds' and Kaiser's market position, which possibly was one of the reason for retaining jurisdiction. Nor did any domestic producer effect an increase of tariff and so keep Limited out of the domestic market, which was another reason for retaining jurisdiction. The fact is that the tariff on primary aluminum was lowered.

Conclusion

As we have stated, Judge Knox's Opinion, and the resultant Final Judgment of 1950, is the law of this case. The facts here do not sustain this application for they fail to reveal any basis for retaining jurisdiction within the framework of that Opinion.

Motion denied.

Mich.), defendant is directed to use, and to continue to use, its best efforts to obtain, one or more suitable sources of supply for its new buses in addition to General Motors Corporation. If, after the entry of a Final Judgment, not subject to appeal, in favor of plaintiff in United States v. General Motors Corporation, defendant shall not have obtained such a suitable source of supply, defendant shall so notify the Court, on notice to the Attorney General, and the Court may grant such additional relief, in favor of the plaintiff, as may be required in the circumstances.

VIII

[Development Contracts]

Defendant is enjoined and restrained from entering into any development contract, as defined herein, with General Motors Corporation until after the expiration of a period of four years from the date of entry of this Final Judgment or until the entry of a Final Judgment in United States v. General Motors Corporation, Civ. No. 15816, (E. D. Mich.), whichever occurs sooner.

IX

[ICC Approval]

Nothing contained in this judgment shall be deemed to restrain or prevent defendant from entering into any agreement which under the provisions of any United States statute is at the time subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, or from taking any action, which shall have been approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

X

Petitions to Review Order of Federal Trade Commission.

Federal Trade Commission Act

Unfair Practices—Combining or Conspiring To Fix Prices—Delivered Pricing Systems—Validity of Federal Trade Commission Order Prohibiting Individual Use of Systems.—A Federal Trade Commission order prohibiting manufacturers of chain and chain products from individually using three delivered pricing systems for the purpose or with the effect of systematically matching delivered prices of competitors was not too broad where the Commission found that the manufacturers had conspired to use such pricing systems. The order of the Commission could not be said to be purely arbitrary because it lacked adequate evidentiary support or because it was clearly beyond the powers of the Commission; therefore, it could not be set aside on review. The order did not prohibit per se the individual use of the pricing systems. The order would be violated only if there were identical prices resulting from single basing point, freight equalization, or zone delivered pricing. Therefore, the order did not require f.o.b. mill selling. Furthermore, if conditions changed and the prohibition was no longer needed to restore competition, the order could be modified.

See Unfair Practices, Vol. 2, ¶ 5035.11, 5035.56; FTC Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8621.

Unfair Practices—Combining or Conspiring To Fix Prices—Delivered Pricing Systems (Basing Point, Freight Equalization, and Zone Systems)—Evidence of Conspiracy.—A Federal Trade Commission order prohibiting manufacturers of chain and chain products, the trade association of which they were members, and certain officers of the association from conspiring to quote or sell such products at prices determined pursuant to a single basing point delivered price system, a freight equalization delivered price system, or a zone delivered price system was affirmed and enforced. There was sufficient evidentiary basis for an inference by the Commission that the substantial uniformity and virtual identity of prices which existed in the industry resulted from concerted conscious action, amounting to conspiracy, and that the delivered pricing systems used in connection with and in furtherance of cooperative and collusive efforts to fix prices were necessarily an inherent and indispensable part of the conspiracy. The contention that the order was invalid because an agreement to use the delivered pricing systems was not shown was rejected.

See Unfair Practices, Vol. 2, ¶ 5035.11, 5035.41, 5035.56, 5201.525; FTC Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8611.74.

Unfair Practices—Combining or Conspiring To Fix Prices—Delivered Pricing Systems—Evidence of Participation in Conspiracy To Fix Prices—Member of Trade Association.—There was sufficient evidence from which the Federal Trade Commission could find that a manufacturer of chain participated in a conspiracy among other chain manufacturers and a trade association to fix prices by adopting certain delivered pricing systems. The manufacturer was an active member of the association from its inception and followed the delivered pricing systems of the other manufacturers with respect to the types of chain it manufactured. The Commission reasonably could infer that the manufacturer, as a member of the association, knew or was charged with knowledge of the collusive efforts of other members to stabilize prices by suppressing competitive pricing and was therefore a party to the conspiracy.

See Unfair Practices, Vol. 2, ¶ 5035.

Affirming and enforcing a Federal Trade Commission cease and desist order in Dkt. 4878.

Before SANBORN, JOHNSEN, and VOGEL, Circuit Judges.

[FTC Complaint and Findings]

SANBORN, Circuit Judge [In full text]: This case comes to this Court upon petitions to review a cease and desist order of the Federal Trade Commission[1] which is based upon its determination that the petitioners had conspired to bring about uniformity in prices for chain and chain products, in violation of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act.[2]

The petitioners are: the principal manufacturers of chain and chain products in the United States; the trade association of which they are members; and certain of the officers of the association. The Commission on December 22, 1942, issued a complaint charging them with having conspired to fix and maintain identical delivered prices for such products. Delivered prices are those charged by a seller for his goods when and where delivered. On October 9, 1945, the Commission issued an amended complaint which contained two counts. The first count charged the petitioners with conspiring, in violation of § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, to fix identical delivered prices for their respective products by the use of the same delivered pricing methods, which are referred to as (1) a basing point system, (2) a freight equalization system, and (3) a zone system; and thereby preventing the forces of competition from making and determining price quotations. The second count of the amended complaint charged the petitioners with price discrimination, in violation of § 2(a) of the Clayton Act, as amended.[3] That count was ultimately dismissed by the Commission. The petitioners denied all of the material allegations of the amended complaint. Evidence was heard by a Trial Examiner designated by the Commission. The hearings commenced in April of 1946 and continued through 1947 and into 1948. The record evidence was closed July 7, 1948. The Trial Examiner filed his recommended decision on September 23, 1948. It was later amended in some particulars. The case was argued before the Commission, on exceptions to the Trial Examiner's report, on April 7, 1949; was reargued September 22, 1950; and was finally decided by the Commission adversely to petitioners on the first count February 16, 1953, by a vote of 3 to 1, Commissioner Mason dissenting and Commissioner Carretta not participating. The cease and desist order under review was entered on the same date. In addition to the dismissal of the second count, the amended complaint was also dismissed as to several individuals who had been joined as parties. The record evidence necessarily reflects conditions in the chain industry as they existed prior to July 1948.

The petitioners on April 20, 1953, filed their "Joint and Several Petition to Review" the order of the Commission. The John M. Russell Manufacturing Company, Inc., and Turner & Seymour Manufacturing Company, who were parties to the joint petition, filed a supplemental petition to review the order, asserting, in effect, that there was no adequate evidentiary basis for a finding that they had participated in a conspiracy to fix prices. They asked that the relief prayed for in the joint petition be granted. The petitioners originally all sought a complete review and reversal of the Commission's findings and order. On June 17, 1954, they (with the exception of the two petitioners who had filed the supplemental petition and the Columbus McKinnon Chain Corporation) moved this Court for leave to withdraw their challenge to the Commission's findings and order with respect to the price fixing conspiracy charge, except as such findings and order bore upon the use of the delivered pricing methods.

[Cease and Desist Order]

The cease and desist order of the Commission prohibited broadly a continuation of the price fixing conspiracy which the Commission had found to exist. Included in this part of the order was a subparagraph numbered (6) requiring the petitioners who make or deal in chain to cease and desist from entering into or continuing any common course of action, agreement or conspiracy to

> "Quote or sell chain or chain products at prices calculated or determined pursuant to or in accordance with the single basing point delivered-price system, the freight equalization delivered-price system, or the zone delivered-price system; or quote or sell chain or chain products at prices calculated or determined pursuant to or in accordance with any other plan or system which results in identical price quotations or prices for chain or chain products at points of quotation or sale or to particular purchasers by any two or more sellers of chain or chain products using such plan or system or which prevents purchasers from finding any advantage in price in dealing with one or more as against another seller."

In addition, the Commission included in the order a third ordering paragraph. That paragraph required each of the corporate petitioners to > "cease and desist from quoting or selling chain or chain products at prices calculated or determined pursuant to or in accordance with a single basing point delivered-price system, a freight equalization delivered-price system, or a zone delivered-price system, for the purpose or with the effect of systematically matching the delivered-price quotations or the delivered prices of other sellers of chain or chain products and thereby preventing purchasers from finding any advantage in price in dealing with one or more sellers as against another."

The validity of both of these paragraphs of the order is challenged as being without adequate evidentiary support and exceeding the powers of the Commission.

[National Lead Case]

The case was argued and submitted to this Court at its March Session 1956. The Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit had just decided the case of National Lead Co. v. Federal Trade Commission [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,211], 227 F. 2d 825, which also involved an alleged conspiracy to fix prices. The Commission in its cease and desist order in that case had included a paragraph similar to the third ordering paragraph in this case, forbidding the respondents there involved "from quoting or selling lead pigments at prices calculated or determined in whole or in part pursuant to or in accordance with a zone delivered price system for the purpose or with the effect of systematically matching the delivered price quotations or the delivered prices of other sellers of lead pigments and thereby preventing purchasers from finding any advantage in price in dealing with one or more sellers as against another." 227 F. 2d, at page 840. The Seventh Circuit ruled that that paragraph of the order was invalid. See pages 840-844 of 227 F. 2d. In his argument, in the instant case, counsel for the Commission conceded that if that ruling was correct, the corresponding paragraph in the order under review here could not be sustained.

Moreover, Commissioner Mason, who had dissented in both the National Lead Co. case and this case, had said in his dissenting opinion, with respect to the order now under review: "The order in this case, like the order in Docket 5253, National Lead Company, et al., goes further than to suppress practices found to be unlawful." We therefore deferred decision pending final disposition of the National Lead Co. case, in which the Supreme Court granted certiorari. That Court on February 25, 1957, in Federal Trade Commission v. National Lead Co. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,629], 352 U. S. 419, ruled that it was within the power of the Commission, under the evidence in that case, to include the paragraph corresponding to the third ordering paragraph in the instant case.

After the decision of the National Lead Co. case by the Supreme Court, the parties here, at our invitation, filed supplemental briefs relative to the effect, if any, of that decision upon the questions which we are called upon to decide, and specifying what those questions are.

The petitioners in their supplemental brief say that the Supreme Court merely decided in the National Lead Co. case that the Commission had basic statutory authority to include in its order a paragraph of the type there in question, forbidding the use of a single delivered pricing system, and that, as narrowly interpreted, the paragraph in that case was not an inappropriate remedy under the peculiar facts.

[Issues]

In our opinion, there are three questions requiring determination: (1) The validity of the prohibition contained in subparagraph (6) of the first ordering paragraph, prohibiting the continued use, pursuant to conspiracy, of the three delivered pricing systems. (2) The validity of the third ordering paragraph, prohibiting the individual independent use of any of the three delivered pricing systems "for the purpose or with the effect of systematically matching" delivered prices of competitors, with the effect of eliminating competition. (3) Whether there was an adequate evidentiary basis for the finding of the Commission that Columbus McKinnon Chain Corporation was a participant in the alleged conspiracy to fix prices.

[Evidence of Conspiracy]

The petitioners in their supplemental brief say that Turner & Seymour Manufacturing Company and The John M. Russell Manufacturing Company, Inc., as well as Columbus McKinnon Chain Corporation, have challenged the entire findings, conclusions and order. The latter company has filed a brief. Neither of the other two has briefed or argued its assertions of error. As was said in Kimball Laundry Co. v. United States, 8 Cir., 166 F. 2d 856, 859, "An unargued assertion of error is no more helpful to an appellate court than is an unsupported allegation of fact to a trial court. The burden of demonstrating error is upon an appellant, and errors assigned, but not argued in his brief, are waived." See, also, Turner County, S. D., v. Miller, 8 Cir., 170 F. 2d 820, 828.

Since the petitioners do not challenge the adequacy of the evidence to sustain the Commission's determination of the existence of concerted action by the petitioners, amounting to conspiracy, to fix the prices for chain and chain products, it is unnecessary to attempt to state the evidence in detail. What the petitioners contend is that there was no evidence that the delivered pricing methods used in the sale of the chain or chain products resulted from any conspiracy, understanding, agreement or concerted action on the part of the petitioners.

There is no doubt of the power of the Commission to declare that conduct which tends to restrain trade by fixing prices is an unfair method of competition. Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,237], 333 U. S. 683, 693. Within broad limits, it is for the Commission to prescribe the remedy for the prevention of such conduct, which may include depriving those who have engaged in it of the weapons which they used in making it effective. Federal Trade Commission v. National Lead Co., supra, pages 428-430 of 352 U. S. See, also, Federal Trade Commission v. Ruberoid Co. [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,279], 343 U. S. 470, 473.

The instant case strongly resembles the Cement Institute case, 7 Cir. [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,490], 157 F. 2d 533, reversed in [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,237] 333 U. S. 683; the National Lead Co. case [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,211], 227 F. 2d 825, reversed in part [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,629] 352 U. S. 419; and the case of Triangle Conduit & Cable Co., Inc., v. Federal Trade Commission, 7 Cir. [1948-1949 Trade Cases ¶ 62,254], 168 F. 2d 175, affirmed by an equally divided Supreme Court under the title, Clayton Mark & Co. v. Federal Trade Commission [1948-1949 Trade Cases ¶ 62,409], 336 U. S. 956. The only important distinction between the instant case and those cases, it seems to us, is that here three delivered pricing systems are involved, and in each of the other cases only one was involved.

The record shows that the three delivered pricing systems or methods were used in selling chain. Welded chain (heavy-duty chain such as anchor chain, logging chain and the like) was sold under the old "Pittsburgh plus" method of delivered pricing, which called for the f.o.b. mill or factory price plus freight based on Pittsburgh. The method is described in the Cement Institute case at pages 697-698 of 333 U. S.

Weldless chain (which is lighter than welded chain and is made by bending and knotting wire into links or by cutting links from flat metal) was sold under the freight equalization method of computing delivered pricing. Under this system the buyer pays the seller's mill or factory price plus an amount equal to the rail freight applicable to the shipment from the factory, in which such chain is made, nearest freightwise to the point of delivery.

Tire chain (which consists of two welded line or side chains with cross links and is used on the wheels of motor vehicles to prevent skidding on or in snow, ice or mud) was sold f.o.b. factory with freight allowed or absorbed by the seller to all destinations in the United States. This the Commission calls a zone delivered price system, the entire United States being the zone. The petitioners prefer to call the system "the universal delivered price method." All that this means is that tire chains, like chewing gum, cigarettes, and many other products, are sold everywhere at the same delivered prices, regardless of point of origin.

The Commission, in substance, found that the petitioners entered into agreements and understandings concerning current and future prices; that they cooperatively compiled schedules of common pricing factors used in selling welded chain; that they adopted and used, by agreement, the prices and discounts published by the American Chain & Cable Company, Inc., the largest manufacturer of chain in the United States; that they exchanged information as to prices at which their products were offered for sale generally and as to prices made particular customers; and that they promoted adherence to prices agreed upon through the Chain Institute and otherwise.

The Commission further found that

> "Each of the * * * manufacturers has quoted and sold chain and chain products at prices calculated pursuant to and in accordance with the particular method or system of computing delivered prices applicable to the products it sold, with the knowledge that all the other * * * manufacturers selling the same products were simultaneously doing likewise. In entering into and engaging in the cooperative and collective actions described hereinabove, there was necessarily an understanding and agreement between all of the respondents [before the Commission] that each of the * * * manufacturers would continue to use the particular method or system applicable to the type or types of chain each sold."

The Commission also found:

> "* * * All users of each of the three methods or systems of computing delivered prices have thus been enabled to present to a prospective purchaser a condition of matched prices in which such purchaser was isolated and deprived of any choice on the basis of price. The delivered costs to purchasers have not reflected any of the differences in cost of raw materials, other items, or freight delivery from the places of manufacture to the purchaser's delivery points. The principles and forces of competition have been prevented from making and determining the prices of each of the * * * manufacturers."

One not learned in unfair trade practices and unfair methods of competition might, from the record in this case, get the impression that the Commission's findings presented a somewhat overdrawn and unduly sinister picture of the situation out of which this controversy arose. We think, however, that there was a sufficient evidentiary basis for an inference by the Commission that the substantial uniformity and virtual identity of prices which existed in the chain industry resulted from concerted conscious action on the part of petitioners, amounting to conspiracy, and that the delivered pricing methods used by petitioners in connection with and in furtherance of their cooperative and collusive efforts to fix or stabilize prices for chain were necessarily an inherent and indispensable part of the conspiracy.

In the Cement Institute case it was asserted, as it is here, that the Commission failed to find, and that the evidence failed to show, any agreement to use the delivered price system involved in that case. See page 709 of 333 U. S. This contention was rejected by the Supreme Court.

[Concerted Action]

The contention of petitioners that subparagraph (6) of the first ordering paragraph is invalid and unjustified by the evidence, cannot be sustained. The Supreme Court held in the Cement Institute case that a similar paragraph was valid. The Court said (page 729 of 333 U. S.): "The paragraph is merely designed to forbid respondents from acting in harmony to bring about national uniformity in whatever fashion they may seek by collective action to achieve that result."

[Independent Action]

It is evident that it is the third ordering paragraph by which the petitioners are most aggrieved and which they seem to construe as totally and permanently disabling each of them from selling its chain products at delivered prices, and leaving them no alternative but to sell at prices f. o. b. their respective factories. They say this will prevent them from engaging in country-wide competition and confine each of them to its own local trade territory. If this paragraph of the order of the Commission were to be given the effect of depriving each of the petitioners of every lawful and practical method of independently and honestly selling its products at delivered prices, and thus preventing it from engaging in nationwide competition, we would consider the paragraph invalid.

The only distinction between the third ordering paragraph in this case and the corresponding paragraph in the National Lead Co. case is that there the order proscribed the use of the zone delivered price system, which was the only delivered price system in question in that case, while in this case the Commission was dealing with three delivered price systems, each of which was used in computing the price of a single type of chain. In its supplemental brief, the Commission says:

"While the use of each system was limited in the past to a particular type of chain, each has been equally effective in restraining trade and eliminating competition. The order, we think, properly guarded against the use of the simple device of interchanging the systems used as among the three types of chain, and thus perpetuating the restraints of trade at which the order is directed. The Commission has frequently issued orders which have consistently been upheld by the Courts, prohibiting unfair methods and practices as to all products sold in cases where the methods and practices had been used in the past only in connection with the sale of one of the products."

It is possible that the Commission has made its order too broad in undertaking to proscribe the qualified independent use by each of the petitioners of the only practical systems of delivered pricing for its chain products. If in the National Lead Co. case the Commission had prohibited not only the individual use of the single delivered price system there involved, but had also conditionally prohibited the use of all other practical delivered price systems, the Supreme Court might have refused to sustain so broad a prohibition.

[Court Review]

In Federal Trade Commission v. Ruberoid Co., supra, page 473 of 343 U. S., the Supreme Court, in sustaining an order of the Commission, said:

"* * * Orders of the Federal Trade Commission are not intended to impose criminal punishment or exact compensatory damages for past acts, but to prevent illegal practices in the future. In carrying out this function the Commission is not limited to prohibiting the illegal practice in the precise form in which it is found to have existed in the past. If the Commission is to attain the objectives Congress envisioned, it cannot be required to confine its road block to the narrow lane the transgressor has traveled; it must be allowed effectively to close all roads to the prohibited goal, so that its order may not be by-passed with impunity. Moreover, 'the Commission has wide discretion in its choice of a remedy deemed adequate to cope with the unlawful practices' disclosed. Jacob Siegel Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 327 U. S. 608, 611 (1946). Congress placed the primary responsibility for fashioning such orders upon the Commission, and Congress expected the Commission to exercise a special competence in formulating remedies to deal with problems in the general sphere of competitive practices. Therefore we have said that 'the courts will not interfere except where the remedy selected has no reasonable relation to the unlawful practices found to exist.' Id., at 613."

We gather from this and the other recent Supreme Court decisions to which reference has been made, that, unless an order of the Commission can be said to be purely arbitrary because without adequate evidentiary support or because clearly beyond the Commission's powers, it may not be set aside. The question of the adequacy of the evidentiary basis for the third ordering paragraph as applied to all types of chains and to every petitioner, whether it had used all of the three delivered price systems or not, is, to say the least, debatable. But if the Commission honestly and justifiably believed that competition in the chain industry had been virtually destroyed by the conduct of petitioners and that the third ordering paragraph was necessary to restore competitive prices, we cannot say that the Commission's determination in that regard was purely arbitrary. The Commission, in cases such as this, is the trier of the facts, the appraiser of the credibility of witnesses, the weigher of evidence, the drawer of inferences, and, within broad limits, the prescriber of remedies for trade practices found by it to be unfair. Its determination as to the facts is as invulnerable to attack as is a jury verdict in a case triable by and properly submitted to a jury. It seems apparent that, unless a reviewing court can demonstrate that the Commission's order is legally or factually baseless, it may not be set aside.

[Scope of Order]

The scope of the third ordering paragraph in the instant case is, of course, the same as was the scope of the corresponding paragraph in the National Lead Co. case, with respect to which the Supreme Court said, page 431 of 352 U. S.:

> "* * * It is our conclusion that the order was not intended to and does not prohibit or interfere with independent delivered zone pricing per se. Nor does it prohibit the practice of the absorption of actual freight as such in order to foster competition. Furthermore, as we have said there is read into the order the provision of § 2(b) of the Clayton Act as to the right of a seller in good faith to meet the lower price of a competitor. This is not to say that a seller may plead this section in defense of the use of an entire pricing system. The section is designed to protect competitors in individual transactions."

Moreover, the Commission does not place the same construction on the paragraph as do the petitioners. In its supplemental brief the Commission says:

> "The order here does not require f. o. b. mill selling. As the Supreme Court pointed out in National Lead, 'delivered zone pricing violates the order only when two conditions are present: (1) identical prices with competitors (2) resulting from zone delivered pricing' (1 L. ed. 2d at 443). So, here, the order will be violated only if there are identical prices resulting from single basing point, freight equalization or zone delivered pricing. As we pointed out in our main brief, the order does not prohibit per se the use of any delivered price-system and can be fully complied with by competition in base prices, no matter what system of delivered pricing is used. If there is competition in base prices there cannot possibly be any 'systematic matching' of delivered prices."

Furthermore, if conditions have changed and the third ordering paragraph is no longer needed to restore competition to the chain industry, it seems fair to assume that the Commission will, upon application reopen the proceeding under Section 5(b) of the Federal Trade Commission Act as amended, and modify its order. See American Chain & Cable Co., Inc., v. Federal Trade Commission, 4 Cir. [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,251], 142 F. 2d 909, 911-912.

[Participation in Conspiracy]

Columbus McKinnon Chain Corporation in its brief asserts that an adequate evidentiary basis for the Commission's finding that the company was involved in the conspiracy is lacking. The company points to the fact that it made no weldless chain, although it at times purchased small amounts of such chain for resale as an accommodation to its customers; that such resales were usually priced f. o. b. its factory at Tonawanda, New York, and rarely, when shipped with other chain, f. o. b. Pittsburgh; that about 95% of the tire chain sold by the company was its own patented "claw chain," the published price of which differed from the prices of tire chain of other petitioners; that, while in selling its patented tire chain it independently adopted the universal delivered price method, the use of that method did not result in "any regular identity of price with" the tire chain of other petitioners; that when the company entered the tire chain business it adopted the pricing practices of established manufacturers; and that the only way to compete for tire chain sales was by the universal price method, "Because of the homogeneity of the product and the peculiarly sporadic geography of the tire chain market."

Columbus McKinnon asserts that the Commission's inference of its complicity is based on: (1) its membership in the Chain Institute, and (2) the similarity of its prices on welded chain to those of competing manufacturers. It contends that, considered in proper perspective, those facts do not justify the inference, and that mere membership in a trade association, without more, is not enough to establish participation in a conspiracy. It cites, in that connection, Phelps Dodge Refining Corp. v. Federal Trade Commission, 2 Cir. [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,297], 139 F. 2d 393, 396. We note that in that case the court went on to say:

> "* * * Thus the issue is reduced to whether a member who knows or should know that his association is engaged in an unlawful enterprise and continues his membership without protest may be charged with complicity as a confederate. We believe he may. Granted that his mere membership does not authorize unlawful conduct by the association, once he is chargeable with knowledge that his fellows are acting unlawfully his failure to dissociate himself from them is a ratification of what they are doing. He becomes one of the principals in the enterprise and cannot disclaim joint responsibility for the illegal uses to which the association is put. While the culpable role of petitioner Cyanamid is less clearly established than that of the three petitioners already considered, it nevertheless sustains the Commission's findings."

The record shows that the Columbus McKinnon Chain Corporation was an active member of the Chain Institute from its inception, and followed the delivered pricing methods of other petitioners at least with respect to unpatented tire chain and welded chain.

The Commission, we think, reasonably could infer that Columbus McKinnon Chain Corporation, as a member of the Chain Institute, knew or was charged with knowledge of the collusive efforts of other members to stabilize prices for chain and chain products by suppressing competitive pricing, and was therefore a party to the conspiracy. Compare, Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute, supra, pages 717-720 of 333 U. S.

[Order Affirmed]

The order under review is affirmed, and an order of enforcement may be entered.

[¶ 68,759] United States v. International Boxing Club of New York, Inc., et al.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civ. No. 74-81. Dated June 24, 1957.

Case No. 1122 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Injunctive Relief—Dissolution and Divestiture.—Two individuals who controlled corporations engaged in the promotion of professional championship boxing contests in Illinois and New York and controlled corporate boxing stadia located in the same states were ordered to transfer all of their stockholdings in the New York stadium corporation to a trustee and to divest themselves of all of their stockholdings in such corporation within a period of five years. In the event that the individuals failed to dispose of such stockholdings, the trustee was empowered to effect a sale of the stock. Also, the dissolution of the corporations engaged in the promotion of boxing contests in Illinois and New York was ordered.

It had been found that the individuals, the boxing clubs, and the New York stadium corporation (1) engaged in a conspiracy to restrain and to monopolize the promotion of professional championship boxing contests and (2) monopolized the promotion of such boxing contests. Severance of the interlocking ownership of the individuals in the New York stadium was necessary because the defendants through ownership and control of the stadium were in a position to exclude other promoters from using it to promote boxing contests. The boxing clubs were the promotional arms of the individuals, and they were used to monopolize the promotion of such contests.

See Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8233.700.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Injunctive Relief.—Injunctive Decrees—Compulsory Leasing.—Two individuals who controlled corporations engaged in the promotion of professional championship boxing contests and two corporate stadia where boxing contests were held were directed to lease the stadia on a reasonable rental basis as long as they owned or controlled them. This was a necessary remedy because the individuals, through their ownership and control of the stadia, were in a position to exclude other promoters from using them to promote boxing contests.

See Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8233.800.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Injunctive Relief—Injunctive Decrees—Interference with Competitors.—Two individuals who controlled corporations engaged in the business of promoting professional championship boxing contests and stadia where such contests were held were prohibited from interfering with an independent promoter's disposition of radio or television rights to any championship boxing contest promoted by such promoter and from interfering with the negotiations of sponsors or networks with independent promotors concerning the televising or broadcasting of any championship boxing contest. Also, the individuals and one of the stadia were prohibited for a period of five years from promoting more than two championship boxing contests in each calendar year. It had been found that the defendants (1) engaged in a conspiracy to restrain and to monopolize the promotion of professional championship boxing contests and (2) monopolized the promotion of such boxing contests.

See Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8233.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Injunctive Relief—Injunctive Decrees—Termination of Exclusive Agreements.—Where two individuals, two boxing clubs, and an operator of a boxing stadium were found to have engaged in a conspiracy to restrain and to monopolize the promotion of professional championship boxing contests and to have monopolized the promotion of such boxing contests, the court declared illegal and void all exclusive service contracts for championship boxers or contenders and all exclusive leases with stadia for the staging of boxing contests. By such contracts, the defendants preempted the championship field by requiring all championship contenders to sign with them for future contests and preempted the field of places where championship boxing contests could be staged.

See Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8233.625.

For the plaintiff: Herbert Brownell, Jr., Attorney General; Victor R. Hansen, Assistant Attorney General; and Victor H. Kramer, Richard B. O'Donnell, John D. Swartz, William J. Elkins, Lawrence Gochberg, Frank D. Curtis, and Edward F. Corcoran, Attorneys, Department of Justice.

For the defendants: Simpson, Thacher & Bartlett (Whitney North Seymour, Benjamin C. Milner, Armand F. Macmanus, and Newell G. Alford, Jr., of counsel) for Madison Square Garden Corporation and International Boxing Club of New York, Inc.; and Reid & Priest, and Peabody, Westbrook, Watson & Stephenson (Charles H. Watson and Ralph M. McDermid, of counsel), for International Boxing Club, Inc., James D. Norris, and Arthur M. Wirtz.

[Findings]

THE COURT [SYLVESTER J. RYAN, District Judge, In full text]: We heretofore have found from the evidence presented at trial and concluded that the defendants engaged in a combination and conspiracy in unreasonable restraint of trade the promotion of professional championship boxing contests in violation of Section I of the Sherman Act. We further have found that the defendants have conspired to monopolize trade and commerce in the same field, thus violating Section II of the Act. Defendants also were found to have actually monopolized commerce in the professional championship boxing field which was a further violation of Section II.

[Objectives of Decree]

We now, after full hearing of all parties and upon consideration of the evidence submitted, turn to the formulation of an appropriate decree to remedy the wrongs which were committed. The decree in a monopolization case should have three objectives:

> "One, it puts an end to the combination or conspiracy when that is itself the violation.
> "Two, it deprives the antitrust defendants of the benefit of their conspiracy.
> "Three, it is designed to break up or render impotent a monopoly power which violates the Act." (Schine Chain Theatres v. U. S. [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,245], 334 U. S. at 128-9.)

[Dissolution of Combination]

The conspiracy which we found to have existed was made effective by the concert of action of the defendants. Thus, by stock ownership and control of stock voting power, defendants dictated the election and functioning of interlocking directors and officers and of management between the Chicago and Mid-Western boxing interests —defendants Wirtz and Norris—and the New York interests—Madison Square Garden.

The illegal conspiracy and monopolization was a direct and immediate purpose of this combination. There must be a dissolution of the combination which will permit the reestablishment of the competitive positions of the defendants and the entry of others into the market.

The combination still exists and continues to function in only slightly altered form. Its purposes and objectives remain unchanged. The stock ownership of IBC-NY has been transferred to Madison Square Garden Corporation. IBC-Illinois has now Chicago Stadium Corporation as its sole stockholder. Wirtz and Norris and interests allied to them still have controlling interest in Madison Square Garden and it stands undisputed that Wirtz and Norris control and direct the management of Madison Square Garden and dictate its policies and boxing activities. Wirtz and Norris are the sole stockholders of Chicago Stadium Corporation. Norris is the president and a director of IBC-New York, of IBC-Illinois, of Madison Square Garden Corporation and of Chicago Stadium Corporation.

Wirtz is a director of all four corporations, and in addition, vice-president of the Board and treasurer of Madison Square Garden Corporation. Although the stock ownership of IBC-New York and IBC-Illinois has been changed, they still share the profits of championship contests as of old.

[Television and Radio Rights]

With respect to the control of television and radio rights, a mere corporate structure change has taken place. A new corporation has been formed, Teleradio Promotions, Inc., and its entire issued capital stock is owned by Chicago Stadium Corporation. To Teleradio has been given the right to sell television and radio rights in connection with the Wednesday night television series. Thus, Wirtz and Norris control Teleradio and IBC-Illinois through Chicago Stadium Corporation, and with it the Wednesday night television series, and through IBC-New York and Madison Square Garden these same combinations control the Friday night series. Truman Gibson is still found as one of the liaison between New York and Chicago. He is still an employee and secretary of IBC-NY and IBC-Illinois, and is now, in addition, an employee and secretary of Teleradio Promotions, Inc.

[Control of Contests]

The unlawful combination of the defendants still possesses and exercises its monopolistic control in the field of championship contests. It appears that since May 15, 1953 there have been held in the United States 37 championship contests, excluding one bantamweight contest. The defendants admit that they had promotional control over 24 of the 37 championship contests which were held, or of 65 per cent of the market, but we find that the defendants were not financial strangers to the other 13 championship contests which were held in cities other than New York and Chicago. Because the defendants are licensed by state authorities to promote only in New York and Illinois, they could not be the persons actually designated as the promoter of the 13 championship contests, but all five of the championship contests which originated in cities other than Chicago or New York on Friday nights were televised on IBC's New York Friday night television series.

We find, too, that all of the 37 championship contests in this period from May 15, 1953, save only the five outdoor contests, were televised on either the defendants' Wednesday or Friday night television series, and that the profits of the sale of the telecasting rights inured to the benefit of the defendants.

[Stock Divestiture]

The combination of the defendants is still in operation in violation of the law as we have heretofore found. The dissolution of the combination can only be accomplished by an immediate and complete severance of the interlocking ownership of Norris and Wirtz in Madison Square Garden. This means there must be a complete divestiture of the stockholdings of Norris and Wirtz in the Garden. The Government has established Norris and Wirtz control the Garden Corporation.

The decree will direct Norris and Wirtz to divest themselves of all of their stockholdings in the Garden. This includes all stock which they own individually or actually control through other entities.

In order not to unduly affect the market for stock or innocent stockholders the divestiture will be accomplished in the following manner:

One, Norris and Wirtz within 30 days after the entry of final judgment will resign as officers and directors of the Garden Corporation.

Two, Norris and Wirtz will be enjoined thereafter from holding any office or directorship in the Garden Corporation.

Three, Norris and Wirtz will be enjoined from voting by proxy or otherwise any stock at any meeting of the Garden Corporation stockholders, either for the election of officers or directors or for determination of any business policy of the corporation.

Four, Norris and Wirtz will be ordered to transfer all of their Garden stockholdings direct and indirect to a trustee to be named by the Court, who will be empowered and authorized to vote the stock and exercise all other incidence of ownership.

Five, Norris and Wirtz are to effect a sale or other divestiture of their ownership of Garden stock within five years from the date of the decree, which divestiture shall be subject to the approval of this Court. Upon their failure to effect such sale or divestiture within the fixed time limit, the trustee will be authorized and empowered to effect a suitable sale of the stock within the next two years after the expiration of Norris's and Wirtz's time limit.

The Court's purpose here is to bring about the complete divestiture within seven years of the date of the final judgment and decree and in the meanwhile the defendants may receive and collect any dividends declared and paid on this stock.

The foregoing will effect a major step toward undoing the illegal combination found by the Court to exist. Competition for championship contests will then be possible between Madison Square Garden in New York, on the one hand, and the Chicago Stadium, Detroit Olympia and St. Louis Arena, all still owned or controlled by Wirtz and Norris or by interests allied to or associated with them on the other hand.

[Promotional Activities—Limitations]

This, however, will not afford the full measure of relief required in this suit. The illegal monopoly of championship boxing contests was made possible by defendants because of their control of the promotion of championship fights together with their control of the principal stadia for the staging of the fights. In other words, combination between promotion and arena operation was a means by which the objects of the illegal conspiracy were accomplished.

Accordingly, there must be a limitation placed on the promotional activities of these defendants with respect to championship contests. The decree will enjoin the Garden for a period of five years from promoting more than two championship boxing contests in each calendar year. Likewise, the decree will enjoin for a period of five years Wirtz and Norris from promoting more than two championship contests in each calendar year.

[Radio and Television Restrictions]

The Court will accept provisions in the decree with respect to this substantially as proposed by the defendants. Such provisions shall, however, incorporate and include restraints upon the defendants from hereafter interfering in any way with an independent promoter's disposition of television or radio rights to any championship contest which may be promoted by such independent promoter or from hereafter interfering in any manner with a sponsor or television network from negotiating directly with such independent promoter of championship contests to present and include them in any television or radio broadcasting series, or to the television or radio broadcasting of such contests independently of such series.

[Necessity of Divorcement]

Divorcement is found to be a necessary remedy in this suit because defendants through ownership and control of the principal stadia for staging championship bouts are in a position to exclude other promoters from using these stadia to promote a championship fight.

The Court determines that it is necessary to separate and limit promotion of championship boxing contests from the operation of the arenas where those contests are staged.

[Rental of Stadiums]

In connection with this limited divorcement which we have directed, the Court will direct the compulsory leasing of Madison Square Garden and of Chicago Stadium as long as they are owned or controlled by the defendants or any of them on a reasonable rental basis to be judicially determined upon application after refusal to fix a reasonable rental. Jurisdiction will be reversed by the Court to pass upon the reasonable rental fee should agreement not be reached on reasonable rental. The Court will incorporate in its decree to accomplish this [sic] provisions substantially as proposed by the defendants.

[Dissolution of Boxing Clubs]

The divorcement to be effected must be complete and irrevocable. Defendants brought the International Boxing Club of New York, Inc. and the International Boxing Club-Illinois into existence as the instrumentalities by which the illegal conspiracy was carried out. The stock of IBC-New York is wholly-owned by Madison Square Garden Corporation. The stock of IBC-Illinois is owned by the Chicago Stadium Corporation. These corporations are the promotional arms of the defendants, conceived and used to enable defendants to restrain and monopolize promotion of championship boxing contests. Their assets are of but nominal value except for the goodwill attaching to their names by virtue of the conspiracy.

Both IBC corporations must be dissolved. The decree will enjoin both corporations until dissolved from functioning in the promotion of boxing contests, will declare illegal and void all existing and unexecuted contracts of either corporation for the exclusive services of any boxer and for the promotion of more than two contests in any one calendar year within the period of five years and will require dissolution of each.

[Exclusive Service Contracts]

The final major provision of the decree must declare illegal and void all exclusive service contracts for championship boxers or contenders as well as all exclusive leases with stadia for the staging of boxing contests. By these exclusive contracts defendants preempted the championship field by requiring all championship contenders to sign up with defendants for future bouts. Likewise the exclusive leases with arenas and stadia other than those owned or controlled by the defendants permitted them to preempt the field of places for the staging of championship contests.

The relief here must be broader than the championship field because the evil to be remedied is broader. By terminating all exclusive contracts and leases and enjoining them in the future, the way will be open for those who wish and have the financial ability and otherwise meet local and state requirements to enter into the promotion of championship boxing contests. The Court will accept generally the language of the injunction against exclusive contracts as submitted by the Government in its proposed decree.

[Purpose of Relief]

The Court desires to note that the relief to be afforded is required by the facts of this suit. Championship boxing was regarded by defendants as a business, engaged in solely for profit. For these profits defendants were bent upon a plan of monopolization to exclude all competition and leave them free to reap financial gain. The extent of defendants' activities in this illegal conspiracy requires drastic affirmative action by this Court.

The relief outlined herein is designed to put an end to the conspiracy; to deprive defendants of their present position in the market, which was attained through the conspiracy, and to destroy the monopoly which they created and seek to perpetuate. Professional championship boxing contests will be opened with television and radio broadcasting to legitimate and healthy competition.

[Retention of Jurisdiction]

Jurisdiction of this cause and of the parties hereto is retained by the Court for the purposes of enabling any of the parties to this judgment or any other person, firm or corporation that may hereafter become bound thereby, to apply to this Court at any time for such orders, modifications, vacations or directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying-out of the final judgment and for the enforcement of compliance therewith.

[Other Provisions of Decree]

Judgment is to be entered herein against all defendants for all costs to be taxed in this suit. The usual provisions against extra-territorial operation of the decree permitting reasonable inspection of defendants' records by the Attorney General are to be incorporated in the decree substantially as proposed by the defendants. The decree will be settled accordingly within one week from this date.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Price Fixing—Transportation Rates of Motor Carriers—Regulation of Rates by Interstate Commerce Commission.—Motor carriers were granted a judgment of acquittal in a Government action which charged that they conspired, in violation of the Sherman Act, to fix the rates for transporting household goods of military personnel from United States installations in New Mexico. The court ruled that there was no evidence of a conspiracy to file identical rates; that there was sufficient divergence in the rates to vitiate the charge; that there was no evidence of any injury to the public, even if the alleged conspiracy existed; and that there was no unreasonable restraint of trade because the motor carriers' rates, which were less than those charged civilians, were approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Judgment of the Court

The Court [WALDO H. ROGERS, District Judge, In full text]: Members of the jury, since about 10:30 this morning, until a few minutes ago, with the exception of an interval for lunch, a good many legal issues have been presented to me, in the form of Motions for a Directed Verdict, or for a Judgment of Acquittal, to be more precise.

This case, as you know, has a most interesting background. It has been carefully investigated, carefully prepared, carefully tried. We have had a number of past proceedings in the case. Motions filed and argued, an extensive Pre-Trial Conference between all of the counsel—they came in from all points of America—and I have had under advisement, some legal points.

I didn't want to precipitously rule on the face of an indictment. I determined to hear the evidence, and to choose as fine a jury as I could have, to listen to it, and I am sure I got that form of a jury.

Sometimes, hearing evidence makes plainer, makes more relevant, makes clearer certain rules of law that are presented to you, and in view of the intricacies of the case, in view of the many days you have spent, and the interest that you have shown, I am going to go into some detail, at least, as to my rulings.

[Conspiracy]

As the case was presented to this Court, I rule, as a matter of law, which means you folks don't have to rule, because I will rule —I take the responsibility—first, that there is no evidence of a conspiracy or agreement or any action under it, to file identical rates. I believe there is a sufficient divergence in the rates, and at least in the rates eventually filed with the transportation officers of Sandia Base and Kirtland Air Force Base, to vitiate that charge.

[Restraint of Trade]

Secondly, I find there is no evidence of a restraint of trade, or a burden on Interstate Commerce by any alleged agreements, whatever it was having been made.

[Injury to Public]

Third, I am lining up with my Court of Appeals of my own Circuit, who I work with day in and day out—and I hope have another quarter of a century of association —I stay with them. I don't overrule them, I don't overrule those fine gentlemen—as pastly constituted, as now constituted, or as constituted in the future. I am sticking close, I am riveted to them, so I claim you have to have an injury to the public as a whole, and I hold there is no evidence, at all, of any injury to the public, even if there was the alleged agreement between these nine agents of the corporations.

[Unreasonable Restraint of Trade]

There is another point that I am not constrained to pass on, that is the linking up of the National carriers. If there was any agreement, it was, of course, formulated by the nine local agents. I have an abhorrence toward releasing the people who might have been the ultimate large beneficiaries, and feeding the so-called small men to the wolves, but I don't have to, in here, because the main basis of my decision, here, along with the rest of the foregoing three grounds, [is that] there is no evidence of unreasonable restraint of trade.

I emphasize, "unreasonable". Here, these tariffs that have been mentioned, are tariffs that are filed in the regulated industry, warehousing is a regulated industry. You ladies and gentlemen know what I mean by that, public utilities are regulated, and railroads are regulated.

As to charges, these van lines are regulated. You saw, I saw you looking at them, these various tariffs, which bear motor vehicles numbers of that division of the Interstate Commerce Commission. They had to be filed there. They had to be examined, open for examination by the public, and they received, at least the passive or tacit approval of another branch of our National government. If the ICC and the Department of Justice aren't able to agree, that is just too bad, I don't care, but anyway, I hold that there is no unreasonable restraint of trade, because they used a tariff that is approved, the rates of which are less than that charged the civilians.

[Judgment of Acquittal]

This is a case of first impressions. I might feel like an old hen that hatched out a fancy duck, or something, but that is it. They gave it to me, so, as I understand it, with a judgment of acquittal you don't have a regular directed verdict form, there.

Mr. Sloan: That is correct, yes, Rule 29.

The Court: Is that correct? Rule 29?

Mr. Sloan: Yes, sir, Motions for Directed Verdict are abolished, and Motions—(Interrupted)

The Court: Ah, that is all I need to know. Yes. Fine. In civil cases, I still direct them. I don't usually dismiss a criminal case, but it is my responsibility, and I have had it on my mind a lot, read lots of citations and texts, this was admirably prepared, as I said, and presented by both the government and the defendants.

[Return of Documents]

Mr. Sloan: May I make a Motion, first, Your Honor? I would like to make a Motion that the government would be required to return to each of the defendants, the documents that have been taken from them.

The Court: Well, let's see, it is hard to get down—the jury may leave. Have you any objection to that, Mr. Memler?

Mr. Sloan: Documents and all copies of documents.

The Court: Sure, do that, that is double jeopardy.

[¶ 68,762] Aircoach Transport Association, Inc., etc., et al. v. Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Co., etc., et al.

In the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. Civil Action No. 875-57. Dated July 5, 1957.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Price Fixing—Concerted Transportation Rate Quotations to Military Establishments—Regulation of Rates by Interstate Commerce Commission—Primary Jurisdiction.—In an action for treble damages and injunctive relief where supplemental air carriers charged that railroads violated the Sherman Act by making concerted quotations, to military establishments, of special transportation rates (varying to as low as 50 per cent below the railroads' regularly filed tariffs), the court granted the air carriers' motion for summary judgment except as to damages. The court ruled that the antitrust immunity conferred by Section 5a of the Interstate Commerce Act did not apply to concerted quotations made to the Government under Section 22 of the Interstate Commerce Act (providing for reduced rates to the Government); that the Interstate Commerce Commission had never immunized the railroads' concerted Section 22 quotations; that the Interstate Commerce Commission did not have primary jurisdiction over the subject matter of the air carriers' suit; and that the concerted Section 22 quotations of the railroads were illegal per se under the antitrust laws.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2011.355, 2039.70.

For the plaintiffs: Gerhard P. Van Arkel and Henry Kaiser, Washington, D. C.

For the defendants: Douglas F. Smith, Stuart S. Ball, Howard J. Trienens, Richard J. Flynn (Sidley, Austin, Burgess & Smith); Joseph H. Hays, Amos M. Mathews, Joseph D. Feeney, Jr.; John Bodner, Jr.; Hugh B. Cox, Paul F. McArdle (Covington & Burling); Edward K. Wheeler (Wheeler & Wheeler); William E. Miller, Stephen Ailes, Richard A. Whiting (Steptoe & Johnson); Newell A. Clapp (Morison, Murphy, Clapp & Abrams); Arthur Littleton, Benjamin M. Quigg (Morgan, Lewis & Bockius); and J. David Mann, Jr.

[Alleged Antitrust Violations]

JOSEPH C. MCGARRAGHY, District Judge [In full text]: Since October 1, 1956, the defendant railroads have been transporting military personnel on official business under a reduced rate agreement known as the Joint Military Passenger Agreement providing that the railroads would charge the military establishment a standard or uniform discount of 10% below their filed commercial tariffs. Commencing in 1953, the defendants began the practice of making concerted quotations to the military establishment of special rates varying to as low as 50% below the defendants' regularly filed tariffs.

The plaintiffs who are supplemental air carriers have brought this action to enjoin said concerted special rates and for treble damages, alleging violation of the Sherman Act and of the Clayton Act. With the filing of the complaint, the plaintiffs moved for a preliminary injunction. Prior to hearing on that motion, certain of the defendants moved to dismiss or in the alternative for summary judgment and certain other defendants filed motions for summary judgment. The plaintiffs also filed a motion for summary judgment.

[Defenses]

The defendants claim that the bids which are attacked by the complaint as being in violation of the anti-trust laws have been made pursuant to and in conformity with agreements approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission and, therefore, that they are expressly relieved from the operation of the anti-trust laws with respect to the practices complained of by Section 5a of the Interstate Commerce Act. Further, the defendants say that the subject matter of this suit is within the exclusive primary jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission and that this Court is without jurisdiction to grant relief to the plaintiffs.

[Rulings]

With reference to the points of law raised by the several motions which have been argued fully and briefed exhaustively, the Court is of the opinion as follows:

1. The anti-trust immunity conferred by Section 5a of the Interstate Commerce Act does not apply to concerted Section 22 quotations made to the United States Government.

2. The Interstate Commerce Commission has never immunized defendants' concerted Section 22 quotations.

3. The Interstate Commerce Commission does not have primary jurisdiction over the subject matter of this suit.

4. The concerted Section 22 quotations of defendants are illegal per se under the anti-trust laws.

5. The defenses raised by the defendants are insufficient as a matter of law and there is no genuine issue as to any material fact.

Accordingly, the plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment except as to damages will be granted and the defendants will be enjoined in accordance with the prayers of the complaint.

Counsel for plaintiffs will submit an order in conformity with this memorandum.

[¶ 68,763] In the Matter of the Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum dated February 15, 1957 and Addressed to Siemens & Halske A. G., Berlin, Germany.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. No. M11-188. Filed June 28, 1957.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Criminal Prosecutions—Grand Jury Proceedings—Production of Records of Affiliated Foreign Company.—A motion to quash a subpoena duces tecum, which was addressed to a German corporation in connection with a grand jury investigation as to possible violations of the antitrust laws and which was served upon the assistant treasurer of a partly owned subsidiary of the German corporation located in New York, was denied. Even if its corporate affiliation were disregarded, the subsidiary located in New York was an agent of the German corporation, and the parent's activities through this agent were sufficient to sustain service of process in New York. Furthermore, the intercorporate history established that the subsidiary located in New York was no more than an alter ego for the German corporation. Under the circumstances, it was the duty of the court to pierce the corporate veil.

See Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8021.600.

Memorandum

[Motion to Quash Subpoena]

WALSH, District Judge [In full text]: Siemens & Halske A. G., a German corporation, moves to quash a subpoena addressed to it in connection with a grand jury investigation as to possible violations of the anti-trust laws through alleged cartel activities of persons in the radio and television industry. The subpoena was served upon the assistant treasurer of Siemens New York Incorporated, a subsidiary of Siemens & Halske A. G.

Siemens & Halske A. G. is a large German producer of electrical and electronic equipment. It is, in turn, a subsidiary of Siemens-Schuckertwerke A. G.

[Subsidiary an Agent]

In 1954 the two German Siemens corporations established a jointly owned subsidiary, a Delaware corporation, upon which the subpoena in question was served. Siemens (N. Y.) acts as representative of the German organizations in this country. It assists in the negotiation of contracts, servicing contracts and advising potential customers. It also advises and assists Siemens with respect to patents and patent licenses and it furnishes general technical, economic and financial information from this country. To a minor extent it sells products of the Siemens enterprise and purchases a small amount of American products for Siemens in Germany. It devotes itself exclusively to the business of Siemens. For these services it receives a flat allowance of $17,500 per month, plus a 5% price differential with respect to sales made for Siemens or purchases made on Siemens' account.

Even if its corporate affiliation be disregarded, the New York company is clearly an agent of the German parent. The parent's activities through this agent are sufficient to sustain the service of process within this district. See Applewhaite v. Saguenay Terminals, Ltd., — F. Supp. —, mandamus denied — F. 2d —; Allegue v. Gulf and South American S. S. Co., Inc., S. D. N. Y., 103 F. Supp. 34, 35; Nugey v. Paul-Lewis Laboratories, 132 F. Supp. 448; *McClendon v. [Intercompany History]

In addition, however, the intercorporate history shows that the New York organization is no more than an alter ego for the German parents. The two German affiliates hold its entire stock. The chairman of its board of directors is a director and member of the board of management of one German parent, and also its head of international operations. Its president, who is also a member of the board, is an engineer formerly employed by one of the German organizations who came to this country to take charge of the American corporation. Two other members of the five member board are also officers or members of the boards of the German parent corporations. The American corporation has no business except the services it performs for its German parents. Although its officers have appreciable freedom of day to day action, they obviously are dependent to a substantial extent upon instructions from the parent corporation with respect to the items upon which they are to work. They are further restricted by the amount of the fee paid by the German parent. Any expenditure which will raise their budget above that amount must be approved in advance by the parent abroad.

The business of S. & H. which is serviced through the American corporation, is substantial and continuous. It includes contracts totaling over $11 million in two years. These contracts were all concluded directly by the German parent, but the American corporation aided in locating and securing the customers, in servicing them, by furnishing engineering advice and answering other inquiries.

[Corporate Veil Pierced]

Notwithstanding Cannon Mfg. Co. v. Cudahy Co., 267 U. S. 333; People's Tobacco Co. v. Am. Tobacco Co., 246 U. S. 79, and the dictum in Eastman Co. v. Southern Photo Co., 273 U. S. 359, it is my opinion that at least for the purpose of sustaining process in aid of an investigation into crime, particularly a violation of the anti-trust laws, it is the duty of this Court to pierce the corporate veil with respect to a wholly owned subsidiary, such as here presented. In the Matter of Grand Jury Duces Tecum (Electric & Musical Industries, Ltd.), M. 18-304, Opinion dated June 27, 1957. While not overruling these cases, United States v. Scophony Corp., [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,238], 333 U. S. 795, narrowly restricted them to other cases presenting identical facts and to controversies of a private nature which are not within Congressional policy manifested by the liberalization of the venue provision of Section 12 of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C. § 22). See 333 U. S. at pp. 816-18.

The motion is denied. It is so ordered.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. September Term, 1956—April Session, 1957. No. 11863. Dated July 17, 1957.

Petition for review of order of the Federal Trade Commission.

Federal Trade Commission Act

Federal Trade Commission Enforcement and Procedure—Unfair Practices—Discontinuance of Unlawful Practices—Necessity for Cease and Desist Order—Public Interest.— A Federal Trade Commission order prohibiting canners from entering into a conspiracy to refuse to negotiate or deal with a tomato growers' cooperative marketing association or to refuse to recognize such association as the bargaining agent for its member growers was set aside on the ground that the facts did not support the Commission's ruling that the issuance of the order was in the public interest. Evidence established that the practices complained of had been discontinued before the issuance of the complaint, that such practices had not been committed for over four years, that the association had acquired a strong position in the industry, and that the canners, with the exception of one, had freely negotiated with the association. The fact that the canners insisted that their course of conduct was not unlawful and the fact that no affidavits appeared in the record indicating a clear intention to refrain from the complained of practices could not support the issuance of the order. While the Commission has broad discretion to determine whether or not a cease and desist order is needed to prevent the resumption of unlawful practices, such discretion must be confined within the bounds of reasonableness.

For the respondent: Robert B. Dawkins and John W. Carter, Jr.

Setting aside a Federal Trade Commission cease and desist order in Dkt. 5994.

Before LINDLEY and SCHNACKENBERG, Circuit Judges, and BRIGGLE, District Judge.

[Review of FTC Order]

SCHNACKENBERG, Circuit Judge [In full text]: On the petition of Stokely-Van Camp, Inc., et al., we review an order of the Federal Trade Commission directing petitioners to cease and desist from engaging in certain acts and practices found to constitute unfair methods of competition and unfair acts or practices in commerce, within the meaning of section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended.[2] The hearing examiner and the Commission found that petitioners, in purchasing raw tomatoes in 1951 for canning purposes, had violated the Act by entering into a common understanding and agreement to refuse to negotiate or deal with Cannery Growers, Inc., a tomato growers co-operative marketing association (referred to herein as "co-op"), or to recognize it as the bargaining agent for its grower members.

The Commission's complaint was issued on May 21, 1952. Petitioners' answers denied that they had violated the Act.

[Initial Decisions]

The hearing examiner issued two initial decisions in this case. The first was rendered on February 3, 1954, at the conclusion of the introduction of evidence in support of the complaint.[3]

[1] H. J. Heinz Company, Campbell Soup Company, Joseph Campbell Company, Bauer Cannery, Inc., Foster Canning, Inc., Hirzel Canning Company, Lake Erie Canning Co. of Sandusky, J. Weller Company, and Winorr Canning Company.

[2] The pertinent provisions of the Act are as follows:

"Sec. 5. (a)(1) Unfair methods of competition in commerce, and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce, are hereby declared unlawful. * * *

"(6). The Commission is empowered and directed to prevent persons, partnerships, or corporations * * * from using unfair methods of competition in commerce and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce." 66 Stat. 632, 15 U. S. C. A. § 45(a)(1)(6).

[3] Upon motion of respondents, the examiner dismissed the complaint as to certain respondents for failure of proof, and dismissed as to all respondents the allegations of the complaint relating to price fixing and preventing competing purchasers from dealing with the co-op. An appeal was taken to the Commission only with respect to the dismissal of the price fixing charges, and the hearing examiner's decision was affirmed.

The second initial decision, rendered on August 8, 1955, at the close of the entire case, dismissed all the allegations of the complaint charging petitioners herein with inducing the grower members to breach their contract with the co-op. As to petitioners and Hunt Foods of Ohio, Inc., the hearing examiner made findings of fact, and concluded, that their acts and practices, beginning in the spring of 1951 and continuing through the remainder of the tomato contracting and harvesting season of that year, were performed pursuant to a common undestanding and planned common course of action (a) to refuse to negotiate or deal with the co-op as a bargaining agent for its grower members, and (b) to refuse to grant recognition of, or to negotiate with, the co-op by deducting the dues check-off for grower members of that organization, which constitutes an unreasonable restraint of trade and an unfair method of competition under the Act. However, he dismissed the complaint without prejudice, saying, that "it is believed that the Commission would be justified in assuming from the facts disclosed that the respondents will not again attempt to engage in these acts and practices in this industry and therefore it would not be in the public interest for the Commission to issue an order to cease and desist at this time."

[FTC Decision]

The Commission, on appeal from the second initial decision, held that the record fully supported the hearing examiner's findings as to the existence in 1951 of an agreement to boycott the co-op. But it held that it would not be justified in assuming that the boycott would not be renewed, and that the public interest required the prevention of such renewal by issuing an order. On June 29, 1956, such an order was issued, directing that petitioners cease and desist from entering into, continuing, co-operating in, or carrying out any planned course of action, understanding, agreement, combination or conspiracy, to do or perform any of the following acts or things:

(a) Refusing to grant recognition of or to negotiate or deal with Cannery Growers, Inc., an association of tomato growers, as a bargaining agent for its grower members;

(b) Refusing to purchase or to contract to purchase tomatoes from growers who are members of Cannery Growers, Inc.[4]

[Contentions]

1. Briefly, petitioners state their position as follows: There was no direct evidence of a conspiracy, and hence this is an inference case. In 1951, the co-op arbitrarily asserted that a refusal to agree to its demands constituted a refusal to negotiate and a refusal to grant a dues check-off constituted a refusal to recognize. The attitude of the various petitioners toward the co-op varied; two for independent business reasons did not negotiate; some negotiated briefly but gave up because of the unreasonable demands of the co-op; others continued to negotiate and came close to agreement. The only similarity of conduct among petitioners was inability to reach agreement with the co-op. This evidence cannot support a finding of a common course of conduct to refuse to negotiate. They further contend that the Commission ignored the obvious fact that the conduct of petitioners toward the co-op was reasonable and the exercise of good business judgment, and that the co-op injected itself into a well-established economic relationship and attempted to effect drastic changes in price and other terms, all within the short space of the few weeks of the tomato contracting season. They point out that the co-op had never negotiated before, lacked confidence in its own position, wrote threatening letters and took extravagant positions in negotiation from which it did not retreat until the end of the tomato contracting season when it was too late to get tomato plants into the ground. It demanded a price increase of 65%, elimination of quality controls, a check-off of dues to it and by bulletins to its members engaged in a campaign of abuse. Petitioners did not know how many growers belonged to the co-op, questioned its responsibility, had no permission from its growers to grant the check-off and could not economically pay the 65% increase in price demanded by the co-op. Petitioners and the co-op failed to agree upon a contract during the relatively short tomato contracting season because of these economic and psychological reasons, leaving no legal basis for the inference that such failure was the result of conspiracy.

[4] The position of the petitioners in this court, in reference to clause (b) is not clear. Moreover this clause is practically ignored in the Commission's brief and is not involved in the contested issue stated in petitioners' brief, except that they allege that a charge that petitioners engaged in a common course of action to boycott grower members of the co-op was among eight dismissed charges. On the other hand respondent, while denying that this charge was dismissed, cites no finding of fact incorporated in the Commission's order under review either expressly or by reference to the initial decision, upon which clause (b) may be based.

On the other hand, respondent's contentions may be summarized as follows: The meetings between the parties do not in themselves constitute negotiations, and petitioners in reality were attempting to obtain approval of their standard forms of contract without negotiation, and at the same time were refusing to recognize the co-op as the bargaining agent of its members. Respondent asserts that the co-op made no adamant demands on the processors and petitioners' alleged business reasons for not negotiating or dealing with the co-op do not render lawful a conspiracy to boycott the co-op.

In their brief petitioners concede that a common agreement to refuse to negotiate with or recognize the co-op would obviously have constituted illegal conduct under the Act.

[Sufficiency of Evidence]

The record before us is massive. It contains 4463 pages of proceedings and 282 pages of exhibits. There is substantial evidence in the whole record to support the Commission's findings of fact, and showing the existence of such an agreement. Those findings are therefore conclusive. Allied Paper Mills v. Federal Trade Commission [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,263], 168 F. 2d 600, 605, cert. den. 336 U. S. 918. This is also true as to inferences which reasonably can be drawn from the proven facts. Federal Trade Commission v. Pacific States Paper Trade Association, 273 U. S. 52, at 61; Triangle Conduit & Cable Co. v. Federal Trade Commission [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,254], 168 F. 2d 175, 180, aff'd *sub nom. Clayton Mark & Co. v. We hold that on the record as a whole there is substantial evidence to support the Commission's findings. Universal Camera Corp. v. National Labor Relations Board, 340 U. S. 474, 488.

[Necessity of Order]

2. With the complaint issued by the Commission, respondents named therein (including petitioners here) were given notice that they had a right to appear and show cause why an order should not be entered requiring them to cease and desist from the violations of law charged in the complaint. Such is the character of the order from which the present appeal has been taken.

The Commission contends that, in the exercise of its discretion, it properly concluded that the public interest required an order to cease and desist. On the other hand, petitioners claim that the purpose of a cease and desist order is not to punish for past practices, but rather to insure that in the future the public will be protected, and that the public interest in the issuance of such an order requires that there be some reasonable expectation that the violations will be repeated. They cite our language in National Lead Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, supra, at 839,

> "* * * While the Commission is vested with a broad discretion to determine whether an order is needed to prevent the resumption of unlawful acts which have been discontinued, this 'discretion must be confined * * * within the bounds of reasonableness.' [citing Marlene's Inc. v. F. T. C., 216 F. 2d 556, at page 559].
> "This rule of reasonableness requires something more than a mere guess or suspicion contrary to the evidence and to the finding of the trial examiner that a resumption of discontinued practices may not reasonably be anticipated. * * *"

They also quote the following from United States v. W. T. Grant Co. et al. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,493], 345 U. S. 629, 633:

> "But the moving party [Commission] must satisfy the court that relief is needed. The necessary determination is that there exists some cognizable danger of recurrent violation, something more than the mere possibility which serves to keep the case alive. * * *"

They refer to Eugene Dietzgen Co. v. Federal Trade Commission [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,216], 142 F. 2d 321, 331, where we said:

"The object of the proceeding to to stop the unfair practice. If the practice has been surely stopped and by the act of the party offending, the object of the proceedings having been attained, no order is necessary, nor should one be entered. * * *"

They also cite Federal Trade Commission v. Civil Service Training Bureau, Inc. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,079], 79 F. 2d 113, involving a cease and desist order against misleading advertising practices, where at 116, the court said:

"The commission is not authorized to issue a cease and desist order as to practices long discontinued, and as to which there is no reason to apprehend renewal."

Petitioners point to their conduct, both before and after the filing of the complaint herein, which, they say, clearly indicates that there is no reasonable expectation that they or any of them will, in the future, resort to any planned common course of action to boycott or refuse to recognize the co-op or negotiate with it.

[Summary of Argument]

Their argument we now summarize.

Whatever petitioners did with relation to the co-op in 1951 was born of the economic conflict which resulted from the appearance of a new and revolutionary force in the tomato industry in Ohio. In late 1950 and early 1951 the co-op claimed representation of a large number of growers in the Ohio tomato market. The co-op proceeded, in a militant fashion, to make demands upon the Ohio processors. The record shows that the petitioners considered these demands unreasonable and as posing a serious threat to the economy of the entire industry. Despite this, the co-op remained firm in its demands throughout the normal tomato contracting season of 1951. The stalemate which resulted was purely temporary. By the latter part of May 1951 the co-op had negotiated a contract with Hunt, had actively negotiated with petitioner Stokely, and had discussed contract terms with most of the other petitioners. By the end of May it was too late in the season for any of the petitioners to do anything about advance contracting for the 1951 crop. If the period during which a compromise could have been achieved between the co-op and the processors had not been limited to the contracting season, other contracts with the co-op might well have resulted. In any event, the alleged conspiracy had terminated and the petitioners and other processors had come to recognize the co-op's position in the industry months prior to the issuance of the complaint on May 21, 1952. The hearing examiner concluded that the battle had ended and that the practices proscribed by the Act would not be resumed.

[Hearing Examiner's Ruling]

The hearing examiner held:

"* * * that the Commission would be justified in assuming from the facts disclosed that the respondents will not again attempt to engage in these acts and practices in this industry and therefore it would not be in the public interest for the Commission to issue an order to cease and desist at this time".

He mentioned several specific facts supporting his conclusion:

"(1) The acts and practices complained of had been definitely discontinued by respondents before the complaint in the case was issued.

"(2) The acts and practices complained of had not been committed for over four years.

"(3) The Co-op had acquired and now occupies a strong position in the industry as a bargaining agent for its member growers.

"(4) Early in 1952, all the respondent processors with the exception of Campbell freely negotiated with the Co-op, had their contracts approved and allowed the 1% check-off which had been the principal stumbling block to negotiations the previous year.

"(5) Commission counsel had not only conceded these facts in their proposed findings but, at the oral argument, also conceded that the alleged illegal practices would probably not recur."

[Adopted Findings]

Commission counsel proposed findings of fact to the hearing examiner, as follows:

"L. The Situation Since 1951.

"166. In 1952, the concerted, planned common course of action between and among the respondents was abandoned and many of them encountered no difficulty in recognizing and dealing with the Cooperative. The respondents, who adopted this more reasonable and wholesome approach included Heinz, Stokely, Hunt-Ohio, Bauer, Sharp, and Winorr, all of whom conferred with officials of the Cooperative, engaged in discussions concerning approval of their contracts, had their contracts approved, and deducted the check-off for the Cooperative.

"167. In 1952 many of the tomato processors had a more friendly attitude toward the Cooperative and were agreeable to granting audiences to its officials. Respondent Everitt E. Richard of respondent Heinz conferred and negotiated with officials of the Cooperative early in March 1952, two weeks before the Heinz contract prices were announced. Then when the Heinz prices were announced on March 14, 1952, the Cooperative approved such prices and the Heinz contract. Thereafter Mr. Richard wrote a letter to the President of the Cooperative, enclosed a copy of the Heinz contract, and advised that Heinz would deduct the check-off and remit the same to the Cooperative for grower-members who authorized such deductions. Respondent A. A. Ehrman of respondent Stokely engaged in an earnest effort to negotiate and did negotiate with the Cooperative in 1952. Respondent Hunt-Ohio did likewise. Respondents Stokely and Hunt-Ohio also sent letters to the Cooperative in 1952, similar to the one sent by Heinz, confirming the results of the negotiations.

"168. Beginning in 1952 certain of the respondents realized the Cooperative was here to stay, that the growers had agreed to it and were agreeable to the check-off, and that the processors would have to conform with the growers' wishes. The respondents who started dealing with the Cooperative in 1952 have continued to do so, and have continued to deal and contract directly with their growers as they always did. Since 1951 there have been no difficulties, and contracts of many of the respondent processors have been approved and relations between them and the Cooperative have been amicable." [5]

These findings were adopted by the hearing examiner, who stated:

"In view of the definite discontinuance of the foregoing acts and practices by the respondent processors before the complaint in this case was issued, and the fact that they have not been committed for more than four years since, and the strong position that the Co-op now occupies in the industry as a bargaining agent for its member tomato growers in the Ohio area, it is believed that the Commission would be justified in assuming from the facts disclosed that the respondents will not again attempt to engage in these acts and practices in this industry and therefore it would not be in the public interest for the Commission to issue an order to cease and desist at this time. * * *."

[Commission's Ruling]

The Commission adopted in toto the hearing examiner's findings. The only announced basis for its reversal of his conclusion that a cease and desist order would not be in the public interest is contained in a single paragraph. It follows:

"In the present case, it is clear that respondents did cease the practices complained of prior to the issuance of the complaint and have not renewed them. Nevertheless, they have at all times insisted that their course of conduct did not violate the law. No affidavits or statements appear in the record indicating a clear intention to refrain from the practices found to exist. The fact that the Co-op now occupies a strong position in the industry as a bargaining agent is a circumstance to be considered, but we do not consider it sufficient. No criticism is to be made against respondents for vigorously defending the position they had taken. This, of course, they had a right to do. Our conclusion simply is that the facts in this particular case do not warrant a dismissal without prejudice; on the other hand, we think an order based on the findings should be issued."

The Commission contends that its action was proper. It relies upon what we said in Marlene's Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission [1954 Trade Cases ¶ 67,882], 216 F. 2d 556, 559:

"That discontinuance of an unlawful practice, of itself does not necessarily preclude the issuance of a cease and desist order is so well settled as to preclude further argument."

and

"* * * 'the Commission had broad discretion to determine whether such an order is needed to prevent resumption' of the unlawful practice."

We added the following language not quoted by the Commission:

[5] The above excerpt omits references to the numbers of record pages and exhibits.

"* * * This discretion must be confined, however, within the bounds of reasonableness."

[Court Review]

Whether or not the discretion granted to the Commission is broad enough to sustain the cease and desist order in this case requires us to consider not only the facts appearing in the record, upon which the hearing examiner based his conclusion that the entry of a cease and desist order would not be in the public interest, but the facts stated by the Commission which it considered sufficient to justify such order.

If we consider only the hearing examiner's statement of the facts upon which his conclusion rested, and the actual findings of fact 166, 167 and 168, supra, which were adopted by the Commission, we see no reason for the issuance of a cease and desist order.

[Commission's Reasoning]

We must, however, consider the reasons given by the Commission for ruling otherwise. It alludes to only four facts. Incidentally, none of those facts is disputed in this case. They are (1) respondents did cease the practices complained of prior to the issuance of the complaint and have not renewed them, (2) they have at all times insisted that their course of conduct did not violate the law, (3) no affidavits or statements appear in the record indicating a clear intention to refrain from the practices found to exist, and (4) the co-op now occupies a strong position in the industry as a bargaining agent.

We are unable to see how fact (1) calls for a cease and desist order. Unless persuasive reasons to the contrary appear, this fact calls for a rejection of such an order.

Fact (2) is irrelevant. Its irrelevancy is emphasized by the Commission's apologetic statement that no criticism is to be made against respondents (petitioners here) for vigorously defending the position they had taken, which, of course they had a right to do. It does not follow, however, that one who defends charges before the Commission is, on that account, to be subjected in the future to a cease and desist order because his defense there proves unsuccessful. That would be a policy abhorrent to our sense of justice.

As to fact (3), it may be admitted arguendo that no affidavits or statements appear in this record showing a clear intention by petitioners to refrain from the practices found to exist. However, there are no affidavits or statements to the contrary. The actual absence of such practices by petitioners, during a period of four years between the termination of the conspiracy in 1951 and the entry of the cease and desist order in 1956, weighs heavily in support of a conclusion that, after the tomato growing season of 1951 ended, there has been no intention on the part of petitioners to again engage in those practices.

As to fact (4), while recognizing the strong position of the co-op as a bargaining agent in the industry, the Commission lightly brushes that fact aside because it does "not consider it sufficient." Why, it does not explain. That statement, without any indication of facts to support it, expresses no adequate basis for a proper exercise of discretion. Dogmatically, the Commission then abruptly states that its conclusion "simply is that the facts in this particular case do not warrant a dismissal without prejudice; on the other hand, we think that an order based on the findings should be issued." Its language boils down to this: "It is so simple because we say it is so."

[Order Set Aside]

We think that the hearing examiner was right and that the Commission was wrong, in entering the cease and desist order. It should have dismissed the complaint, without prejudice.

For the reasons above set forth, the order of the Commission is set aside and the case is remanded to the Commission with instructions to dismiss the complaint, without prejudice.

Fair Trade—Enforcement of Fair Trade Prices—Violation of Injunction—Contempt —Refusal to Pay Costs—Commitment.—Defendants in a fair trade enforcement action had been found guilty of wilfully violating a permanent injunction restraining fair trade price violations, and the court ordered the defendants to pay the fair trader the sum of $600 to cover the expenses of the contempt proceeding. Upon the defendants' failure to pay the $600, the court increased the amount to $700 and ordered that a commitment be issued against the defendants if the $700 was not paid within a specified time.

Federal Trade Commission Act

Federal Trade Commission Enforcement and Procedure—Cease and Desist Order—Court Review—Violation of Decree of Court—Criminal Contempt.—A United States Court of Appeals refused to vacate its finding that two individuals were guilty of criminal contempt for violating the Court's decree enforcing a Federal Trade Commission order prohibiting the individuals and the corporation of which they were officers from falsely advertising a product of the corporation; however, in imposing fines of $1,000 and $750 on the individuals, the Court took into consideration the individuals' assertions that they did not have knowledge of a letter by the corporation's counsel expressing the need for immediate compliance with the Court's decree, and that their contemptuous conduct was a result of inertia rather than of active participation in the advertising practices which violated the decree. The individuals had knowledge of the decree, and the Court imposed an affirmative obligation upon them to take all reasonable steps to effect compliance with the decree.

Each admitted and acquiesced in the following finding made by the Hearing Examiner and adopted by the Commission:

> "Paragraph One: . . . Respondents . . . George Shimmerlik, and Albert T. Wantz, individuals, are now and at all times mentioned herein have been directors of said corporate respondent, and respectively, the . . . treasurer, and secretary thereof . . . and are now, and at all times mentioned herein have been, in control of the management, policies, and operation of the said corporate respondent, including the acts, practices and methods herein found." Record in No. 11,700, Dolcin Corp. v. Federal Trade Commission, supra n. 1.

Shimmerlik and Wantz did not challenge that finding in this court when they sought review of the Commission's cease and desist order.

The order entered by the Commission expressly named—and ran against—Shimmerlik and Wantz. And this court's decree, effective April 8, 1955, enforcing that cease and desist order, as modified and affirmed, likewise ran against them. It directed each of them—individually and as officers of Dolcin—to cease and desist from certain specified advertising practices.

[Knowledge]

Shimmerlik and Wantz press two grounds for reconsideration of our finding of guilt: (1) They say they did not know of the letter from the corporation's counsel to the corporation's president dated May 17, 1955, which stated:

> ". . . there is nothing to settle because the courts have settled the matter for us. Therefore, we are in no position to bargain.
> "The F. T. C. order, as modified by the Court speaks for itself. There is nothing further to be done now except comply with its provisions until such time when it is amended by the Commission. . . ."

[1] This was a contempt proceeding growing out of violations of our decree enforcing a cease and desist order. Dolcin Corp. v. Federal Trade Commission [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,791], 94 U. S. App. D. C. 247, 219 F. 2d 742 (1954), rehearing en banc denied [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,951], 94 U. S. App. D. C. 256, 219 F. 2d 751 (1955), cert. denied, 348 U. S. 981 (1955).

Since Shimmerlik and Wantz had not been alerted by the corporation's counsel to the need for immediate compliance, they say they could not have been expected to make any effort to effect a change in Dolcin's advertising policy.

In seeking reconsideration, Shimmerlik and Wantz do not claim that they did not know of our decree against them. They say, however, that there was a "general uncertainty" as to the effective date of that decree. In our opinion of December 18, 1956, we rejected this argument:

> ". . . We think the terms of our decree did make it clear that they were to [comply with our decree without awaiting further action by the Commission], especially when read in the light of our opinion of July 1, 1954, and the opinion of Judges Edgerton, Prettyman, Bazelon, Fahy and Washington of February 3, 1955, in support of the order denying respondent's petition for rehearing en banc. In the latter opinion it is made explicit that respondents were to comply with our decree from and after its date, that is, that they were required, notwithstanding an interim between our decision and possible subsequent modification of its order by the Commission, to comply immediately with the terms of the order of the Commission, as modified, affirmed and enforced by our decree."

We adhere to our former statement and add this comment: It is clear from the above quotation that we considered Shimmerlik and Wantz guilty from and after the effective date of our decree. We chose, however, as a matter of grace, to date our finding of guilt from May 17, and to dismiss the charges as to conduct between April 8 and May 17. The evidence in the case other than the May 17 letter provided a sufficient basis for holding Shimmerlik and Wantz guilty of contempt.

[Failure To Act]

(2) Shimmerlik and Wantz say they had no reason to know that their inaction would result in violation of this court's order by the corporation. Dolcin's advertising policy was—they say—completely controlled by Victor van der Linde, and was handled by him through his advertising agency. The petition for rehearing states:

> "If there were any indication in the record that Shimmerlik and Wantz knew, or had reason to believe, that unless they personally took measures the Dolcin Corporation would violate this Court's order, they might conceivably be found to have failed in their duty to this Court. Without such a finding, a requirement that they insulate themselves from criminal liability by essentially meaningless articulations to van der Linde of the obvious—that they expected and wished the corporation to take all necessary and proper steps toward compliance—would be a travesty."

Shimmerlik and Wantz acknowledge that after April 8, 1955, they did nothing to comply with our decree. Indeed, they claim that they neither could have nor should have done anything to bring both themselves and their corporation into compliance. In essence, their claim is that this whole proceeding, insofar as it affected them, was wasted effort.

But this court did not impose an obligation on Shimmerlik and Wantz that they could discharge by remaining inert. We imposed an affirmative obligation upon them, individually and as officers of Dolcin, to take all reasonable steps to effect compliance with this court's order. Those steps included, at least, that they become currently informed of the advertising conduct of Dolcin. That their "articulations" to van der Linde might have been unavailing does not relieve them of the responsibility to make those articulations. And we are not prepared to predict that such efforts, had they been made, would have been "meaningless." Whatever the order of this court directed Shimmerlik and Wantz to do, it did not permit them to stand idly by while the Dolcin Corporation—their corporation—continued to flout our order. As the Supreme Court has said:

> "When one accepts an office of joint responsibility, whether on a board of directors of a corporation, the governing board of a municipality, or any other position in which compliance with lawful orders requires joint action by a responsible body of which he is a member, he necessarily assumes an individual responsibility to act, within the limits of his power to do so, to bring about compliance with the order. It may be that the efforts of one member of the board will avail nothing. If he does all he can, he will not be punished because of the recalcitrance of others." United States v.

Fleischman, 339 U. S. 349, 356-57 (1950). See also Wilson v. United States, 221 U. S. 361, 376-77 (1911).

Were we to take the opposite view, we would be putting a premium on ignorance and offering a sanctuary for those remiss in performing their duties as corporate officers. See Fleischman, supra at 364. Shimmerlik and Wantz should not be permitted to use their own inertia as a shield against the force of this court's decree.

We thus will not vacate our finding that petitioners are guilty of criminal contempt. They have committed a serious offense against the law and the court's authority. At the same time, in view of all the circumstances here, we should not be understood as implying that they have been convicted of a "crime" in the ordinary sense of that term. See Myers v. United States, 264 U. S. 95, 103-105 (1924); Ex parte Grossman, 267 U. S. 87, 117 (1925); Cf. Nye v. United States, 313 U. S. 33, 43-44 (1941). Furthermore, in fixing the punishment to be imposed we have taken into account their assertions that they did not know of the May 17, 1955, letter of the corporation's counsel and that their contemptuous conduct was a result of inertia rather than of active participation in the advertising practices which violated our decree. Cf. In re Door, 90 U. S. App. D. C. 190, 194, 195 F. 2d 766, 770 (1952).

[Fine]

We fix the punishment as a fine of $1,000.00 on petitioner Shimmerlik and a fine of $750.00 on petitioner Wantz, and "shall enter an order to that effect, which will state the time, place and means of payment." In re Door, loc. cit. supra.

The petition for reconsideration and rehearing is denied.

[Dissenting Opinion]

FAHY, Circuit Judge, dissenting: I would grant the petition of George Shimmerlik and Albert T. Wantz for reconsideration and rehearing.

[¶ 68,767] The Parker Pen Company v. Charles Appliances Incorporated.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civil 120-375. Filed July 11, 1957.

New York Fair Trade (Feld-Crawford) Act

Fair Trade—Enforcement of Fair Trade Prices—Nonsigner—Defenses—Refusal To Sell and Enforcement Activity.—A pen company was granted a preliminary fair trade injunction against a retailer (nonsigner) who allegedly sold the company's pens for less than their minimum fair trade price in violation of the New York Fair Trade Act. The court ruled that the alleged conduct of the retailer was a clear violation of the Act; that such conduct unless restrained, pending trial, would result in irreparable injury to the pen company and its fair trade structure and good will; that the pen company's refusal to sell to the retailer did not bar injunctive relief; that the enforcement of the pen company's rights had been adequate and that reasonable steps had been taken to secure compliance; and that the New York Act was enforceable against a nonsigner of a fair trade contract.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3258.34, 3440.34, 3460.

For the plaintiff: Rogers, Hoge & Hills (George M. Chapman and Francis P. Kelly, of counsel), New York, N. Y.

For the defendant: Isidor Edward Leinwand, New York, N. Y.

[Injunction Sought]

LEVET, District Judge [In full text]: This is an application for a preliminary injunction against defendant's sale of plaintiff's trademarked products for less than the minimum fair trade price. Jurisdiction here is based upon diversity of citizenship.

[Fair Trader]

Plaintiff has manufactured and sold fountain pens since 1890. In 1891, it adopted and began to use the notation "Parker" as a trademark on its fountain pens and has since continuously used this mark. Plaintiff presently possesses numerous trademarks for its products. In 1939, a certain new model fountain pen, mechanical pencil and desk set were manufactured and called "51." Parker "51" was employed as a trademark commencing in the same year. Another trademark used is "21," a lower priced pen. In 1955, plaintiff placed on the market a pencil called "Liquid Lead." Each Parker product is separately boxed and packaged and the trademark appears on the outside. The trade marks are also prominent in plaintiff's advertising, both nationally and in New York, for which advertising the company spends large amounts of money. Such advertising and identifying marks have created certain good-will, which appears to be a valuable property right. The Parker products are sold to more than 30,000 retailers located in the principal distribution centers of the country.

The writing instruments manufactured by the plaintiff are in direct competition with a number of nationally advertised brands, such as Schaeffer, Waterman and Eversharp. It has been plaintiff's policy to protect its valuable good-will and reputation especially when faced with price-cutting by vendors who compete with the retail dealers handling plaintiff's products. Plaintiff appears to have been reasonably active in taking steps to insure protection against such price-cutting. In this connection it has since 1937 entered into fair trade contracts with a large number of retail dealers throughout the State of New York.

[Defendant]

The defendant, Charles Appliances Incorporated, executed a fair trade contract with plaintiff on August 13, 1956, which the defendant cancelled in October, 1956. Thereafter, it appears, and it is not disputed, that the defendant engaged in price-cutting plaintiff's products. Parker "51" pens which listed at $16.50 were sold by the defendant at $9.90.

[New York Act]

Plaintiff's contracts with its retailers calling for minimum retail fair trade prices were entered into pursuant to the General Business Law of the State of New York (c. 19, § 369-a), which reads:

"Price fixing of certain commodities permitted

"1. No contract relating to the sale or resale of a commodity which bears, or the label or content of which bears, the trade mark, brand, or name of the producer or owner of such commodity and which is in fair and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced by others shall be deemed in violation of any law of the state of New York by reason of any of the following provisions which may be contained in such contracts:

"(a) That the buyer will not resell such commodity except at the price stipulated by the vendor; * * *"

[Miller-Tydings Act]

The Miller-Tydings Amendment (50 Stat. 693 (1937)) to the Sherman Anti-Trust Act (15 U. S. C. A. § 1 et seq), in specifically removing minimum resale price arrangements from the purview of the federal antitrust statutes, supports the contracts entered into under the New York Fair Trade Law.

[Nonsigner Provision]

Section 369-b of the New York statute brands the refusal to observe such a commitment as here involved "unfair competition." It reads:

Unfair competition defined and made actionable

"Wilfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale or selling any commodity at less than the price stipulated in any contract entered into pursuant to the provision of section three hundred sixty-nine-a, whether the person so advertising, offering for sale or selling is or is not a party to such contract, is unfair competition and is actionable at the suit of any person damaged thereby."

The "non-signer loophole" created by the decision of the Supreme Court in Schwegmann Bros. v. Calvert Distillers [1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,823], 341 U. S. 384 (1951) was eliminated by 66 Stat. 632, an amendment to the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U. S. C. A. § 45). The 1952 amendment, familiarly known as the "Maguire Act," was construed and upheld by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in the case of Schwegmann v. Eli Lilly, 1953 [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,516], 205 F. 2d 788. The United States Supreme Court denied certiorari, 346 U. S. 856. Similarly, the court refused to review a decision of the New York Court of Appeals sustaining the Fair Trade Act of this state against attack. General Electric Company v. Masters, Inc. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,776], 307 N. Y. 229 (1954). The Supreme Court in [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,907] 348 U. S. 892 gave as its reason for dismissing the appeal "want of substantial Federal question."

The New York Court of Appeals in the General Electric case, supra, in referring to the New York Fair Trade Act, declared:

> "* * * As to marked goods, it merely permits a manufacturer, whose trade-mark or brand name may represent a large advertising investment and a carefully nurtured good will, to prevent retailers, over whom he would otherwise have little control, from seriously impairing the value of that trade-mark and good will by reselling his identified products at unreasonably low prices. * * *" (pp. 238-239)

[Refusal to Sell—Injury]

There appears to be no substantial reason why plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction should not be granted. Plaintiff's refusal to sell to the defendant does not bar the injunctive relief sought here. See Dorothy Gray, Ltd. v. Johnson Wholesale Perfume Co., Inc., D. C. Conn., 1941, 45 F. Supp. 744, 746. The defendant's acts are in clear violation of Section 369-b of the General Business Law of the State of New York. Unless these acts are restrained, their continuance pending trial will result in irreparable injury to plaintiff and may lead to the destruction of its fair trade structure and the impairment of its good-will. See Sunbeam Corporation v. Max Marcus d/b/a Westchester Appliance Center and White Plains Discount House, D. C. S. D. N. Y., 1952 [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,288], 105 F. Supp. 39, 42.

[Conclusions]

I, therefore, conclude that (1) the proof is sufficient to determine that the enforcement of the rights of plaintiff have been adequate and that reasonable steps have been taken to secure compliance; (2) the plaintiff here is entitled to relief under the New York Fair Trade Law upon establishment at the trial of the allegations contained in the complaint; (3) relief sought against the defendant is for the sole purpose of enforcement of plaintiff's Fair Trade Law right; (4) there is no reason why preliminary injunction should not be granted; (5) plaintiff has established its right to a preliminary injunction since the defendant's acts are in clear violation of Section 369-b of the General Business Law of the State of New York and, unless restrained pending trial, such conduct will result in irreparable injury to the plaintiff and may lead to the destruction of its fair trade structure and the impairment of its good-will.

[Order]

Settle order on notice which shall recite the facts as found herein and which shall provide that said order shall be conditioned upon plaintiff's furnishing a bond to the satisfaction of the court in the amount of $5,000.

Such price lists shall specify the prices to be charged for pan glazing services and all other services or terms and conditions of sale;

(B) The defendants are enjoined and restrained from furnishing, offering to furnish, threatening to furnish or making available at any pan glazing plant pan glazing services to any person except in accordance with the price lists used by such plant as provided for in subsection (A) above;

Nothing in subsections (B) and (C) of this Section, or in subsection (B) of Section VII shall prevent the defendants from (1) offering or charging different prices, terms or conditions for pan glazing services or other services by their different pan glazing plants, or (2) offering or charging to any person, for pan glazing services, or other services, by any of their pan glazing plants, prices, terms or conditions which are equal to or higher than prices, terms or conditions which in fact have been offered or charged for pan glazing services or other services to the same person by a pan glazing plant not owned or operated by the defendants.

In any suit or proceeding instituted by the plaintiff against the defendants, or any of them, alleging violation of this Section V, the burden of proof shall be upon such defendants to prove that the prices, terms or conditions charged have been or were, in fact offered or charged by a pan glazing plant not owned or operated by the defendants.

VI.

(B) Entering into any contract, agreement, understanding or arrangement with any multi plant commercial bakery to furnish such commercial bakery for any of its plants pan glazing services at lower prices or upon better terms or conditions than those at which pan glazing services are offered or given by the defendant to other commercial bakeries from the same pan glazing plant of the defendants.

VII.

[Acquisitions]

(A) The defendants are enjoined and restrained, for a period of five years from the date of entry of this Final Judgment, from acquiring any of the stock or assets of or any financial interest in any person engaged in the business of furnishing pan glazing services. After the expiration of five years from the date of entry of this Final Judgment defendants are enjoined and restrained from acquiring any of the stock or assets of or any financial interest in any person engaged in furnishing pan glazing services except upon application to this Court and showing to the satisfaction of this Court that any such acquisition will not tend to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in the business of furnishing pan glazing services in any area of the United States.

(B) Defendants are enjoined and restrained, for a period of ten (10) years from the date of this Final Judgment, from establishing or operating any pan glazing plant not owned or operated by them on the date of this Final Judgment at any location within a radius of 150 miles of any other pan glazing plant unless within such radius there is located a pan glazing plant (1) owned or operated by a person who owns or operates more than 3 such plants or (2) owned or operated by a person, other than defendant Ekco, engaged in the manufacture of pans. Provided, however, the defendants may establish a new pan glazing plant otherwise prohibited by this Section VII upon application to the Court and a showing to the satisfaction of the Court that the establishment or operation thereof will not tend to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in the furnishing of pan glazing services in any area of the United States.

Notwithstanding the making and entry of this Final Judgment, in any proceeding instituted by the defendants under this Section VII the plaintiff may introduce evidence of acquisitions of plants and facilities for the furnishing of pan glazing services occurring prior to the date of entry of this Final Judgment.

VIII.

[Silicone Compounds—Practices]

The defendants are enjoined and restrained from:

(A) Inducing, persuading or attempting to induce or persuade Dow Corning Corporation to refuse to sell any silicone compounds to any person engaged in furnishing pan glazing services;

(B) Entering into any contract, agreement or understanding requiring defendants to purchase from Dow Corning Corporation, or Dow Corning Corporation to sell to defendants, any silicone compounds on the condition, agreement or understanding that the defendants will not use any silicone compounds of competitors of Dow Corning Corporation.

(C) Requesting, soliciting or demanding from Dow Corning Corporation any information concerning the plans or operations of any person engaged in furnishing pan glazing services or any person planning or seeking to engage in such business.

(D) Entering into any contract or agreement with any person (except reasonable covenants not to compete and covenants in contracts with employees of defendants to protect trade secrets and inventions) or doing any other act or thing, which hinders, restricts, limits or prevents such person from directly or indirectly engaging in the business of furnishing pan glazing services.

Nothing in this Section VIII shall be deemed to prevent the defendants from contracting for the manufacture exclusively for them of specific silicone compounds in accordance with formulas and specifications furnished by defendants.

IX.

[Tying Agreements]

Defendants are enjoined and restrained from:

(A) Offering or making available to any person pan glazing services upon the condition, understanding or agreement that such person will purchase pans from the defendant or any other designated source; or

(B) Giving, offering or making available to any purchaser of pan glazing services any discount, rebate or allowance from established prices on the purchase of pans on the condition, agreement or understanding that such purchaser will purchase pan glazing services from the defendants; or offering, giving or making available to any purchaser of pans any discount, allowance or rebate from established prices for the furnishing of pan glazing services, on the condition, agreement or understanding that such purchaser will purchase pans from the defendants.

In the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas, Fort Worth Division. Criminal Action No. 9584. Filed June 3, 1957.

Case No. 1263 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Sherman and Robinson-Patman Acts

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Criminal Prosecutions—Defendant's Plea of Nolo Contendere.—Defendants' motion for leave to withdraw their pleas of not guilty and to enter pleas of nolo contendere in an action charging violations of the Sherman and Robinson-Patman Acts was granted over the objections of the Government that one of the defendants was a multiple offender of the antitrust laws, and that the acceptance of the pleas would deprive private litigants of the benefits to be derived from a verdict of guilty under Section 5 of the Clayton Act. Prior convictions should have more bearing upon the sentence to be assessed than upon the issue pertaining to the acceptance or rejection of the plea of nolo contendere, and Congress did not intend that a plea of nolo contendere should be refused in criminal antitrust cases for the purpose of aiding private litigants under the Clayton Act. The acceptance or rejection of such a plea lies within the discretion of the court. The plea has the same effect as a plea of guilty in the proceeding in which it is made, and although it does not create an estoppel in subsequent cases, it constitutes for the purpose of the case an admission of guilt, which is considered to be conclusively established. Also, the court ruled that the benefits to be derived from a long, expensive trial were not sufficient to justify the rejection of the pleas.

See Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8025.860.

For the defendants: Clark, Coon, Holt & Reed, Dallas, Tex.; Watson, Ess, Marshall & Enggas, Kansas City, Mo.; and George C. Kemble, Fort Worth, Tex.

[Nolo Contendere Pleas]

Estes, District Judge [In full text]: The matter for determination is defendants' motion for leave to withdraw their pleas of not guilty, and to enter pleas of nolo contendere. Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, Title 18, U. S. C., has provided that a defendant may plead not guilty, guilty, or with the consent of the Court, nolo contendere. As the offered plea of nolo contendere is only available to the defendants with the consent of the Court it is appropriate that the Court give due consideration to the views of the Government, who urges that the offered plea should not be accepted, as well as those of the defendants who say, in effect, that they do not wish to contest the charges made against them, but desire to submit to the judgment of the Court.

[Discretion of Court]

That the acceptance or rejection of this motion lies within the discretion of the Court is undisputed. Proper exercise of this discretion requires careful consideration of the facts and circumstances of this case in the light of the general nature and implications of the plea of nolo contendere.

[Civil and Criminal Suits]

On November 1, 1955 the United States filed two suits, Criminal Action No. 9584 against Safeway Stores, Incorporated, Lingan A. Warren, then the president of the corporation, and Earl Cliff, manager of Safeway's Dallas Division (hereinafter referred to as Safeway), and Civil Action No. 3173 against Safeway Stores, Incorporated. Both suits charged violations of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act by conspiring and attempting to monopolize interstate commerce in the sale of food and food products at retail in various cities in Texas and New Mexico, and by selling groceries in Safeway's retail stores in a part of the United States at prices lower than those exacted for such groceries by Safeway elsewhere in the United States for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating competitors in such part of the United States.

Civil Action No. 3173 seeks an adjudication that Safeway has attempted to monopolize interstate commerce in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act, and an injunction enjoining and restraining Safeway, its officers, directors and personnel:

> from setting arbitrary quotas or percentages of total available business in retailing groceries to be attained by Safeway, or requiring Safeway personnel to meet such quotas, or
> from selling below invoice cost to destroy competition, or
>
> from selling identical items at different prices within the same Safeway district of its retail operations, or > from operating any of its districts below the cost of doing business, for the purpose of destroying competition.

[Instant Action]

The criminal information, No. 9584, was substantially the same as an indictment returned against the defendants on July 7, 1955 by the Grand Jury. Upon motion of the Government that indictment was dismissed and this criminal information was substituted, with the consent of the Court by order entered November 1, 1955. This was done in order to avoid the delay and expense of testing the soundness of certain technical legal questions raised by defendants in attacking the validity of the Grand Jury which had returned the indictment. By the Criminal Information No. 9584 the charges in the instant case, misdemeanors, are alleged. The maximum penalty for violations of Section 2 of the Sherman Act before July 7, 1955 was a $5,000.00 fine and/or one year imprisonment. On that date the maximum fine was raised to $50,000.00 by an amendment to the Sherman Act (26 Stat. 209; 15 U. S. C. 1-3). The indictment by the Grand Jury was returned on the same day, July 7, 1955, that the Act increasing the fine was amended.

[Maximum Fine]

However, as the Criminal Information charges continuing violations by Safeway after the date of the amendment it is not contended by the defendants that the maximum fine for the Sherman Act violations would be $5,000.00 on each count if their plea of nolo contendere is accepted. It has been admitted in open court by the defendants that the maximum fine for the violations of Section 2 of the Sherman Act may be $50,000.00 if their plea of nolo contendere is accepted.

[Counts]

The information in Criminal Action No. 9584 contains three counts:

Count I charges Safeway, Warren and Cliff with a combination and conspiracy to monopolize interstate trade and commerce in the retail sale of food products in violation of Sec. 2 of the Sherman Act (26 Stat. 209, 15 U. S. C. Sec. 2). Braun and Company of Los Angeles, Cal., a public relations counseling firm, is named as a co-conspirator, but is not made a defendant in the Information.

Count II charges the above named defendants with an attempt to monopolize in the retail sale of groceries in violation of Sec. 2 of the Sherman Act.

Count III charges Safeway and Warren with a violation of Sec. 3 of the Robinson-Patman Act (49 Stat. 1528, 15 U. S. C. Sec. 13a) by selling groceries at lower prices in a part of the United States than elsewhere to destroy competition and eliminate competitors.

The Information further charges that Safeway established arbitrary sales quotas for its stores in Texas and New Mexico, amounting to 25 to 50 percent of the total retail grocery business in the areas, and required that these quotas be attained by Safeway personnel; that Safeway engaged in price wars in these areas for the purpose of destroying competition, and to accomplish this purpose operated stores below the cost of doing business, sold groceries below invoice cost, and sold in some areas at lower prices than in others.

The effects of these activities, it is charged, has [sic] been to restrain competition, exclude, damage and drive competitors out of business.

[Nature of Plea]

In view of the facts and charges above stated, what would be the effect of an acceptance of the defendants' plea of nolo contendere? To answer this question consideration must be given to the general nature and implications of the plea of nolo contendere as such plea has been interpreted by the courts of this country. U. S. v. Norris, 281 U. S. 619 (1930) seems to have established beyond question that if the plea of nolo contendere is accepted by the Court it is an implied confession of guilt, and for the purposes of the case only, equivalent to a plea of guilty. The plea admits for the purposes of the case all the facts that are well pleaded, 152 A. L. R. 278, and waives all formal defects in the proceedings of which the accused could have availed himself by a plea to the merits. 14 Am. Jur. 954. The plea has been described as a quasi confession of guilt, a confession, an implied confession, a plea of guilty substantially though not technically, a substitute for a plea of guilty, and a query directed to the Court to decide the defendant's guilt. 14 Am. Jur. 165 (1956 Pocket Part) Sec. 275. Counsel for the Government has described it as "a plea of guilty in Latin." Regardless of the label attached, it seems beyond question that for the purpose of the case a plea of nolo contendere is the full equivalent to a plea of guilty. That a sentence of either fine and/or imprisonment may be imposed after a plea of nolo contendere was established in Hudson v. U. S., 272 U. S. 451

(1925). U. S. v. Norris, supra, at page 623 stated the rule ". . . upon the question of guilt or innocence the plea of nolo contendere was as conclusive as a plea of guilty would have been."

The plea of nolo contendere unquestionably has the same effect as a plea of guilty so far as concerns the proceedings upon the Information, and although it does not create an estoppel in subsequent cases, it constitutes for purpose of the case an admission of guilt which is considered to be conclusively established.

Judgment of conviction follows upon such plea as well as upon a plea of guilty or conviction by a jury.

"Imposition of sentence follows as a matter of course, and a defendant who is sentenced upon a plea of nolo contendere stands convicted of the offense for which he was indicted. In imposing sentence, the Court's power to punish is in no way limited except as provided by law, and testimony bearing on the issue of punishment can be submitted to the Court." 152 A. L. R. 276.

In Judge Rossman's article, "Arraignment and Preparation for Trial," 5 F. R. D. 63 at 69, it is stated:

"In recent years thousands of defendants have pleaded nolo contendere to indictments and criminal informations charging them with violating the antitrust laws. (Lenvin and Meyers, Nolo Contendere: Its Nature and Implications, 51 Yale L. J. 1255)."

"The committee which drafted the Criminal Rules said concerning the plea of nolo contendere:

" 'While at times criticized as theoretically lacking in logical basis, experience has shown that it performs a useful function from a practical standpoint.'

"We again quote from a treatise which we have frequently cited:

" 'The plea of nolo serves a practical function in the administration of justice. There are many situations, of which antitrust prosecution is one, where the crime is considered malum prohibitum rather than malum in se, and in such situations the prosecutor is often inclined to agree to the interposition of the nolo plea. This realistic policy dispenses with lengthy and expensive trials. A law enforcement agency having concurrent equitable and criminal power, like the Federal Antitrust Division, frequently follows an indictment with a civil complaint, thereby seeking appropriate injunctive relief against the continuance of the offense charged in the indictment. Thus, the closing out of criminal cases by a nolo plea is simply preliminary to getting down to the job of eradicating the improper practices. At the same time, the pleader has paid his debt to society for past offenses and it can hardly be said that in making a nolo plea the accused leaves the question of his guilt undetermined.' (Lenvin and Meyers, p. 1268)."

[Defendant's Record]

The Government objects to the acceptance of defendants' plea of nolo contendere. One of the principal grounds for objection is that Safeway is a multiple offender, and has been convicted or has plead nolo contendere in at least five other cases, as follows:

Jan. 29, 1941 U. S. v. Food Distributers Assn. et al. (D. Col. Cr. 9306) Safeway plead nolo contendere, and on Feb. 14, 1941 was fined $7,500.00.

June 26, 1941 U. S. v. Food and Grocery Bureau of So. Cal. Inc. (S. D. Cal. Cr. 14952). Safeway plead nolo, and on March 30, 1942 received a suspended sentence.

March 4, 1942 U. S. v. Cal. Retail Grocers Assn. et al (N. D. Cal. Cr. 27526-R). Safeway plead nolo and on Aug. 18, 1942 was fined a maximum of $5,000.00.

Jan. 20, 1943 U. S. v. Safeway, 140 F. 2d 834 (C. A. 10, 1944). Safeway plead nolo and on March 26, 1948 was fined $30,000.00.

March 8, 1948 U. S. v. Md. and Va. Milk Producers, (D. D. C. Cr. 294-48) CCH 1950-1951 TRADE CASES, Par. 62,940. Safeway was convicted and fined a nominal amount.

Cliff was not charged in any of these five cases and Warren was charged and fined in only one.

This record, says the Government, shows a disrespect by Safeway of the law. If this be accepted as a fact, it still does not follow that the defendants' plea of nolo contendere should be rejected in the case at the bar. The fact that the courts accepted pleas of nolo contendere in four of the five cases cited by the Government indicates that the courts regarded this as the most practical, logical and just disposition of the cases. It has not been contended that justice was not done in those cases by acceptance of pleas of nolo contendere.

"In recent years thousands of defendants have pleaded nolo contendere to indictments and criminal informations charging them with violating the antitrust laws." 51 Yale L. J. 1255.

These prior convictions should have more bearing upon the sentence or punishment to be assessed than upon the issue pertaining to the acceptance or rejection of Safeway's plea of nolo contendere. In spite of a bad past record, there is nothing to prevent the court from permitting Safeway to enter its "plea of guilt in Latin" and assessing the appropriate punishment forthwith.

[Clayton Act, Section 5]

Another reason urged by the Government for rejecting Safeway's offered plea of nolo contendere is that acceptance would deprive private litigants of the benefits to be derived from a verdict of guilty under Section 5 of the Clayton Act. Under this section a contested judgment or decree rendered in a suit brought by the Government under the antitrust laws shall be prima facie evidence against the defendants as to all matters respecting which judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto.

While the "Congress has . . . provided sanctions allowing private enforcement of the antitrust laws by an aggrieved party", Radovich v. Nat. Football League [1957 Trade Cases ¶ 68,628], 352 U. S. 445 (pp. 453-454), in suits under Section 4 of the Clayton Act (38 Stat. 731, 15 U. S. C. Sec. 15), for treble damages; and Section 5 of the Clayton Act was held in Emich Motors v. General Motors [1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,778], 340 U. S. 558 to "reflect a (Congressional) purpose to minimize the burdens of litigation for private suitors by making available to them all matters previously established by the Government in antitrust actions"; nevertheless, the Court's view in the instant case has been accurately expressed as follows: [1]

> ". . . the Government's responsibility in bringing cases of this nature is to vindicate the public interest in preserving a competitive economy rather than to redress private wrongs and recover damages for injuries sustained by individuals."

It is fundamental that the primary responsibility of the Government in a criminal case involves the consideration of public interests, not private interests.

As stated by Judge Tolin in U. S. v. Jones, 119 F. Supp. 288 at 290 (S. D. Cal. 1954):

> ". . . it is always important for Courts to avoid permitting criminal prosecutions to be used as a means of redressing civil wrongs and, by means of a criminal judgment, procuring either directly or indirectly some advantage in a civil case."

The Government cites the case of U. S. v. Standard Ultramarine and Color Co. [1955 Trade Cases ¶ 68,237], 137 F. Supp. 167 (S. D. N. Y. 1955) in support of its position. In that case six corporations were charged with conspiring to fix and maintain prices in the sale of dry colors throughout a nine year period. The volume of business involved amounted to some 37½ percent of the total national sales. The Court rejected the defendants' plea of nolo contendere. The aggravated nature of the offense is indicated by the Court's reference to the offense as "one of the more serious infractions of the law" (page 172). The Court in Ultramarine was concerned about securing the benefits of the criminal judgment for private litigants. However, the reasoning of Ultramarine strongly indicates that the Court took this position because no companion civil suit had been filed by the Government. Ultramarine distinguished the holding therein from that in U. S. v. Cigarette Merchandising Assn. [1955 Trade Cases ¶ 68,188], 136 F. Supp. 212 (S. D. N. Y. 1955) where a plea of nolo contendere had been granted upon the point that in the Cigarette case a companion civil suit had been filed, whereas in the Ultramarine case there was no civil suit which might aid private litigants.

In the case at bar there is a civil suit pending on this Court's docket which may be brought to trial by the Government.

Judge Sugarman in U. S. v. Cigarette Merchandisers Assn. Inc., supra, has provided the answer to the Government's objections

[1] Part V (pp. 1-2) of Bill of Particulars Filed by the United States Pursuant to Order of the Court, dated December 6, 1956, requiring specification of businesses in competition with Safeway that have sustained economic injury as a consequence of the illegal activities charged, states:

"Since the Government's responsibility in bringing cases of this nature is to vindicate the public interest in preserving a competitive economy rather than to redress private wrongs and recover damages for injuries sustained by individuals, the specification made herein is not intended to be a comprehensive list of all persons in the grocery business who may have sustained economic injury by reason of the illegal activities charged in the charging paragraphs of the Information."

to acceptance of the defendants' nolo contendere pleas in the instant case. At page 213 his opinion states:

> "As to the first objection—i.e., the oppressive manner in which the defendants enforced their restraints upon their victims—it is sufficient answer that the sentencing court, on a plea of nolo contendere, may impose as severe a fine as upon a plea of guilty or a finding of guilt after trial.
> "As to the second objections—i.e., the necessity of preserving to those victims in private treble damage suits the benefit of the Government's prosecution, if it succeeds—this may be accomplished by the simple process of the Attorney General going forward in the trial of the civil suit."

This Court does not believe that Congress intended that pleas of nolo contendere be refused in criminal antitrust cases for the purpose of aiding private litigants under Section 5 of the Clayton Act. That section, as amended (69 Stat. 283; 15 U. S. C. § 16) in the concluding paragraph provides:

> "That this section shall not apply to consent judgments or to decrees entered before any testimony has been taken or to judgments or decrees entered in actions under Section 4a."

If such had been the intent of Congress it would have been a simple matter to delete the phrase "or decrees entered before any testimony has been taken" from this provision of Section 5a of the Clayton Act, and by so doing private litigants would have secured the benefit of criminal convictions as prima facie evidence upon acceptance of a plea of nolo contendere. It must be assumed that Congress was aware of the fact that a plea of nolo contendere results in a judgment before any testimony has been taken. It must further be assumed that Congress was conscious of the fact that "a great majority of these cases are disposed of without trial" (Judge Yankwich, "Observations on Anti-Trust Procedure", 10 F. R. D. 165-166).

[Sherman Act Amendment]

Further indication of Congressional intent is to be found in the 1955 amendment to the Sherman Act by the Eighty-fourth Congress, 1st. Session, 69 Stat. 282. That amendment increased the maximum fine from $5,000.00 to $50,000.00 for violations of the Sherman Act. Congress at that time evidenced an intense interest in increasing the maximum penalty that could be assessed by the Court upon acceptance of a plea of nolo contendere, but in no way indicated that pleas of nolo contendere should not be accepted. After due consideration of this phase of the antitrust laws Congress left the acceptance or rejection of the pleas of nolo contendere to the discretion of the Court.

[Rules of Criminal Procedure]

By the Act of June 29, 1940 (54 Stat. 688) Congress conferred upon the Supreme Court the authority to prescribe the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The rules became effective March 21, 1946, after having been reported to Congress by the Attorney General in January 1945; and Rule 11 has expressly provided that "a defendant may plead not guilty, guilty, or with the consent of the Court, nolo contendere." In the years since the promulgation of these rules no legislation has been enacted that could be construed as withdrawing from the court its discretion under Rule 11 concerning nolo contendere pleas. It must be assumed that Congress is satisfied with the rule and its application. In discussing Rule 11, 4 Barron & Holtzoff, Federal Practice & Procedure, Criminal, Sec. 1973 states: "the plea of nolo contendere is frequently entered in prosecutions under the anti-trust laws, where civil actions for injunctions based upon the same acts are pending or contemplated."

[Legislative History—Clayton Act]

Judge Nordbye in Twin Ports Oil Co. v. Pure Oil Co., 26 F. Supp. 366 at 371 made an extensive analysis of the legislative history of the Clayton Act as related to pleas of nolo contendere. It was stated:

> "Congress apparently intended to encourage consent judgments and decrees. It sought to induce a prompt surrender to the Government's demands by excluding consent judgments and decrees from the prima facie rule. . . . The query is, however, does the exception also apply to judgments entered on pleas of guilty and pleas of nolo contendere in criminal cases? . . . Congress intended to refer to both criminal and equity proceedings in exempting consent judgments and decrees. At page 373 . . .
> "Reason and common sense suggest that if Congress intended to avoid long civil proceedings by encouraging consent decrees, the same consideration would apply to criminal proceedings. Congress was not obligated to make the way easier for private litigants. The prima facie feature of judgments and decrees entered in proceedings instituted by the Government was an innovation of the Clayton Act, and in considering the past experience with reference to the advantage of consent decrees and pleas of guilty, it was apparently assumed that the provisions would rebound to the public good."

[Minority View]

The following statement from the Ultramarine case tends to support the Government's position concerning the exemption under Section 5 of the Clayton Act, but it seems that this is a small minority view:

> "Its use for practical purposes to avoid the issues inherent in a guilty plea does not necessarily reflect Congressional purpose to extend the exemption provision of Section 5 to the defendants in criminal antitrust suits. In any event, the short answer to the defendants' contention is that Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure vests in the Court the discretion to accept or reject the tendered plea."

With the last sentence of the above statement there is no disagreement. However, the general acceptance of the thesis that wide discretion is vested in the Court to accept or reject the plea of nolo contendere offers no reasonable or logical connection with the previous statement concerning Congressional purpose. That portion of the above statement seems to be contrary to the expressions of Congress, and to the thousands of cases in which pleas of nolo contendere have been accepted.

[Court's Docket]

While the condition of the Court's docket would not be reason for the acceptance of the pleas of nolo contendere, the fact is that all other litigation in the Fort Worth, Abilene and San Angelo Divisions of the Northern District of Texas would necessarily be delayed and all other litigants would be denied the right to speedy trial during the trial of this case, estimated at a minimum of three months, if such pleas be not accepted. The benefits to be derived from a long, expensive trial are not sufficient in the instant case to justify the rejection of defendants' offered pleas of nolo contendere. The saving of time and expense has been recognized as a factor in the acceptance of pleas of nolo contendere.

In U. S. v. Allegheny County Retail Druggists Assn. (W. D. Pa. Cr. 13470, Oct. 8, 1953) the Court observed (pp. 17-18):

> "That a plea of nolo contendere substantially saves the Government a tremendous expense — a tremendous expenditure in proceeding to trial."

[Motion Granted]

Because acceptance of the pleas of nolo contendere is supported by the overwhelming weight of authority, and because the Court is of the opinion that the ends of Justice will be served and the public interest will be vindicated by the acceptance of the pleas, the motion of defendants for leave to withdraw their respective pleas of not guilty and enter pleas of nolo contendere is granted, and consent is granted to the acceptance and entry of the pleas of nolo contendere by each of the defendants.

It is so ordered.

[¶ 68,771] United States v. Guerlain, Inc. United States v. Parfums Corday, Inc. United States v. Lanvin Parfums, Inc.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civ. Nos. 93-267, 93-268, 93-269, respectively. Filed July 9, 1957.

Case Nos. 1195, 1196, and 1197, respectively, in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Monopolies—Attempt To Monopolize—Monopolization—Utilization of Tariff Act of 1930 To Exclude Competition in Trade-Marked Products.—An American company, having a French affiliate which granted to it the trade-mark rights to toilet goods and the exclusive right to distribute such goods in the United States, attempted to monopolize and did monopolize, in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act, the importation into, and sale within, the United States of such trade-marked goods by utilizing Section 526 of the Tariff Act of 1930 to exclude potential competitors from dealing, in the United States, in the products sold abroad by its French affiliate. The American company and its French affiliate constituted a single international enterprise. Section 526 of the Tariff Act of 1930, which enables a trade-mark owner to prevent the competitive importation of products bearing its registered trade-mark, does not apply to the American part of a single international enterprise to enable it to prevent the importation into the United States of authentic products sold abroad by the foreign part of the enterprise. The section does not constitute an implied exception to the Sherman Act. Purchasers from the French part of the enterprise were prevented, by means of the utilization of Section 526, from competing in the United States with the American part of the same enterprise. The American company expanded its trade-mark monopolies beyond their proper scope. In view of this, the relevant market was defined as the trade-marked toilet goods of the American company. The American company possessed monopoly power, that is, the power to exclude competition and to control prices, and it exercised such power by excluding potential competition and by maintaining prices. Also, the company specifically intended to exercise its monopoly power. Two other American companies were held to have likewise violated the Sherman Act.

Monopolies—Relevant Market—Trade-Marked Products of Single Company.—In an action charging that an American company attempted to monopolize and did monopolize the importation into, and sale within, the United States of trade-marked toilet goods, the relevant market was defined as the trade-marked toilet goods of the American company. It was found that the most important appeal of such goods is a highly exploited trade-mark, and that the name is purchased rather than the product itself. Objectively, the products may be more than reasonably interchangeable with others; however, the lack of objectivity in consumer demand impairs the basis of interchangeability and negates a finding of cross-elasticity of demand. In the instant case, the relevant market had to be defined in the context of the extension of a trade-mark monopoly into illegal proportions by deliberate exclusionary conduct. The contentions that the relevant market should be the aggregate of products of similar price and quantity, and that the product of a single company cannot constitute a relevant market, were rejected.

Memorandum

[Defendants]

EDELSTEIN, District Judge [In full text]: In three separate but similar civil actions consolidated for trial to the court without a jury, the Government charges each of the three defendants with a violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U. S. C. § 2. There is no allegation of conspiracy. The defendants are American corporations [1] marketing trade-marked toilet goods [2] of better quality and relatively high price. Each of the American companies is closely associated with a French company that originated the trade name, first marketed products under the trade-marks and supplies the products, manufactured under secret formulae, sold by the American company, or the essential ingredients of those products. The Government alleges that, in each case, the American company and the French company constitute a single international enterprise. The toilet goods sold in the United States

[1] Guerlain, Inc. and Parfums Corday, Inc. are organized under the laws of the State of New York and Lanvin Parfums, Inc. is organized under the laws of the State of Dalaware.

[2] The term "toilet goods" as defined in the complaint includes perfumes, colognes, toilet waters, bath preparations and similar products; however, the business of the defendants is mainly in perfumes, colognes and toilet waters.

by the defendants are obtained from the French companies in packaged form ready for sale, or in bulk and bottled in the United States, or compounded in the United States by adding alcohol to the essences or concentrates obtained from the French company. These products are sold in the United States under trade-marks identical with those used by the French company upon similar products, and the advertising emphasizes the prestige factor of origin with Parisian perfumers.

[Use of Tariff Act and Trade-Marks]

In each case the French company has given to its associated American company an exclusive right to distribute its products in the United States and has transferred to the American company trade-mark rights intended to be sufficient to justify registration in the United States Patent Office on the basis of a claim of ownership by the American company.[3] And each of the defendants has filed with the Bureau of Customs, United States Treasury, certificates of registration of certain trade-marks for the purpose of preventing the competitive importation of products bearing those trademarks without the written consent of the American registrant, under the terms of § 526 of the Tariff Act of 1930.[4]

The Government takes the position that such utilization of § 526 by each defendant is unwarranted and constitutes a violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act: an attempt to monopolize and a monopolization of the importation into and sale within the United States of these trade-marked products, by preventing the importation and reselling by others who purchase such goods from the French company that forms but the foreign part of a single international enterprise with a defendant.

[Issues]

Most of the factual questions in the case were disposed of by stipulation and the remaining proof was largely documentary. Left for decision are the following issues: (1) the factual issue of whether, for each defendant and its associated French company, there exists a single international enterprise; (2) the legal issue of whether, where such a single international enterprise is found, the American part of that enterprise may exclude the competitive importation of the trade-marked products sold abroad by the French part of the enterprise, under the provisions of § 526 of the Tariff Act of 1930; (3) the legal issue of whether, if a defendant is not authorized to exclude competitive imports under § 526, conduct in doing so constitutes monopolization under § 2 of the Sherman Act; and (4) involved in the legal issue of monopolization under the Sherman Act, the factual issue connected with the determination of the relevant market, the issue of the uniqueness of the defendants' products.

1. Relations Between Defendants and Their Associated French Companies

I have found as a fact in each case, beyond any gnawing doubt, that the defendant and its French counterpart constitute a single international enterprise. In order to avoid any undue extension of this opinion, reference is made to the appended specific findings of fact [not reproduced].[5] The defendants, with varying degrees of vigor, deny integral existence with their foreign associates, but an examination of the facts leaves the denials utterly unconvincing. The asserted independence is contrived and the "corporate veil" is easily pierced by the merest glance through the forms of the business organizations to the realities of the relationships. See United States v. Reading Co., 253 U. S. 26, 62-63.

2. § 526 of the Tariff Act of 1930

[Government Contention]

The Government urges a construction of § 526 of the Tariff Act of 1930 that is not to be derived from a literal reading of the words of the statute. Subsection (a) of § 526 reads as follows:

> "It shall be unlawful to import into the United States any merchandise of foreign manufacture if such merchandise, or the label, sign, print, package, wrapper, or receptacle, bears a trade-mark owned by a citizen of, or by a corporation or association created or organized within, the United States, and registered in the Patent Office by a person domiciled in the United States, under the provisions of

[3] The Government does not, in these cases, challenge the right of the defendants to register their trade-marks with the Patent Office.

[5] In the Guerlain case, see Findings of Fact 13, 14, 15 and 16; in the Corday case, see Findings of Fact 15, 16, 17, 18 and 19; in the Lanvin case see Findings of Fact 12, 13, 14, 15 and 16.

sections 81 to 109 of Title 15, and if a copy of the certificate of registration of such trade-mark is filed with the Secretary of the Treasury, in the manner provided in section 106 of said Title 15, unless written consent of the owner of such trade-mark is produced at the time of making entry."

The Government contends that this provision may apply only to the advantage of an independent American trade-mark owner which may, by registering a trade-mark of a foreign producer in its own name, prevent the importation of authentic products by anyone else. But it is argued that the provision does not apply to the American part of a single international enterprise to enable it to prevent the importation into the United States of authentic products sold abroad by the foreign part of the enterprise. Despite the absence of specific language to that effect in the legislation, I am constrained to agree, in view of the litigated history of the issue involved and of the legislative history of the section.

[First Statutory Limitation]

The first statutory limitation on trade-marks borne by imported articles was § 27 of the Trade-Mark Act of 1905 [6] which later became, substantially, § 42 of the Lanham Act.[7] Prior to 1905 it was held that a person who purchased exclusive United States rights to a trade-mark identifying imported merchandise did not have an infringement remedy against a competitor who imported goods bearing the same trade-mark bought from the foreign manufacturer. Apollinaris Co. v. Scherer, (C. C. S. D. N. Y.) 27 Fed. 18. After the enactment of § 27 of the 1905 Act, which prohibited the importation of merchandise bearing a mark "which shall copy or simulate a trade-mark registered in accordance with the provisions of this Act * * *," the same result was obtained, the section being restricted to spurious goods. Fred Gretsch Mfg. Co. v. Schoening, (2 Cir.) 238 Fed. 780. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit followed these precedents in the case of Bourjois v. Katzel, (2 Cir.) 275 Fed. 539, involving a French manufacturer of face powder which sold plaintiff its American business, including trade-marks. The plaintiff continued to import the French powder and to sell it in boxes similar to the French ones. The defendant purchased the same product from the French firm abroad and sold it in the original French boxes. The court held that there was no infringement. The case went to the Supreme Court which, after a considerable delay of decision, reversed the Court of Appeals, 260 U. S. 689. In Bourjois v. Aldridge, 263 U. S. 675, the Court adhered to Katzel and held that where an American trade-mark was so infringed, the Collector of Customs was required by § 27 of the Act of 1905 to exclude products with infringing marks.

[Section 526—Legislative History]

However, prior to the decision of the Supreme Court in the Katzel case, § 526 of the Tariff Act of 1922,[8] currently § 526 of the Tariff Act of 1930, was passed by Congress. The record of the Congressional debate is brief, with the inclusion of § 526 being characterized as a "midnight amendment" [9] and with floor debate in the Senate limited to ten minutes.[10] Nevertheless, it appears from that debate that the purpose of the section was to protect the rights of Americans who bought foreign trade-marks and that it was aimed at the Katzel decision in the Court of Appeals, involving an American trade-mark owner independent of the foreign manufacturer.[11] That this was obviously the target of the legislation was pointed out by Judge Learned Hand in Coty v. Le Blume Import Co., (D. C. S. D. N. Y.) 292 Fed. 264, 269, and by Judge Augustus N. Hand in Sturges v. Pease, (2 Cir.) 48 F. 2d 1035, 1037.

The Supreme Court, in reversing the Court of Appeals in the Katzel case, did not refer to § 526. But one basis for the decision was that the defendant's use of the French trade-mark could harm the plaintiff's reputation, because the trade-mark so used in this country did not truly indicate the origin of the goods; for the trade-mark in the United States indicated that the goods came from the plaintiff. It can hardly be claimed by the defendants in the cases at bar that the trade-marks indicate an origin with them in the United States, inasmuch as the whole burden of their advertising is to emphasize French origin. A competing importer's identical toilet goods coming from the French part of the international enterprise could in no way harm a defendant's good will and reputation, as was stated to be possible in the Katzel case.

The defendants press the legislative history of § 526 negatively. In 1954, certain proposals of the Treasury Department were introduced in Congress to prevent affiliated concerns from invoking the import prohibitions.[12] From the fact that the amendments were not enacted into law, the defendants argue that they, embodying substantially the Government's position in these cases, were "rejected" by Congress. But actually the proposals were withdrawn, and from this situation I am able to derive no ulterior significance. The reasons for the withdrawal are not clear,[13] and nothing appears to prevent a re-introduction [14] and possible future enactment. If the failure of enactment of every amendment offered for the consideration of Congress were necessarily held to shed light on the legislation sought to be amended, the search for Congressional intention would be endless and fruitless.[15]

[Good Will—Protection]

But the defendants insist that it would destroy the very essence of the trade-mark and the property values represented by it to permit those who do not contribute to the good will, identified with the mark, nevertheless, to divert that good will to themselves, on a "free ride." The argument is one for the protection of advertising expenditures and expected profits not necessarily related to good will. Obviously advertising is for the purpose of building good will, but the defendants make an exclusive American market an element of that good will. The exclusive right to sell in the American market on the part of an international concern exploiting world markets is not an element of good will except in so far as it may be made so artificially by import prohibitions. A competing importer selling identical merchandise under the same trade-mark would not be a "pirate" or a "cheat." The public would not be deceived about the authenticity or origin of the product and the reputation of the trade-mark owner could not suffer from the marketing of inferior merchandise under his mark. Even the trade-mark owner's advertising expenses bear fruit, in some measure, from the activities of the "free riders", for the international enterprise reaps some benefit from all sales.[16] That the defendants may be disappointed in their expectations of profit from an exclusive domestic market, after having made substantial expenditures for advertising, involves not the diversion of their good will or the repudiation of their trade-mark rights, but the denial of a special privilege. And I am not persuaded that it was the intention of Congress to grant such a special privilege for the benefit of an international enterprise.[17]

[Exception to Sherman Act]

Moreover, to ascribe such an intention to Congress would have the effect of reading into the legislation an implied exception to the Sherman Act. Indeed, the defendants maintain, as a reason why they should not be held in violation of the Sherman Act, that their conduct is under the legal license of § 526. Assuming a case where the products involved are unique so as to constitute a relevant market in themselves, a construction permitting the American part of a single international enterprise to exclude [12] For the form of the proposed legislation, see Note 64 Yale L. J. 557 (1955) footnote 17 at page 560.

[13] Counsel for the Government suggested at oral argument that at the time of the proposed amendments, it was the purpose of the Administration to make a far-reaching customs simplification, and the sponsor of the amendments, the Treasury Department, withdrew them in order to avoid controversy that might becloud the Administration's purpose.

[14] It was stated at oral argument that one or two further bills have been introduced at the present session of Congress.

[15] See the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Frankfurter in Schwegmann Bros. v. Calvert Corp. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,823], 341 U. S. 384, 397. It was widely assumed for many years that the Miller-Tydings Amendment to § 1 of the Sherman Act, 50 Stat. 693, 15 U. S. C. § 1, authorized State acts with "nonsigner" provisions, and amendments offered to remove such presumed authorization failed of enactment. The Supreme Court held, nevertheless, that "non-signer" provisions were not authorized by the Miller-Tydings Amendment.

[17] "The rationale underlying trade-mark protection does not support the exclusion of genuine products by independent American trade-mark owners any more than it supports exclusion by related importers." Note, 64 Yale L. J. 557, 567 (1955). But § 526 was passed specifically to protect independent American trade-mark owners from the importation of authentic products.

imports by purchasers from the foreign part of the enterprise would authorize monopolization by permitting a manufacturer to prevent purchasers of his merchandise from competing with him.[18] See United States v. Klearflax Linen Looms [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,407], 63 F. Supp. 32; cf. FTC v. Beech-Nut Packing Co., 257 U. S. 441. But exemptions from the operation of the antitrust laws are explicitly made by Congress,[19] and repeals by implication are not favored. "The intention of the legislature to repeal 'must be clear and manifest.' * * * There must be 'a positive repugnancy between the provisions of the new law, and those of the old; and even then the old law is repealed by implication only pro tanto to the extent of the repugnancy.'" United States v. Borden Co. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,250], 308 U. S. 188, 198-99; Georgia v. Pennsylvania R. Co. [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,344], 324 U. S. 439; United States Alkali Export Association, Inc. v. United States [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,372], 325 U. S. 196. I find no "clear and manifest" intention on the part of Congress to limit the scope of the Sherman Act for the benefit of an international enterprise by means of § 526, and to construe that section in accordance with the purpose disclosed by the history detailed avoids a "positive repugnancy" in favor of a harmonious consistency between the two laws. See Takao Ozawa v. United States, 260 U. S. 178, 194.

3. § 2 of the Sherman Act

[Relevant Market]

The charge of illegal monopolization requires a finding of monopoly power and a finding of intent to monopolize, American Tobacco Co. v. United States [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,468], 328 U. S. 781, or, obviously, an actual exercise of the power. Inasmuch as monopoly power is "the power to control prices or exclude competition * * *", United States v. du Pont & Co. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,369], 351 U. S. 377, 391, it must be determined by defining the market and assessing the defendant's power in that market. In the definition of the relevant market, the defendants maintain that the recent decision in the cellophane case, United States v. du Pont & Co., supra, is dispositive. In that case the majority opinion stated:

> "[W]here there are market alternatives that buyers may readily use for their purposes, illegal monopoly does not exist merely because the product said to be monopolized differs from the others. If it were not so, only physically identical products would be a part of the market. * * * What is called for is an appraisal of the 'cross-elasticity' of demand in the trade."[20] "The 'market' which one must study to determine when a producer has monopoly power will vary with the part of commerce under consideration. The tests are constant. That market is composed of products that have reasonable interchangeability for the purposes for which they are produced—price, use and qualities considered."[21]

And it is argued that the defendants' products vie in a highly competitive market with each other and with similar products of numerous other manufacturers, products that are highly comparable and reasonably interchangeable for the purposes for which they are produced, considering price, use and quality.[22] It is therefore submitted that the cellophane case conclusively precludes the consideration of the trade-marked products of any one manufacturer as a relevant market.

[du Pont Case]

But the du Pont case also pointed that "[t]he varying circumstances of each case determine the result * * *",[23] citing in a footnote Maple Flooring Assn. v. United States, 268 U. S. 563, 579:

> "It should be said at the outset, that in considering the application of the rule of decision in these cases to the situation presented by this record, it should be remembered that this Court has often announced that each case arising under [22] About 90 different manufacturers sell over 408 perfumes of different names in the United States, and of these manufacturers, 61 sell toilet goods in the same price range as the toilet goods sold by the defendants. Based on retail sales prices, the total annual sale in the United States of toilet goods in the same price range as defendants' products is approximately $100,000,000, with $3,500,000, accounted for by Guerlain, $2,000,000 by Corday and $6,000,000 by Lanvin.

[23] United States v. du Pont & Co. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,369], 351 U. S. 377, 395.

> the Sherman Act must be determined upon the particular facts disclosed by the record, and that the opinions in those cases must be read in the light of their facts and of a clear recognition of the essential differences in the facts of those cases, and in the facts of any new case to which the rule of earlier decisions is to be applied."

The product involved in the du Pont case, cellophane, was a raw material for use by manufacturers in packaging their products. In determining whether to use cellophane or some other flexible packaging material, manufacturers were guided by careful and objective considerations of utility and price. As the district court found in that case, a finding sustained by the Supreme Court, there was a great sensitivity of customers in the flexible packaging markets to price or quality changes. Thus, small variations in price or quality would induce a manufacturer to shift from one flexible packaging material to another, in accordance with a balance of all the utilities toward the achievement of the most efficient economic operation. But the products involved in the cases at bar do not compete with each other on such terms. Although each perfume is manufactured under a secret formula and possesses a distinctive fragrance, there is nevertheless undisputed testimony that many purchasers were unable to distinguish between the different scents of various perfumes. Indeed, Guerlain insists that it competes not only with other fragrances, but also with fragrances that an average customer could not distinguish from its products. For a good perfumer can, it appears, and frequently does come so close to reproducing another fragrance that the average person cannot distinguish between the two. There is even evidence in the record of expert difference of opinion in the classification of individual scents.

From these facts the defendants would draw the conclusion of the substantial fungibility of their products with innumerable others, so that the relevant market must be considered to constitute no one single brand but the aggregate of products of similar price and quality. But this conclusion, I feel, ignores certain other meaningful evidence, evidence that came from defendants' witnesses. This evidence supports the conclusion that the most important element in the appeal of a perfume is a highly exploited trade-mark. There seems to be agreement that no quality perfume can be successfully marketed without a famous name. It would appear that, to a highly significant degree, it is the name that is bought rather than the perfume itself. This fact gives the market a rigidity not found in the Cellophane case. In applying its test of market to cellophane, the Supreme Court said:

> "An element for consideration as to cross-elasticity between products is the responsiveness of the sales of one product to price changes of the other. [Footnote omitted.] If a slight decrease in the price of cellophane causes a considerable number of customers of other flexible wrappings to switch to cellophane, it would be an indication that a high cross-elasticity of demand exists between them; that the products compete in the same market." [24]

There is no evidence in the cases at bar on responsiveness of the sales of one product to the price changes of another. But there is evidence, not disputed, that the leading perfume of one of the defendants would not sell satisfactorily if offered under an unknown name without national advertising. There is agreement that this result would prevail for any quality perfume similarly offered. And it would be fair to conclude from the evidence that an unexploited product, packaged and merchandised without its trade-mark, would have a negligible effect on the sales of the same product, exploited and trade-marked, even though the former may be sold at a substantial price differential from the latter. The kind of cross-elasticity discussed by the Supreme Court in the Cellophane case does not exist for perfumes bearing the names and trade-marks of the defendants. Objectively, the products may be more than reasonably interchangeable with others. But the lack of objectivity in consumer demand impairs the basis of interchangeability and negates a finding of cross-elasticity.

The cases at bar are distinguishable from the Cellophane case, in the search for the relevant market, in another important particular. For in these cases the defendants conducted themselves in accordance with a specific intention to exclude competitors and to control prices. This consideration was absent from the du Pont case. Indeed, the Supreme Court distinguished this situation and said: "Illegal monopolies under § 2 may well exist over limited products in narrow fields where competition is eliminated." [25] In the footnote to that statement,[26] the cases set out as illustrative of the principle were (with one exception) attempt and conspiracy cases, rather than monopolization cases. The defendants have been charged with attempt to monopolize as well as with monopolization, but inasmuch as the attempts in the markets contended for by the Government have been completely successful, it is perhaps inaccurate to speak of attempts. Nevertheless, the cases are much more closely akin to attempt and conspiracy cases than they are to a monopolization case like the Cellophane case. The most singular and certainly the most indisputable element in the cases is the intentional exclusion of potential competitors through the instrumentality of § 526. The exclusion of competition is the essence of monopoly. If my opinion about § 526 is correct, the defendants have intentionally and illegally excluded competition. The means were not illegal in the sense of immoral, predatory and bad faith practices familiar in many cases, but they were not "honestly industrial" [27] in that they were actuated solely by a desire to prevent competition. In cases where there is no specific intent to exclude competition, even maneuvers "honestly industrial" having an exclusionary effect may supply the requisite purpose and intent for a finding of monopolization,[28] though the market may not be narrowly defined. Where, however, exclusionary conduct demonstrates a specific intent to prevent competition, the analogy to the attempt and conspiracy cases is forceful. The fact that an attempt is successful is hardly reason to destroy the analogy, and a limited definition of the market is therefore appropriate. See Turner, Antitrust Policy and The Cellophane Case, 70 Harv. L. Rev. 281 (1956).

[Cases Distinguished]

But the defendants cite two recently decided cases as holding that the product of a single manufacturer cannot constitute a relevant market. Schwing Motor Co. v. Hudson Sales Co. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,292], 138 F. Supp. 899, aff'd per curiam (4 Cir.) [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,564], 239 F. 2d 176, and Webster Motor Car Company v. Packard Motor Car Company [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,171], 135 F. Supp. 4, reversed (D. C. Cir.) [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,682], 243 F. 2d 418 [29]. The Schwing case, which was substantially followed by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in the Webster case, involved an alleged combination or conspiracy by means of an agreement between an automobile manufacturer and a retail dealer, pursuant to which the manufacturer refused to renew expiring agreements with two other dealers, thus giving one dealer a "virtual monopoly" of the sale of one make of automobiles within one city. In the first place, it would seem that the element of cross-elasticity of demand for automobiles is much greater than for highly exploited, trade-marked perfumes, or that, in any event, the automobile market does not possess the rigidity of the quality perfume market, as discussed. But more significantly, Chief Judge Thomsen, whose opinion in the district court was adopted as the opinion of the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, pointed out that every manufacturer has a natural and complete monopoly of his particular product, especially when sold under his own private brand or trade name, and he may sell his product as he chooses, exercising his own independent discretion about the parties with whom he will deal. United States v. Colgate & Co., 250 U. S. 300. He may reduce the number of his dealerships in any area and, obviously, if he chooses to do so he will discuss the matter with the dealer or dealers whom he wishes to retain.

> "To say that a manufacturer may legally decide to reduce the number of its dealers in a given area if it does not discuss the matter with the dealers beforehand, but violates the anti-trust laws if it does discuss the matter with them before the new agreements are made, ignores the realities." [30]

But Judge Thomsen went on to say that a horizontal arrangement between competitors to effect the same purpose would be invalid, for that would constitute a true conspiracy, notwithstanding that its subject matter would be a relatively minor brand, constituting about 2% of the automobiles sold in the city, in a highly competitive market. Nor could a manufacturer, without the element of conspiracy, seek to monopolize by preventing purchasers of his merchandise from competing with him. United States v. Klearflax Linen Looms [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,407], 63 F. Supp. 32; cf. FTC v. Beech-Nut Packing Co., 257 U. S. 441.[31] This situation does not present a case of the natural monopoly that a manufacturer has in his own product, but an extension of such a monopoly. Neither the Schwing case nor the Webster case involved an effort of a manufacturer to extend the natural monopoly of his own product.

[Illegal Extension of Trade-Mark]

The defendants stress heavily the sentence in the Cellophane case that the "* * * power that, let us say, automobile or soft-drink manufacturers have over their trademarked products is not the power that makes an illegal monopoly."[32] But such power of the defendants over their trade-marked products is not here under attack. What is under attack is, in effect, an attempt (successfully executed) by each defendant, as a part of a single international business enterprise, to limit the resale of its products for the express purpose of excluding competition and controlling prices. Purchasers from the French part of the enterprise are prevented, by means of the utilization of § 526, from competing in the United States with the American part of the same enterprise. Such exclusion, if it were accomplished by agreement, would violate § 1 of the Sherman Act. For, "[a] distributor of a trade-marked article may not lawfully limit by agreement, express or implied, the price at which or the persons to whom its purchaser may resell, except as the seller moves along the route which is marked by the Miller-Tydings Act." United States v. Bausch & Lomb Co. [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,224], 321 U. S. 707, 721, quoted in United States v. McKesson & Robbins [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,368], 351 U. S. 304, 310. These defendants have achieved the same result unilaterally, without agreement, with the effect of expanding their trade-mark monopolies beyond their proper scope. In the cellophane case there was no evidence that du Pont had attempted to control the use or resale of cellophane, and there is nothing in the case to indicate that the power of a manufacturer of a trade-marked product may not be expanded into an illegal monopoly. It is in the context of the extension of a statutory monopoly into illegal proportions by deliberately exclusionary conduct that the relevant market must be defined.

[Monopoly Power]

With the relevant market defined as the trade-marked toilet goods of each defendant, there can be no doubt about the possession and exercise by each of them of monopoly power. Monopoly power is "the power to control prices or exclude competition."[33] That this power has been extensively utilized by the defendants is obvious. Each of them intentionally excludes potential competitors from dealing, in the United States, in the products sold abroad by the French part of its enterprise. The result has been the maintenance of substantial price differentials in the United States and in France—price levels so different that the removal of their artificial protection would threaten defendants' American monopolies. For it is clear that the price differentials are sufficient to make competitive dealing in these products profitable. The defendants argue the inaccuracy of this conclusion by citing the cost of promotional and administrative expenses of their American businesses, expenses that largely make up the price differentials, and without which there could be no profitable business in any event. But the evidence of these expenses, admitted upon the trial, I now find to be irrelevant. If price differentials may not be maintained under the Sherman Act by means of the exclusion of competition, the expenses that the defendants choose to undertake may not be offered in exculpation. The economic justification of expenses furnishes no legal justification for price differentials resulting from an illegal monopoly.

[31] The Beech-Nut case directly involved the Federal Trade Commission Act and involved the Sherman Act indirectly in that the public policy embodied in that Act was considered in determining what were unfair methods of competition within the Federal Trade Commission Act.

[Sherman Act Violated]

Accordingly, I append findings of fact and conclusions of law [not reproduced] separately in each case, substantially as submitted by the Government, holding that each defendant is in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act, entitling the Government to relief in the form of an order enjoining the continuation of the conduct constituting the violation. Proposed decrees may be filed within 30 days from the date of the filing of this opinion and a hearing will thereafter be scheduled upon due notice.

Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act

Price Discrimination—Payment for Services or Facilities Furnished by Customer—Advertising in Customer-Owned Magazine.—Payments by food product manufacturers to a retail grocery chain for publishing advertisements of the manufacturers' products in a magazine published by a wholly-owned subsidiary of the retail grocery chain and sold only in the retail grocery chain's stores were not in violation of Section 2(d) of the Clayton Act, when it appeared that the manufacturers chose to advertise in this magazine after having weighed the same criteria that they considered before advertising in any medium; that there was no ulterior motive on the part of the manufacturers, nor intention to favor the retail grocery chain over other customers; that the manufacturers received full value for their payments for their advertisements; that the advertisements made no references to prices of the products nor the names nor locations of the stores where they might be purchased; that the advertisements were national brand advertisements of grocery products as distinguished from grocery store advertisements; that the advertisements were primarily designed to benefit the manufacturers rather than the retail grocery chain; that the magazine was not an "in-store" promotion device, since shoppers would not read the magazine until they had left the stores and, therefore, the advertisements would benefit all grocery stores and not merely the retail grocery chain; and that the evidence failed to reveal that the retail grocery chain shifted substantial portions of its own advertising costs to the manufacturers.

See Price Discrimination, Vol. 1, ¶ 3522.250.

Price Discrimination—Payment for Services or Facilities Furnished by Customer—Meaning of "Available"—Proportionally Equal Terms.—When food product manufacturers made payments to a retail grocery chain for advertisements appearing in a magazine published by a wholly-owned subsidiary of the retail grocery chain and distributed only in the retail grocery chain stores, and a group of retail and wholesale grocers filed a treble damage suit against the manufacturers and retail grocery chain, charging violation of Section 2(d) of the Clayton Act on the ground that equal payments were not afforded to them, the suit was dismissed because the plaintiff retail and wholesale grocers did not publish or sell a store-distributed magazine and, thus, were unable and unequipped to render or furnish the services for which payment would be made and for which the manufacturers in this case paid the magazine. Being so unable to furnish these services, plaintiffs have no standing to complain about the manufacturers' advertising in the magazine even if it were assumed that these payments violated the Act. The suggestion by plaintiffs that the magazine could be made available for sale in all grocery stores, including plaintiffs', was untenable, as the Clayton Act "imposes no duty on one customer of a common supplier to furnish for his competitor services which the competitor is unable to render and for which the common supplier would make payment to him." The suppliers could not make proportionally equal payments to the plaintiffs if the plaintiffs could not furnish the service for which payment was made. As stated in Congress, payments are to be proportional "to those customers' purchases and to their ability and equipment to render or furnish the service or facilities to be paid for."

See Price Discrimination, Vol. 1, ¶ 3522.525, 3522.650.

Price Discrimination—Services or Facilities Furnished by Seller—Furnishing Magazine.—Payments by food product manufacturers to a retail grocery chain for advertisements appearing in a magazine published by a wholly-owned subsidiary of the retail grocery chain and distributed only in the retail grocery chain stores did not constitute the furnishing of a service or facility to the retail grocery chain, even though the greater part of the cost of the magazine was covered by advertising fees paid by defendants and other food manufacturers who sold supplies to the retail grocery chain. The argument that the advertising fees paid by suppliers "made" the magazine "possible" was refuted on the ground that the success of the magazine was due to the expertise of the management, that it was the high quality of the editorial content of the magazine that sold the magazine to the public, and that the sales, in turn, attracted the advertising revenue.

See Price Discrimination, Vol. 1, ¶ 3524.140.

Price Discrimination—Miscellaneous Preferential Practices—Advertising in Customer-Owned Magazine.—When the price discrimination alleged as a violation of Section 2(a) of the Clayton Act consisted of violations of Sections 2(d) and 2(e) through payments by food manufacturers to a retail grocery chain for publishing advertisements of the manufacturers' products in a magazine published by a wholly-owned subsidiary of the retail grocery chain, and the court found that Sections 2(d) and 2(e) were not violated, the court necessarily held also that Section 2(a) was not violated.

See Price Discrimination, Vol. 1, ¶ 3508.420.

Price Discrimination—Knowingly Inducing or Receiving Discrimination.—A treble damage action by a group of grocery retailers and wholesalers, charging that a retail grocery chain knowingly induced discriminations in price by inducing some of its food suppliers to advertise in a magazine published by the retail grocery chain, was dismissed on the ground that the record was devoid of evidence tending to prove that the retail grocery chain knowingly induced a discrimination. The court held further that there was no violation of the Clayton Act by the suppliers.

Memorandum, Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law and Judgment

[Parties]

CAMPBELL, District Judge [In full text]: This is a private action for treble damages and injunctive relief brought under Sections 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act.[1] Plaintiffs are twenty retail and two wholesale grocers located in the Chicago Metropolitan Area who bring this action on behalf of themselves and all retail and wholesale grocers similarly situated as an alleged class suit under Rule 23(a)(3) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Defendants are The Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company (New Jersey), Woman's Day, Inc., General Foods Corporation, Hunt Foods, Inc., and the Morton Salt Company.

The Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company (New Jersey), hereinafter referred to as A&P (New Jersey), is a wholly owned subsidiary of The Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company of America, hereinafter referred to as A&P (Maryland). A&P (New Jersey) operates the A&P retail stores in the Chicago Metropolitan Area and is one of the three A&P companies which operate retail grocery stores throughout the United States. Where distinction between these two companies is not material, they will be referred to herein, individually or collectively, as "A&P."

Woman's Day, Inc., publishes Woman's Day, a women's magazine which is issued monthly and sold to A&P operating companies, including A&P (New Jersey), for resale only through A&P stores. Woman's Day, Inc. is a wholly owned subsidiary of A&P (Maryland).

General Foods, Hunt Foods and Morton Salt are food product manufacturers whose brand name products are sold throughout the United States by practically all retail grocers, including the plaintiff retailers and A&P (New Jersey). These three food manufacturers will hereinafter be referred to collectively as the Defendant Suppliers.

[Damages Issue Severed]

By the Court's Memorandum & Order of June 21, 1956 the issue of liability, including the issue of the fact of damages, was severed for trial from the issue of the amount of damages, the issue of the amount of damages having been reserved for reference to a Master when and if the issue of liability was resolved in favor of the plaintiffs. Subsequently, through the efforts of able and experienced counsel representing all the parties to this action, the issue of liability was tried on facts agreed upon and exhibits admitted into evidence pursuant to stipulations entered into by and between the respective parties in many pretrial conferences. The interpretation and legal effect to be accorded these facts were argued by the parties in written briefs, and the issue of liability was taken under advisement by the Court.

[Clayton Act]

Plaintiffs anchor their claim upon Sections 2(d) and 2(e) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act.[2, 3] Additionally, however, plaintiffs, in an attempt to hold A&P (New Jersey) liable under Section 2(f) of the Act, 15 U. S. C. Section 13(f), assert that the practices of the Defendant Suppliers, which the plaintiffs claim violate Sections 2(d) and 2(e), violate Section 2(a) as well.[4] Specifically, and in capsule form, plaintiffs complain that the Defendant Suppliers advertise their various products in Woman's Day without making these "services" or "facilities" available to the plaintiffs on proportionally equal terms. This activity, plaintiffs argue, violates Sections 2(d) and 2(e) of the Act and, as a consequence, Section 2(a) as well.

Sections 2(d) and 2(e) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act provide as follows:

> "(d) It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to pay or contract for the payment of anything of value to or for the benefit of a customer of such person in the course of such commerce as compensation or in consideration for any services or facilities furnished by or through such customer in connection with the processing, handling, sale or offering for sale of any products or commodities manufactured, sold, or offered for sale by such person, unless such payment or consideration is available on proportionally equal terms to all other customers competing in the distribution of such products or commodities."

[1] Title 15 U. S. C. Sections 15 and 26.
[2] Title 15 U. S. C. Sections 13(d) and 13(e).
[3] Plaintiffs dropped all charges under the Sherman Act during the pretrial period.
[4] Title 15 U. S. C. Section 13(a).

"(e) It shall be unlawful for any person to discriminate in favor of one purchaser against another purchaser or purchasers of a commodity bought for resale, with or without processing, by contracting to furnish or furnishing, or by contributing to the furnishing of, any services or facilities connected with the processing, handling, sale, or offering for sale of such commodity so purchased upon terms not accorded to all purchasers on proportionally equal terms."

It seems clear, upon a study of these sections, that Sections 2(d) and 2(e) are companion sections and that distinctions between them should not be drawn merely because of the differences in terminology employed in each section. These sections are companion sections to the extent that they have the same purpose and seek to eliminate the same evil; but although they have the same purpose, each section achieves the same result by proscribing different methods of attaining the common result condemned. Thus, while Section 2(d) prohibits payment by the seller for services or facilities undertaken by the buyer, Section 2(e) proscribes services or facilities furnished by the seller to the buyer. I shall first consider whether the evidence establishes that the defendants have violated Section 2(e) of the Act.

The Section 2(e) Issue

Here plaintiffs argue, in effect, that food suppliers, of whom the Defendant Suppliers are but three, furnish, or contribute to the furnishing of, Woman's Day magazine to A&P (New Jersey) since their payments for advertisements in Woman's Day recoup for A&P a substantial part of the annual cost necessary to produce Woman's Day. It has been stipulated that the annual cost of producing Woman's Day exceeds $9,000,000. Of that sum, less than one-quarter is recovered through the sale of copies, the remaining three-quarters being recovered from the sale of advertising space. The advertisers in Woman's Day are categorized as either "suppliers" or "non-suppliers." Supplier advertisers are manufacturers, such as the Defendant Suppliers, whose products are sold in A&P stores; conversely, non-supplier advertisers are manufacturers whose products are not sold in A&P stores. It has been stipulated that in 1954, 73.3 per cent of the advertising revenue, or $6,905.021, was received from supplier advertisers as against 26.7 per cent, or $2,508,822 received from non-supplier advertisers. In 1955, 65.5 per cent, or $6,073,693 was received from suppliers while 34.5 per cent, or $3,205,488 was received from non-suppliers. These figures, plaintiffs argue, conclusively show that Woman's Day magazine is "made possible" by the paid advertisements of food suppliers, such as the instant Defendant Suppliers. Plaintiffs reason that without the payments for the advertising of the food suppliers, Woman's Day magazine could not exist, unless this multi-million dollar cost expenditure was assumed by A&P itself. Plaintiffs conclude, therefore, that the Defendant Suppliers furnish, or contribute to the furnishing of, a service of facility, Woman's Day magazine, "to or for" the benefit of A&P (New Jersey).

It is, of course, true that, in a loose sense, a patron of a store, an advertiser in a magazine or newspaper, "makes" that particular business "possible." However, it seems that this is a clear case of the proverbial tail wagging the proverbial dog. Business patrons, whether the purchaser or the advertiser, are attracted by the quality of the business entity with which they place their patronage. For example, a leading department store, such as one of the several that we have in the Chicagoland area, is not made possible by the customers that patronize that store—it is made possible by such things as the quality and variety of merchandise offered for sale, pleasant shopping facilities and salespeople, liberal charge and exchange policies, eagerness to stand behind the products offered for sale at its store, and all such factors which contribute to the successful operation of any business. The store's success is made possible by the policies adopted and executed by its management. Thus, it is the store itself, through the expertise of its management, that makes the business of its customers possible, and it is not the customers that make the store possible.

[Woman's Day of High Quality]

And so it is with any leading newspaper or magazine, such as Woman's Day. Advertisements placed in these media are made possible or attracted by the quality of the medium itself. Thus, prescinding from the fact that A&P (Maryland) must have made a substantial investment in Woman's Day at the very beginning, if not later, and prescinding also from the fact that the direct copy sales of Woman's Day and the advertising of the non-suppliers, together, comprise a substantial percentage of the cost of producing Woman's Day (not to mention the supplier advertisers whose products, perhaps, are not handled by the plaintiffs), it seems quite obvious that Woman's Day magazine, and the advertisements therein, are "made possible" by the admitted high quality of the magazine itself, which high quality, in turn, is "made possible" by the expertise of the management of Woman's Day, Inc. There is a considerable amount of ingenuity, skill, creativeness and perserverance which goes into the publishing of any high quality magazine much the same as these qualities go into the successful operation of any business in a highly competitive business world. These qualities, apparently, are possessed by the management of Woman's Day, which, admittedly, is a high quality magazine, having been, for 14 years, among the top ten national magazines in circulation and among the top twenty-five in advertising revenue. Thus, it is the high quality of Woman's Day reflected by its editorial content, that sells the magazine to the public —these sales, in turn, attract the advertising revenue of such manufacturers as the Defendant Suppliers. It seems manifestly clear that a magazine the public will not buy cannot earn advertising revenue and it seems equally clear that the public does not buy a magazine for its advertisements but for its editorial content. As counsel for A&P and Woman's Day argue, the advertiser's payment and all other revenue of the publishing entity lose all identity in the process of publishing the magazine.

[No "Furnishing" of Magazine]

Thus, the conclusion is inescapable that the Defendant Suppliers do not furnish or contribute to the furnishing of Woman's Day magazine to A&P within the meaning of Section 2(e)of the Act. What we have here are advertisements placed by food suppliers in a top ranking magazine which is published by a wholly owned subsidiary of A&P (Maryland). Both the magazine and the advertisements therein contained are furnished by A&P (Maryland) through Woman's Day, Inc. The evidence fails to reveal that the Defendant Suppliers have furnished, or have contributed to the furnishing of, any services or facilities to or for the benefit of A&P. If plaintiffs can be heard to complain of any activity on the party of the Defendant Suppliers, it is the payments by these suppliers for their advertisements which they place in Woman's Day magazine. Therefore, if plaintiffs have a cause of action at all it is for possible violations of Section 2(d) which prohibits payment by the supplier for services furnished by the purchaser.

[Sec. 2(e) of Clayton Act Not Violated]

For the reasons stated, I hold that the plaintiffs have failed to prove that the Defendant Suppliers have furnished, or have contributed to the furnishing of, any service or facility to A&P within the meaning of Section 2(e) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act.

The Section 2(d) Issue

In discussing Section 2(d), it becomes necessary to examine the methods employed by each of the Defendant Suppliers in determining the medium in which each should advertise, and particularly whether each should advertise in Woman's Day magazine.

General Foods

General Foods is a large food merchandising company which handles more than 50 different grocery store products. In its 1956 fiscal year it sold $759,200,000 worth of grocery products and spent more than $75,180,000 in advertising them.

General Foods is comprised of eleven operating divisions. The marketing function of each division selling grocery store products is in charge of a marketing manager who is responsible for the advertising and selling of all the products of that division. Reporting to the marketing manager are the product group managers or the particular product managers. Product group managers and product managers are responsible for the development and execution of marketing plans, including advertising plans, for the specific products assigned to them. Both the initial and final decision on the contents of a marketing plan are made by the product group manager or product manager, subject to the approval of his superiors. The responsibility of selecting and recommending the specific advertising media within the framework of the marketing plan rests with the particular advertising agency retained by the company.

In determining what medium should be used to advertise a particular product (whether magazines, newspapers, outdoor posters, car cards, radio or television), General Foods' advertising agencies take many factors into consideration. These factors include the stated objectives of the advertising program; the nature and strength of the competition; who are the prospective purchasers of the products—i.e., men, women, children, age, income bracket, educational level; the locality where these prospects live—i.e., in small towns and rural communities, in cities, in metropolitan centers, in which geographical areas of the country; and the distribution pattern of the particular product.

If the agency retained by General Foods determines that an advertising effort or part of any advertising effort should be through magazines, the selection of the magazines, or of a particular magazine, requires the weighing of many considerations, such as circulation, geographical distribution of readers, cost per thousand circulation, number of readers for each copy, characteristics of the magazine and its readers, education and income level of the magazine's audience, the prestige of the magazine, and the nature and quality of its editorial material.

Applying these general considerations to the case at bar, it has been stipulated that the criteria considered by General Foods in determining whether or not Woman's Day was to be included in a media schedule for a particular product were the same criteria that were considered by General Foods in the selection of any other magazine or medium.

Hunt Foods

Hunt Foods is a large food merchandising company which handles more than 15 different grocery store products. In its 1955 fiscal year Hunt sold $85,588,310 worth of grocery products and spent $5,741,000 advertising them. Hunt's advertising program is prepared by its advertising department in consultation with the particular advertising agency retained by it.

Hunt considers many criteria and factors in selecting publications in which to advertise its products. Among these factors are the publication's circulation, and all aspects thereof including not only the total figure but also the pattern of this circulation by geographical areas. Hunt also considers the cost of using the publication, and specifically, the base page rate and quantity and frequency discounts. Another criterion that Hunt considers is the audience statistics such as the relation of men to women readers and how large the total audience becomes as a result of secondary and pass-along readership. Hunt also considers the editorial policies of the publication and its mechanical quality, such as the process by which it is printed and the quality and size of its paper. Hunt gives primary consideration to an adequate "national" advertising program using media whose circulation figures bear a proper relationship to the national population pattern. After providing for national coverage, Hunt then considers those media which have a more regional than national influence.

The extent of Hunt's advertising in any particular medium is determined by the amount of money which can be allocated to advertising in a given period and by selecting the medium that it feels best reaches the potential customers of its products and also best serves its designated purposes.

In deciding to advertise in Woman's Day magazine, Hunt has used and considered the same factors and criteria which it considered in determining to advertise in any other publication.

Morton Salt Company

Morton Salt is a substantial producer of various salt products. In 1955 Morton sold $7,327,672 worth of salt products and spent $2,342,619 in advertising them. Morton's advertising program is the result of consultations and deliberations between Morton's advertising agency and Morton's advertising department.

In determining whether to advertise in a particular publication, Morton considers that publication's total circulation; its cost per thousand circulation; its gross cost; the characteristics of the publication's readers according to age, education, etc.; the publication's geographical circulation and circulation in terms of population density both as compared with Morton's sales and total grocery store sales; and, finally, Morton also considers the quality of the printing reproduction. In deciding to advertise in Woman's Day, Morton has been guided by the same factors that it considered in determining to advertise in any magazine.

In summation, viewing the processes which the Defendant Suppliers utilized in choosing to advertise in Woman's Day magazine, the evidence is clear that these defendants chose to advertise in Woman's Day after having weighed the same criteria that they considered before advertising in any medium and, more specifically, in any magazine. Woman's Day magazine met the test to which each of the Defendant Suppliers placed any magazine, passed it, and, as a consequence, each of the Defendant Suppliers placed their advertisements therein. Thus, there is no evidence of any ulterior motive on the part of the Defendant Suppliers in advertising in Woman's Day nor does it appear that the Defendant Suppliers had intended to favor A&P (New Jersey) over any of its other customers. It is also interesting to note that it has been stipulated that the extent to which A&P promotes or merchandises the products of its suppliers is and has been in no way affected by the fact that such suppliers do or do not advertise in Woman's Day or by the extent of such advertising if there is any. Additionally, the evidence also reveals, through the testimony of Harry B. George, National Director of Purchases of A&P, that whether manufacturers or processors of grocery store products do or do not advertise in Woman's Day is never considered in any manner by A&P in deciding whether, or to what extent, to purchase their products for resale in A&P retail stores. George also testified that the advertising in Woman's Day by such manufacturers or processors has no effect on the prices paid by A&P for products purchased for resale in A&P retail stores. Plaintiffs, however, attach no significance to this evidence, which they do not dispute, but argue that, nonetheless, the Act has been violated, if equal payments have not been afforded to them.

Nor do the plaintiffs attach any significance to the evidence which clearly reveals that the Defendant Suppliers receive full value for their payments for their advertisements in Woman's Day. Woman's Day is, admittedly, a high quality magazine enjoying a substantial circulation. This fact, when considered with the fact that the advertising rates charged by Woman's Day, Inc. to all advertisers in Woman's Day, including the Defendant Suppliers, for advertisements in said magazine are comparable to and competitive with the rates charged and prices paid per thousand circulation in magazines of comparable national circulation, makes the conclusion inescapable that the Defendant Suppliers receive full value for their advertisements in Woman's Day. Plaintiffs do not contend otherwise but argue that whether the Defendant Suppliers receive full value is immaterial in view of the fact that like payments by the Defendant Suppliers were not made available to the plaintiffs on proportionally equal terms.

[Legislative History]

In support of their position, plaintiffs cite a passage from Congressman Utterbach's speech which was given just before the adoption of the Act. Congressman Utterbach stated:

> "The existing evil * * * is, of course, the grant for discriminations under the guise of payments for * * * services which, *whether or not * * * actually rendered as agreed,* result in an advantage to the customer so favored as compared with others who have to bear the cost of such services themselves." (emphasis, plaintiffs) 80 Cong. Rec. 9418.

Plaintiffs emphasize the words, "whether or not * * * actually rendered as agreed," as indicating that it does not matter that the supplier receives value for his payments for such "services." This reasoning, however, is clearly untenable for it is manifest that Congressman Utterbach was speaking there of services which, of their very nature, were designed primarily to benefit the customer. Thus, if the service paid for is designed primarily to benefit the customer then it matters little if the services are rendered or not—on the one hand, the customer is benefited by the services which the supplier pays for, and on the other hand, the customer, instead of having the services performed, is benefited by keeping the money given him by the supplier. Either way, the customer is benefited and the Act is violated if the service to be rendered is designed primarily to benefit the customer.

Thus, in the Senate and House Committee Reports, it is stated:

> "Still another favored medium for the granting of oppressive discriminations is found in the practice of large buyer customers to demand, and of their sellers to grant, special allowances in purported payment of advertising and other sales-promotional services, which the customers agree to render with reference to the seller's products, or sometimes with reference to his business generally. Such an allowance becomes unjust when the service is not rendered as agreed and paid for, or when, if rendered, the payment is grossly in excess of its value, or when, in any case the customer is deriving from it equal benefit to his own business and is thus enabled to shift to his vendor substantial portions of his own advertising cost while his smaller competitor, unable to command such allowances, cannot do so." (emphasis added) Senate Report No. 1502, p. 7; House Report No. 2287, p. 15; 74th Cong. 2d Sess. 1936.

["Primary Benefit" Argument]

It is apparent, therefore, from a study of this section, as well as from a study of the entire legislative history of the Act, that where there is a service paid for by the supplier, and the service is actually rendered and the amount so paid is not in excess of the value of the service, it is necessary to determine: (1) whether the service would benefit only the supplier; (2) whether the service would benefit only the customer; or (3) whether the service would benefit both the supplier and his customer. If a service can be said to benefit only the supplier or if the service benefits only the customer, there is no difficulty, as in the one case the Act is violated while in the other it is not. However, where it is conceivable that a service might benefit both the supplier and the customer, then, and only then, it becomes necessary to determine whom the services were primarily designed to benefit. If the services were primarily designed to benefit the supplier, the Act has not been violated; if the services were primarily designed to benefit the customer, then the Act has been violated unless proportionally equal treatment has been given that customer's competitor. If it is made to appear that equal benefits accrued to both the supplier and his customer from the service, then also the Act has been violated; and in determining whether the customer receives equal benefit, it must be made to appear that the customer has been able to shift to his supplier "substantial portions of his own advertising costs." It becomes necessary, therefore, to examine the nature and extent of the benefits flowing from the Defendant Suppliers' paid advertisements in Woman's Day magazine.

[Basis for Selection of Woman's Day]

As has been indicated, the advertisements in Woman's Day of each of the Defendant Suppliers were the result of a careful evaluation of Woman's Day as an advertising medium, each Defendant Supplier, through its advertising department and advertising agency, employing the same criteria in choosing to advertise in Woman's Day that it considered in choosing to advertise in any medium. Woman's Day is a high quality magazine of national prominence and it is considered an excellent advertising medium as attested by the list of nationally prominent advertisers (both food suppliers and non-food suppliers) that place their advertisements regularly in Woman's Day. And it is manifest that the Defendant Suppliers receive full value for their payments for their advertisements in Woman's Day. These facts, when considered with the absence of any evidence tending to establish any purpose or intent on the part of the Defendant Suppliers, individually or collectively, to favor A&P (New Jersey) over the Defendant Suppliers' other customers, clearly establish that each of the Defendant Suppliers' advertisements in Woman's Day was a component part of each supplier's advertising program which was designed only to promote public acceptance of the product advertised and, as such, was designed primarily to benefit each of the Defendant Suppliers. Indeed, there is no evidence of any ulterior motive on the part of any Defendant Supplier in advertising in Woman's Day.

[Type of Woman's Day Advertisements]

Plaintiffs seem to suggest that the advertisements of each of the Defendant Suppliers in Woman's Day were A&P advertisements. To answer this, it is necessary to distinguish between grocery store advertising and national brand advertising of groceries. Grocery store advertising is designed and intended to bring people into a particular store and features the price of the product and the location of the store. National brand advertising, conversely, mentions no price and does not mention the name or location of any store or stores—it merely attempts to acquaint the reader with the desirability of trying a particular nationally known, brand name product.

In the instant case, the evidence reveals that the advertisements of each of the Defendant Suppliers were advertisements of the various products handled by each supplier; the advertisements failed to make any reference to the price of the particular product advertised, nor did they include any mention of the name or location of any store where these products might be purchased. Indeed, the copy of each of the Defendant Suppliers' advertisements in Woman's Day was identical with the copy run by each Defendant Supplier in other magazines and newspapers that were issued at or about the same time as was the particular issue of Woman's Day. Thus, the copy of each of the Defendant Suppliers' advertisements in Woman's Day was not in any way tailored to that magazine. The conclusion is inescapable that the advertisements of each of the Defendant Suppliers in Woman's Day were national brand advertisements of grocery products as distinguished from grocery store advertisements. This is but one of the facts which conclusively establish that the advertisements of each of the Defendant Suppliers were not A&P advertisements but were advertisements primarily designed to benefit each Defendant Supplier by promoting the sales of Defendant Suppliers' products to as many potential purchasers as possible, with the benefits accruing to A&P being only incidental.

[Advertising Benefits All Grocers]

That the advertisements of the Defendant Suppliers in Woman's Day were not A&P advertisements but national brand name grocery product advertisements with the benefits accruing to A&P being incidental to the benefits accruing to the Defendant Suppliers, is also established by the evidence that conclusively shows that the Defendant Suppliers' product advertising in Woman's Day aids in the sale of the advertised products by all grocers who carry the product advertised. This finding is based on several facts, the most important of which is that purchasers of food products do substantial shopping in more than one store. Indeed, the plaintiffs themselves, in attempting to show competition between A&P stores and independent retailers, argue, in their briefs, that the A&P and the independent are competing for the trade of the same customer "who interchanges his patronage."

The document entitled Bench Marks for the Next Five Years in Grocery Selling (Morton's Ex. 11), which was an address given to the National-American Wholesale Grocers Association, on September 13, 1955 by Curtis C. Rogers, Executive Vice President of the Market Research Corporation of America, contains some rather illuminating statistics concerning store loyalty of shoppers. On page 5 of this document, Rogers states, with respect to Chart VI appearing on that page:

"But families don't shop in just one grocery store. The average family shops in 3.7 stores per month. The families shopping in independent stores average 2.6 stores per month, while the exclusive chain store families shop in nearly 2 stores per month. But remember that ⅔ of all of the families shop in both chains and independents, and this group are really shoppers—they average 4½ stores per month."

"We find that out of each 100 families who bought coffee in Store A, 44 made their next purchase of coffee at some other store—on canned vegetables, 56 bought their second purchase at some other store —and on frozen vegetables, 52 bought next at a different store. The housewife shops where she can get the brands and the products that she wants at prices that represent the best value to her." (Emphasis, his)

The findings contained in Chart XII of Morton's Exhibit 11 were the result of a two-week shopping history of typical grocery items, while the findings reflected by Chart VI appear to be the result of a 15-year study of that particular topic. These findings are persuasive in corroborating what I believe to be facts that cannot be seriously disputed. Competition between grocery stores is very keen and in these days of the high cost of living, the housewife is well aware of the necessity of seeking out a bargain. As a result, the housewife shops "where she can get the brands and the products that she wants at prices that represent the best value to her." She becomes acquainted with the necessary facts concerning a bargain in a number of ways, one of which being the grocery store advertisements appearing in newspapers and in handbills distributed to the homes in the vicinity of a particular store. On the other hand, the national brand grocery product advertising by the Defendant Suppliers appearing in Woman's Day might acquaint the reader with the desirability of trying a particular brand name food or keep the name of that product before the public, much the same as it does when it appears in other magazines such as Life, McCall's, Look, etc., but that advertising is not a suggestion, much less a command, to purchase the article at A&P. The food shopper buys where she can purchase the brands and products at the least cost to her. If an advertisement in Woman's Day attracts her attention favorably, she will purchase that product at one of the stores which she patronizes, if the price is right. Thus, viewing the lack of store loyalty among grocery store shoppers, and considering the fact that the grocery shopper interchanges her patronage and buys where she can get the quality product for the least money, and considering also the fact that the Defendant Suppliers' advertisements in Woman's Day are national brand name grocery product advertisements, which suggest neither the price nor place where the products might be purchased, I find that the advertisements by the Defendant Suppliers in Woman's Day magazine are designed to aid in the sale of the advertised products by all grocers who carry that product and not merely A&P. Accordingly, I find that, assuming that said advertisements in Woman's Day do the job that they were intended to do, the advertisements in Woman's Day have, in fact, aided in the sales of the advertised products in all grocery stores and not merely A&P stores.

Corroborative of this finding is a letter (A&P EX. 61) received by Woman's Day, Inc. from Heublein & Bro., makers of A. 1 Sauce. After informing Woman's Day that Heublein's experience was that Woman's Day produced an unusually high number of requests for an advertised A. 1 Sauce booklet, the letter dated December 3, 1943, stated as follows:

> "Therefore, I am very happy to tell you of the swell job Woman's Day is doing for A. 1 Sauce. Even more significant is the fact that we can definitely trace a substantial increase in the sales of A. 1 Sauce since we started using Woman's Day several years ago; not only through the A&P Stores, where the magazine is distributed but also through the other stores located in the neighborhood of the A&P stores.
> "This indicates to us an increased sale through all outlets catering to and competing for the business in the shopping neighborhoods adjacent to an A&P Store where Woman's Day is distributed."

Plaintiffs seek to discredit the weight of this letter by arguing that Women's Day apparently could find only one such document from thousands of documents that were available to it. Assuming that this is true, nevertheless no document was introduced which stated a position contrary to the contents of Heublein's letter. Furthermore, the Heublin letter merely corroborates the conclusion drawn from the other evidence adduced; that is, the nature of the particular type of advertising in Woman's Day and the lack of store loyalty among grocery shoppers conclusively show that the Defendant Suppliers' advertisements in Woman's Day aided in the sales of the products advertised not only in A&P stores but also in all grocery stores carrying that particular product.

["In Store" Promotion]

Underlying the conclusion that advertisements in Woman's Day aid in the general sale of the particular product advertised, is the fact that Woman's Day is not an "in-store" promotional device. In other words, although the shopper purchases the magazine in an A&P store, she does not read the magazine in the store. Thus, the shopper picks up a copy of the magazine at the check-out counter of an A&P store and does not get an opportunity to read the magazine until she leaves the store. That being the case, she is not exposed to Defendant Suppliers' advertisements in Woman's Day until after she leaves the A&P store. Assuming that an advertisement in Woman's Day arouses her desire to purchase a particular product, the shopper is free to purchase that product in the next store she visits if the price is acceptable. And it should be observed that many copies of Woman's Day are passed along to other readers who perhaps do not shop at an A&P store. Clearly, therefore, Woman's Day is not an "in-store" promotional device and, as such, the advertisements therein may benefit all grocery stores and not merely A&P stores.

[Advertising Costs Not Shifted]

Concerning the issue whether A&P shifts substantial portions of its own advertising costs to the Defendant Suppliers, here again, plaintiffs' position is unsupported by the evidence. As has been indicated, the advertisements in issue were designed primarily to benefit each of the Defendant Suppliers for which each received full benefit for their payments. The benefit accruing to A&P from these advertisements was merely incidental to that accruing to each of the Defendant Suppliers. These advertisements were not A&P advertisements but national brand grocery products advertisements. The evidence reveals that A&P spends millions of dollars in advertising each year. It is also interesting to note that the various A&P manufacturing subsidiaries, which compete with the Defendant Suppliers, advertise their products in Woman's Day for which full payment to Woman's Day, Inc. is made. Plaintiffs attempt to belittle these facts by arguing that A&P derives cost-free advertising from the promotion and sale of Woman's Day. Underlying this contention, however, is plaintiffs' argument that the Defendant Suppliers make Woman's Day possible by their payments for advertisements therein; but this contention, as has been indicated hereinbefore in this memorandum, is totally without merit. Nor is it true that A&P receives cost-free advertising from Woman's Day because the record shows that A&P has paid for certain of Woman's Day's advertisements on radio, television and in the newspapers, and the record also reflects that the costs of distribution of the magazine from the warehouse to the store are assumed by A&P, not to mention the fact that certain A&P employees devote an appreciable amount of time in the promotion, distribution and sale of Woman's Day. It is quite apparent, therefore, from the evidence adduced that A&P does not shift substantial portions of its own advertising costs to the Defendant Suppliers.

[Sec. 2(d) of Clayton Act]

For the reasons stated, I hold that the advertisements of each of the Defendant Suppliers in Woman's Day magazine were not A&P advertisements but advertisements primarily designed to benefit each of the Defendant Suppliers who received full value therefrom with the benefits accruing to A&P being incidental to those accruing to each of the Defendant Suppliers. I also hold that the evidence fails to reveal that A&P has shifted to the Defendant Suppliers substantial portions of A&P's own advertising costs. Accordingly, I hold that the plaintiffs have failed to prove that the Defendant Suppliers have violated Section 2(d) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act.

[Proportionally Equal Payments]

There are, however, other reasons which compel such a finding. The evidence reveals that the Defendant Suppliers advertised in other store distributed magazines, such as Family Circle, Better Living, Everywoman's and American Family. Better Living was sold by seven of the plaintiffs until it suspended publication in May 1956. At present, none of the plaintiffs offers for sale a store magazine as apparently no such magazine is available for their distribution. However, I think a reasonable inference could be drawn from the evidence adduced that the Defendant Suppliers would advertise in a magazine distributed by any of the plaintiffs if it met the fixed standards that must be satisfied before each of the Defendant Suppliers decided to advertise in any magazine. The question arises, therefore, whether the Act is violated if the one purchaser is unable to furnish the service which that purchaser's competitor furnishes and for which the common supplier makes payment. Stated in another way, assuming arguendo that the payments by the Defendant Suppliers in this case for advertisements in Woman's Day violated Section 2(d) of the Act, how could the Defendant Suppliers have nullified that violation by making proportionally equal payments to the plaintiffs, if the plaintiffs could not furnish the service for which payments would be made? Congressman Utterbach answers this dilemma by stating:

> "But it is further claimed that the provisions of the bill with regard to advertising allowances work a hardship on the small manufacturer, in that they require such allowances to be granted to all competing customers on proportionally equal terms. But proportional to what? Proportional naturally to those customers' purchases and to their ability and equipment to render or furnish the service or facilities to be paid for." (Italics added) 80 Cong. Rec. 9416.

[Plaintiffs Unequipped to Render Similar Services]

In the instant case, the plaintiffs do not publish or sell a store distributed magazine and, thus, they are unable and unequipped to render or furnish the services for which payment would be made and for which the Defendant Suppliers in this case pay Woman's Day. Being so unable to furnish these services, plaintiffs have no standing to complain about the Defendant Suppliers' advertising in Woman's Day even if it were assumed that these payments violated the Act. This seems manifestly clear from the overall intent of the Act and particularly from the quoted excerpt from Congressman Utterbach's speech. Plaintiffs' suggestion that this difficulty could be cured if A&P made Woman's Day available for sale in all grocery stores, including plaintiffs,' is untenable for the simple reason that the Act imposes no such duty on one customer of the common supplier to furnish for his competitor services which the competitor is unable to render and for which the common supplier would make payment to him.

Plaintiffs fail to cite any authority which militates against the conclusions reached in this memorandum. The cases they cite, unlike the case at bar, involved services which were inherently discriminatory in that they could in no way benefit any customer other that the customer to whom the service is given. Thus, in each case the service involved was primarily designed to benefit the one customer and not the supplier, or at least the benefits were equal between the two.

In Corn Products Co. v. Federal Trade Commission [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,363], 324 U. S. 726, Corn Products spent $750,000 in advertising Curtiss candy bars as being "rich in dextrose." Corn Products had sold dextrose to Curtiss which processed the dextrose into candy bars which Curtiss then sold to the consuming public. The Supreme Court held that Corn Products' failure to make those advertising services available to its customers on proportionally equal terms violated Section 2(e) of the Act. In that case it is quite clear that Corn Products was primarily advertising Curtiss candy bars and that it was assuming advertising costs which properly should have been borne by Curtiss. The results of these advertisements could have in no way benefited any of Curtiss' competitors and thus it could not have been said that the results thereof benefited Corn Products primarily and Curtiss only incidentally.

In Elizabeth Arden Sales Corp. v. Gus Blass Co. [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,400], 150 F. 2d 988, C. A. 8 Cir., Elizabeth Arden paid one customer for the entire salary of a store clerk who was provided by that customer to demonstrate Elizabeth Arden products. However, Elizabeth Arden paid another customer, who was a competitor of its first customer, only one-half of the salary of the demonstrator provided by it. The Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit held that this unequal treatment to competing customers of Elizabeth Arden bore no reasonable basis and was therefore discriminatory and violative of the Act. Thus, it is again manifest that the demonstrator's service could in no way benefit any competitor of the favored customer. The demonstrator's service was designed primarily to benefit the one customer with Elizabeth Arden assuming costs for services which ordinarily should be assumed by the customer who resells the product to the consumer.

And so it is with the services involved in the Federal Trade Commission cases cited by the plaintiffs. Each case involved services which were inherently discriminatory and which were primarily designed to benefit only the customer. No useful purpose would be gained by going into a more detailed discussion of those cases; suffice it to say that they are readily distinguishable on their facts from the instant case.

The Section 2(a) and Section 2(f) Issues

Plaintiffs admit that their claim against the Defendant Suppliers under Section 2(a) of the Act is bottomed on plaintiffs' claim that Sections 2(d) and 2(e) were violated. In other words, they argue that if Sections 2(d) and 2(e) are violated here, then Section 2(a) is violated as well. Plaintiffs urge this position in an attempt to hold A&P liable under Section 2(f) of the Act. Since I have held that the Defendant Suppliers have not violated either Section 2(d) or 2(e), it follows that I must also hold that plaintiffs have failed to prove that the Defendant Suppliers have violated Section 2(a) of the Act. Additionally, however, the record fails to reveal that the Defendant Suppliers have granted A&P either direct or indirect price discriminations; and, even if it could be assumed that plaintiffs sustained their proof under Section 2(a), the record is devoid of competent evidence tending to prove that A&P knowingly induced a discrimination in price within the purview of Section 2(f) of the Act.

Plaintiff Wholesalers' Claim

In this memorandum, I have considered plaintiff wholesalers and retailers as comprising one complaining group. Indeed, the wholesalers' claim is predicated on their assertion that their customers, who they claim are similarly situated with the instant retailers, have been injured the same as the instant retailers with the result being that the plaintiff wholesalers are thereby also injured because their customer will buy less from them as a result of Defendant Suppliers' challenged activities. Prescinding from the logic of such reasoning, it is obvious that the wholesalers' claim is no better than the retailers' claim and, accordingly, the issues must be resolved against them.

[Purpose of Woman's Day]

In their briefs, plaintiffs make the subtle suggestion that A&P (Maryland) had founded Woman's Day as a means of avoiding the consequences of the Robinson-Patman Act which, plaintiffs indicate, was primarily directed against A&P, among others. Suffice it to say, that this contention finds no support in the record. The record does indicate, however, that Woman's Day is a legitimate business enterprise founded for legitimate purposes. Woman's Day is accepted by the public as an excellent magazine and by established advertising agencies as an excellent advertising medium. The record is absolutely devoid of any evidence that Woman's Day was created for any purpose other than for legitimate business reasons. I find absolutely no conduct on the part of any defendant that could, in any conceivable way, be construed as violative of any of the anti-trust laws.

[Post-Legislative History]

In this case, all parties have cited excerpts from Congressman Patman's book, The Robinson-Patman Act, which was written after the Robinson-Patman Act was adopted by Congress. It should be observed that while resort to the legislative history of an act that appears to be ambiguously drawn is a practice that has long been accepted in American Jurisprudence, I cannot accept the practice of citing, as authority, books or other publications subsequently written by legislators concerning what was or was not intended to be covered by a particular act previously adopted by Congress while the author was a member thereof. In Congressman Patman's book, several questions were put to the author concerning whether, under certain facts, a particular practice would constitute a violation of the Act. The author then stated his opinion whether, on the facts so given, the Robinson-Patman Act would have been violated. The parties in this case have attempted to draw an analogy between the facts of this case and the facts of the particular example-case which best suits their purposes. They conclude this line of persuasion by urging a ruling consistent with the particular advisory opinion rendered by Congressman Patman. While resort by the courts to such a novel procedure of resolving an issue might be a convenient way of disposing of these Robinson-Patman Act cases, it is a practice which would amount to an abandonment by the courts of their judicial function and, as such, cannot be condoned. Although legislative histories may be considered by the courts, a book subsequently written by a legislator, even though he be a co-author of the Act, and with all respect to his good intentions in writing such a book, should be given no consideration by a court in determining whether there has or has not been a violation of a particular act. Such a book might be helpful to a businessman as a guide in conducting his business practices but courts of law should resort to more competent authority.

[Defendants Above Reproach]

In reaching the conclusions announced in this memorandum, I am not unmindful of the fact that the defendants have advanced other grounds which might bar the plaintiffs from recovering in the instant case. Since, however, I find Defendant Suppliers' as well as A&P and Woman's Day's conduct herein so above reproach as far as the Clayton and Robinson-Patman Acts are concerned, I feel it unnecessary to prolong this memorandum by discussing issues that are presented by these defendants in arguendo form.

One final word deserves mentioning. I have refrained from discussing much of the evidence submitted by the various parties. Suffice it to say that I have carefully considered all of the evidence submitted and to the extent that this evidence is found as facts to support the conclusions expressed in this memorandum, it will be incorporated in the Findings of Fact entered herein. Concerning planitiffs' objection to the admissibility of the Shopping Survey (A&P Ex. 25) proffered by A&P, plaintiffs' objection is overruled and the same may stand as evidence together with the other exhibits that were admitted pursuant to stipulation.

I cannot close this Memorandum without commending all counsel of record herein for their outstanding efforts and genuine ability which enabled prompt disposition of the case by submitting it on stipulation.

The many pre-trial conferences in which counsel so effectively participated, the long and tedious hours spent in their various offices resolving differences on specific exhibits and preparing stipulations as well as the willingness of all properly to assist the Court and each other constitute an inspiring exemplification of the highest ideals of the legal profession. I am deeply grateful to all counsel.

Findings of Fact

1. This is an action brought on March 2, 1956, by certain named retail and wholesale grocers individually and purportedly as representatives of a class under Section 7 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, c. 647, 26 Stat. 209, as amended, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraint and Monopolies," commonly known as the Sherman Act, and under Section 15 of the Act of Congress of October 15, 1914, c. 323, 38 Stat. 736, as amended, entitled "An Act to Supplement Existing Laws Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies and For Other Purposes," commonly known as the Clayton Act, for a decree:

(a) Adjudging that the defendants have violated Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act and Sections 2(a), (d), (e) and (f) of the Clayton Act, as amended;

(b) Adjudging that each plaintiff was injured in his business or property thereby;

(c) Preventing and enjoining continuing violations by defendants of said sections of said acts;

(d) Granting to plaintiffs three times the amount by which each of the named plaintiffs was damaged, together with costs and reasonable attorneys' fees; and

(e) Requiring all other members of the class allegedly represented by plaintiffs to file their claims with the Court and have their damages established and granted.

2. On October 23, 1956, plaintiffs abandoned their claim that defendants had violated the Sherman Act, thus leaving only the claim that each plaintiff was injured by alleged violations of Sections 2(a), (d) and (e) of the Clayton Act, as amended, by General Foods Corporation, Hunt Foods, Inc. and Morton Salt Company and of Section 2(f) by The Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company.

3. The plaintiffs named in the Complaint are twenty-three retail and two wholesale grocers located in the Chicago Metropolitan Area. The plaintiff retailers are retail grocers as distinguished from chain store retail grocers. With but few exceptions each of the plaintiff retailers operates a single store and said stores are located throughout the Metropolitan Area of Chicago. In addition, there are numerous other retail grocers situated within the Chicago Metropolitan Area who handle and sell at retail groceries, meat and produce commodities directly to the consuming public within said area. There are approximately 13,000 such retail grocers in the Chicago Metropolitan Area, all of whom are independent grocers as distinguished from chain store grocers. On October 17, 1956, three of the retail grocers withdrew as plaintiffs (Louis Janowitz, d/b/a Janowitz Finest Foods, Joseph Karas, d/b/a Kostner-Lake Food Market and Henry C. Surowiec, d/b/a Surowiec's Grocery and Market). Both of the plaintiff wholesalers are located in the Metropolitan Area of Chicago. They handle and sell grocery products to independent retailers (not including the plaintiff retailers) as distinguished from chain store retailers, located in the Chicago Metropolitan Area. There are numerous other wholesale grocers who handle and sell grocery products to independent grocers situated within the said area.

4. The action was brought by plaintiffs on their own behalf and also allegedly on behalf of all other retail and wholesale grocers similarly situated within the City of Chicago, Illinois, and also within such part of the area adjacent thereto commonly known as the Metropolitan Area of Chicago as is within the territorial jurisdiction of this Court.

30. A&P pays Woman's Day, Inc. five cents per copy for the magazine, and it is sold in A&P stores for seven cents per copy.

31. The Board of Directors of Woman's Day, Inc. has included representatives of A&P. However, none of the operating staff or employees of Woman's Day, Inc. is an officer, director or employee of any A&P affiliated company.

32. The business of publishing Woman's Day is and has been conducted by Woman's Day, Inc. as a legitimate publishing business enterprise. Except for normal parent-subsidiary relationships and the distribution and promotion of Woman's Day by A&P, Woman's Day, Inc. has been kept separate from the grocery retailing business of A&P.

[Woman's Day Statistics]

33. The annual cost of producing Woman's Day exceeds nine million dollars ($9,000,000.00). Less than one-fourth of this cost is recovered through the sale of copies. The remainder is received through the sale of advertising space. For example, in the fiscal year 1956, the gross revenue of Woman's Day, Inc. was $9,075,729.00 of which $2,170,850.00 or 24 per cent came from sales of the magazine and $6,904,879.00 or 76 per cent from advertising revenue. The advertising revenue is divided between "supplier" and "non-supplier" advertising. "Supplier" advertisers are manufacturers or producers—such as the defendant suppliers—who products are sold in A&P stores. "Non-supplier" advertisers are manufacturers or producers whose products are not sold in and are not of a type sold in A&P stores. In 1954, of the total gross advertising revenue, 73.3 per cent came from supplier advertisers, while 26.7 per cent came from non-supplier advertisers. In 1955, of the total gross advertising revenue, 65.5 per cent came from the supplier advertisers while 34.5 per cent came from the non-supplier advertisers.

34. No purchasing agent or any other person employed by A&P has ever discussed with A&P suppliers the latter's advertising in Woman's Day or has ever intimated that such advertising would be considered by A&P in determining the extent of its purchases of their products or the prices it would pay for them.

35. Advertising in Woman's Day by manufacturers of food products has no effect on the prices paid by A&P for products purchased by A&P from such advertisers for sale in A&P retail stores.

36. Whether food manufacturers do or do not advertise in Woman's Day is not considered by A&P in deciding whether or to what extent to purchase their products.

37. A&P employees engaged in purchasing and selling grocery products have no contact with Woman's Day advertising space salesmen.

38. The extent to which A&P promotes or merchandises the products of its suppliers is not affected by the fact that such suppliers do or do not advertise in Woman's Day or the extent of any such advertising.

[Merchandising Help]

39. At no time has any merchandising help been given to Morton by A&P by virtue of the fact that Morton advertises in Woman's Day or for any other reason, despite repeated efforts by personnel of Morton's advertising agency to obtain such merchandising help.

40. General Foods and Hunt Foods knew at all times that they could not get any merchandising support from A&P by reason of their advertising in Woman's Day.

[Selling Woman's Day Advertising]

41. In selling advertising, Woman's Day, Inc. has consistently stated to the advertiser that the purchase of advertising space in Woman's Day is completely independent of the buying or selling activities of any A&P affiliated company.

42. Each advertising rate card issued by Woman's Day, Inc. since the inception of the magazine has contained substantially the following sentence:

> "It is distinctly understood that the purchase of advertising space in Woman's Day has no relation, direct or indirect, to the buying and/or selling activities of any affiliated company."

43. Woman's Day has always sold its advertising space, including that sold to Defendant Suppliers, solely on its merits as advertising and on no other consideration.

44. Woman's Day, Inc. has consistently refused requests from grocery product advertisers that Woman's Day, Inc. supply them with promotional material or assist them in procuring store promotion and merchandising of their products.

45. Woman's Day, Inc. has extended no merchandising aid to Defendant Suppliers.

46. Woman's Day space salesmen have not approached anyone in the General Foods, Hunt Foods or Morton organizations outside of the personnel in the advertising department. The presentation of such representatives of Woman's Day is identical with that made in the course of their calls upon advertising agencies and does not include any suggestion or intimation that advertising in Woman's Day would in any way aid or abet the advertiser with respect to merchandising his products in A&P stores.

47. Morton at its own expense prepared so-called "shelf-talkers" to be used in connection with Morton's product displays in stores. These shelf-talkers stated that the product is "as advertised in .... magazine." Woman's Day, Inc., however, refused permission to Morton thus to report its advertising in Woman's Day and use such shelf-talkers in A & P stores. However, permission to use such shelf-talkers was granted by Life, Good Housekeeping, and the other grocery store magazines.

48. Woman's Day is of comparable content and quality with the leading women's magazines such as Good Housekeeping, Ladies' Home Journal, Woman's Home Companion and McCall's.

49. Woman's Day, Inc. is operated as a legitimate business enterprise. Its business is that of publishing a magazine to be sold on its own merits as a magazine.

50. Woman's Day is not a device for giving merchandising aid to A & P suppliers, nor has Woman's Day, Inc. or A & P given any merchandising aid to Defendant Suppliers by virtue of their advertising in Woman's Day.

51. A & P's purchasing power is not utilized to obtain advertising for Woman's Day from A & P suppliers.

52. The grocery retailing business of A & P and the magazine publishing business of Woman's Day, Inc. are conducted as separate business enterprises.

53. All advertising in Woman's Day, including the advertising of the products of Defendant Suppliers and of A & P, its subsidiaries and divisions, is placed through independent advertising agencies pursuant to contracts between Woman's Day, Inc. and the advertising agency handling the account of the advertiser.

[Suppliers' Advertising Agencies]

54. The advertising agencies that have been used by Defendant Suppliers are as follows:

General Foods	Young & Rubicam, Inc.
	Benton & Bowles, Inc.
	Foote, Cone & Belding.
Hunt Foods	Young & Rubicam, Inc.
	Batten, Barton, Durstine & Osborne, Inc.
Morton Salt	Needham, Louis & Brorby, Inc.
	J. Walter Thompson Co.
	Kenyon & Eckart
	Hill Blackett & Co.

55. The advertising by Defendant Suppliers in Woman's Day is only a small portion of the carefully planned national advertising programs for their various products which in general include other magazines, newspapers, billboards, radio, television and other media.

56. Advertising programs for the products of Defendant Suppliers are periodically prepared by their advertising agencies based upon studies undertaken by the latter, are considered by the appropriate company executives and, if approved by them, are executed by the agencies.

57. Defendant Suppliers have placed their advertising in Woman's Day upon the recommendations of advertising agencies representing them, which recommendations are often arrived at after careful consultation between the advertising agency and the advertiser. These recommendations were based by the agencies solely upon their evaluation of Woman's Day as an effective advertising medium for the sale of the products of their respective clients to the consumer public.

58. The criteria used by the advertising agencies and executives of Defendant Suppliers in determining whether or not Woman's Day is to be included in a media schedule are the same ones that apply to the selection of any other magazine or medium.

59. In arriving at their advertising media decisions, the advertisers and the agencies take into consideration studies and surveys made by themselves and by others. Various factors are considered, such as circulation, number of readers, type and location of readers, cost, characteristics of the magazine and its readers, and comparisons with other advertising media.

[Testimonial]

60. G. W. Carrington, Advertising Manager of Morton, testified as follows:

"The sole factors considered by Morton in determining the media in which to advertise are as follows, but not necessarily in the order of importance: (1) total circulation, (2) cost per thousand circulation, (3) gross cost, (4) characteristics of the readers (i.e., sex, age, education, social status, shopping functions, etc.), (5) geographical circulation and circulation in terms of population density (metropolitan areas v. rural areas), both as compared with (a) Morton sales, and (b) total grocery stores sales, and (6) quality of printing reproduction.

"Morton considers all store distributed magazines, including Woman's Day, only in the light of the above factors. Viewed in this light, Morton has considered this type of advertising to be very effective because, in terms of factor (4) above, it reaches (1) women only, for the most part, and (2) women who do the grocery shopping for their families. Consequently, Morton's conclusion has been that there is virtually no advertising waste in store magazines, such as probably occurs in the use of general publications.

"Morton has always considered the use of all the store magazines simply as an integral part of its entire advertising program."

[Hunt's Advertisements]

61. During the period from January 1, 1954, to March 31, 1956, Hunt Foods advertised Hunt's Tomato Sauce in each monthly issue of Woman's Day commencing with the October, 1954 issue through March, 1956 excepting therefrom the December, 1955 issue. It advertised Hunt's Tomato Catsup in the issues of September, October, November and December, 1955. It advertised Hunt's Tomato Paste in Woman's Day in the November and December, 1955 and January and February issues of 1956. It had no other advertisements in Woman's Day from January, 1953 to March 31, 1956, inclusive. It did not advertise any of its other products whether Hunt brand, Snider's brand or other brand in Woman's Day at any time between January 1, 1953 and March 31, 1956. None of Hunt Foods' advertisements in Woman's Day mention its Snider's brand or Pride of the Farm brand or any brand other than Hunt's.

63. Morton did not advertise any of its products in Woman's Day from 1937 through 1940 or from 1943 through 1950.

64. The inclusion or absence of advertising in Woman's Day of products of Defendant Suppliers handled by A & P has had no effect on the prices paid by A & P for such products.

65. Total advertising expenditures and the amount spent for advertising in Woman's Day by each of Defendant Suppliers from 1953 through 1955 are shown in the following table:

Supplier	Year	Total Advertising	"Woman's Day" Advertising
Morton	1953	$ 1,766,836	$ 61,500
	1954	1,943,918	75 500
	1955	2,342,619	52,100
Hunt Foods	1953	3,415,000*	....
	1954	2,531,000*	31,500
	1955	5,741,000*	229,963
General Foods	1954	62,021,000*	376,281
	1955	62,015,000*	292,945
	1956	75,180,000*	199,060

* Fiscal years; remaining figures are for calendar years.

66. Various A & P divisions or subsidiaries advertise in Woman's Day the food products which they manufacture. These advertisements are placed in Woman's Day through the independent advertising agency of Paris & Peart, Inc. in the same manner and at the same rates charged all other advertisers.

[Advertising of Non-Suppliers]

67. Over half of the advertisers in Woman's Day are non-suppliers, i.e., manufacturers whose products are not sold in A & P stores. In 1954, 209 (50.7 per cent) of a total of 412 advertisers were non-suppliers. In 1955, the percentage of non-suppliers increased to 52.4 per cent. Among these non-supplier advertisers are such companies as Frigidaire Division of General Motors, General Electric Co., International Harvester Co., Philco Corporation, Corning Glass Works, Western Electric Company, RKO Radio Pictures, Inc. and Inland Steel Container Co.

68. The non-suppliers provide a substantial portion of Woman's Day advertising revenue. In 1954, advertising revenue from non-suppliers amounted to $2,508,822 out of total advertising revenue of $9,413,843. In 1955, non-suppliers paid $3,205,488 out of the total advertising revenue of $9,279,181. In that same year, $2,170,850 was received by Woman's Day, Inc. from the sale of copies of Woman's Day to A & P and to distributors in Colorado.

69. Woman's Day advertising rates are comparable to and competitive with those charged by magazines of comparable national circulation.

70. Woman's Day advertising rates are based upon a guarantee of a specific net paid advertising circulation during the calendar year. Certifications of circulation are made periodically by the Audit Bureau of Circulations, of which Woman's Day, Inc. is a member.

71. As with all other advertisers in Woman's Day, payments for the advertisements of Defendant Suppliers therein are not made to Woman's Day, Inc. or to A & P but, rather, are made by the respective advertising agencies of Defendant Suppliers direct to Woman's Day, Inc. at the full published advertising rate applicable to all advertisers less the usual 15 per cent agency commission. The advertising agencies collect from the advertiser the full charge for the space purchased.

72. During the period pertinent to this case, neither Woman's Day, Inc. nor A & P has ever received any money or other consideration from any Defendant Supplier, except for certain advertising allowances to A & P offered simultaneously to all retail grocers in specified areas.

73. The A & P subsidiaries and divisions pay the full charge for all of their advertising in Woman's Day[,] and Woman's Day, Inc. has never given them any refunds, rebates, credits, gratuities or allowances with the exception of the circulation billing adjustments given to all advertisers when the circulation guarantee is not met.

74. The dividends paid by Woman's Day, Inc. to A & P (Maryland), averaging $39,736 per year since 1937, are negligible in comparison with A & P's total dollar sales which have been in excess of $4,000,000,000 per year since 1953.

75. There is no evidence that the payments by any or all of Defendant Suppliers for advertising in Woman's Day enabled A & P (New Jersey) to sell its products at prices lower than those charged by plaintiffs for identical or comparable products.

76. Women's Day is a legitimate advertising medium and is not, either in intent or effect, a device to give hidden price discriminations to a preferred buyer.

77. The payments by Defendant Suppliers for advertising in Woman's Day are made to their advertising agencies and are not made to A & P or to Woman's Day, Inc.

78. Defendant Suppliers have received bona fide advertising value, comparable in degree to that received from other leading national magazines, in return for their payments for advertising in Woman's Day.

79. Defendant Suppliers have received nothing but advertising benefit in return for their payments for advertising in Woman's Day.

80. Woman's Day is not made possible by the advertisements of any Defendant Supplier; nor do Defendant Suppliers furnish, or contribute to the furnishing of, Woman's Day to A & P.

81. Woman's Day is not connected with the resale by A & P of any specific product or products of any Defendant Supplier.

82. Inasmuch as Woman's Day is usually sold at the check-out counters it is customarily read outside the store.

83. None of the advertisements of Defendant Suppliers appearing in Woman's Day contain any reference to A & P (or to any other store) or the price at which the products may be purchased.

84. Advertising that is designed and intended to bring people into a particular grocery store customarily features the price of the product and the name or location of the store, and may be termed grocery store advertising. National brand grocery product advertising, on the other hand, advertises only the product, usually without mention of price or any particular store and does not suggest where the demand thereby created may be satisfied. The advertisements of Defendant Suppliers in Woman's Day are national brand grocery product, not grocery store, advertising.

85. The average American family shops at 3.7 stores per month, and two-thirds of all families shop in both chain and independent stores, averaging 4-½ stores per month.

86. Plaintiffs have admitted that each day chain stores and independent stores within a wide radius "are actually competing for the trade of the same customer who interchanges his patronage."

87. The experience of G. F. Heublein & Bro. as stated in a letter to Woman's Day, Inc. on December 3, 1943, was that its advertisements of A-1 Sauce in Woman's Day substantially increased the sales of that product in stores competing with A&P, as well as in A&P stores.

88. The American housewife shops at the particular grocery store where she can get the brands and the products that she wants at prices that represent the best value to her.

89. Plaintiffs have admitted that Woman's Day is read by "large numbers of persons in addition to purchasers." It cannot be assumed, therefore, that all Woman's Day readers shop at A&P.

90. Of the readers of Woman's Day 16 per cent also read Better Living, 10 per cent also read Everywoman's and 32 per cent read Family Circle.

91. Inasmuch as Defendant Suppliers advertised frequently in other magazines, including other store magazines, as well as in other advertising media, Woman's Day readers are exposed to the same advertising influence from other media, including other magazines, as from Woman's Day.

92. Morton has customarily placed four full-color advertisements per year in every magazine used, and this policy has been followed in placing advertising in Woman's Day along with the other store magazines.

93. The products advertised by Morton in Woman's Day are the Blue Package salt, Miniatures and Salters.

94. The lack of relationship between unit sales of the Blue Package salt, which accounts for most of Morton's sales to A&P, and Morton's expenditures for Woman's Day advertising is shown by the following table:

	Total Morton Sales to all Buyers	Total Morton Sales to A&P	% of A&P Sales to Total Sales	Total Morton Expenditures in "Woman's Day"
1955....	7,327,672	756,688	10.3	$52,100
1954....	7,526,283	725,234	09.6	75,500
1953....	7,308,851	708,277	09.7	61,500

1949....	7,259,685	652,219	09.0	......
1948....	6,783,408	619,383	09.1	......
1947....	6,344,994	554,583	08.7	......
1946....	5,433,468	452,040	08.3	......
1945....	4,503,300	423,515	09.4	......
1944....	3,727,858	380,532	10.2	......
1943....	3,347,914	382,461	11.4	.....
1942....	2,765,282	389,132	14.1	14,065
1941....	2,449,521	333,111	13.6	10,051
1940....	2,302,277	312,348	13.6	......
1939....	2,270,094	298,101	13.1	......

95. Hunt Foods' sales to A&P did not increase as much percentagewise in 1955, the year in which it advertised substantially in Woman's Day, as did Hunt Foods' sales to all customers.

(a) In its fiscal 1954 Hunt Foods spent $31,500 in advertising in Woman's Day; in 1955 it spent $229,963 in advertising in Woman's Day.

(b) In the same two years Hunt Foods' sales to A&P, as reflected by its charges to accounts receivable, were $3,162,000 in 1954 and $3,972,000 in 1955, an increase of only 25.6%, whereas its total sales to all purchasers increased from $66,737,169 in 1954 to $85,558,310 in 1955, an increase of more than 28%.

96. A comparison of the tables showing sales of General Foods products to A&P and the time of advertising of the products in Woman's Day shows no pattern of relationship between the advertising and the sales to A&P.

97. A&P private brand products are sold in A&P stores in competition with some products of Hunt Foods and General Foods advertised in Woman's Day. Examples are as follows:

General Foods Products	A&P Brand
Birds Eye Chicken, Vegetables, etc. (frozen foods)	A&P
Instant Maxwell House Coffee	A&P Instant Coffee
Jell-O Gelatin	Sparkle
Jell-O Puddings & Pie Fillings	Anne Page
Log Cabin Syrup..........	Anne Page

General Foods Products	A&P Brand
Post Grape-Nuts Flakes...	Sunnyfield Cereals
Post Sugar Crisp..........
Post-Tens
Swans Down Cake Flour...	Sunnyfield Cake Flour
Hunt Foods Products
Catsup	Anne Page
Chili Sauce	Anne Page
Tomato Sauce	A&P
Canned Fruits and Vegetables	Sultana and Iona

98. The General Foods advertisements appearing in Woman's Day feature the branded products sold by the various separately named divisions of General Foods, not General Foods itself.

99. The advertisements of Morton's, General Foods' and Hunt Foods' products appearing in Woman's Day are virtually identical with advertisements appearing in other magazines for the same products.

100. The opinion of Morton's Advertising Agency, as shown by the testimony of Otto R. Stadelman, Senior Vice-President and Media Director of Needham, Louis & Brorby, Inc., was that Morton's advertisements in Woman's Day did not increase the sales of its products in A&P except insofar as the over-all consumer demand for such products was increased in all grocery stores:

> "The reasons for the Agency's recommendation of store magazines for Morton in particular were as follows: (1) Because of the nature of the product, it was felt that store magazines hit a mass customer group which was not duplicated substantially by any other media; and (2) because virtually the only buyers of the magazines are women who engage in the shopping activities for the family, there is no waste advertising usage.
> "The Agency has never considered that the audience of store magazines is confined to the persons who shop only at the stores which distribute a particular magazine, but rather that their audience consists of persons who also shop at other grocery stores. The significance, then, of the fact that the store magazines are sold only within certain grocery stores is that their readers are thus confined to persons who buy groceries, without regard to where they may shop for them.
> "The Agency's recommendation of store magazines was not based on the thought that Morton sales in particular stores would be increased because of the sale of a store magazine in those stores. On the contrary, the thinking of the Agency was that the store magazines did not increase the traffic in the store handling them, nor the sales in those particular stores of the products advertised in the magazines, except (as to the latter) insofar as the overall consumer demand for such products was increased in all grocery stores, as it would be, for example, by advertisements placed in Life and other magazines of general circulation."

101. The opinion of Morton's Advertising Department, as shown by the testimony of G. W. Carrington, Morton's Advertising Manager, was that its Woman's Day advertisements were influential in all stores, not just in A&P.

102. Morton, to promote purchases of its products by independent grocery stores as well as by chain stores, intentionally brought to their attention (through trade journal advertising and its salesmen's "portfolios") the fact that among the advertising media used by Morton was Woman's Day.

103. General Foods brought their advertising in Woman's Day to the attention of the trade generally through their salesmen's kits.

104. The purpose and effect of advertising in Woman's Day by Defendant Suppliers is to help sell the particular advertised product wherever it can be bought and not to favor one retailer over the over. This advertising was primarily designed to benefit each of the Defendant Suppliers with any benefits accruing to A&P being merely incidental.

105. To the extent that the Woman's Day advertisements of Defendant Suppliers are beneficial, i. e., result in increased sales of the advertised products, such benefit is shared by all grocers who handle the advertised products.

106. In view of the preceding finding, the Woman's Day advertisements of Defendant Suppliers result in no competitive advantage to A&P, and the benefit derived by A&P from such advertisements—in terms of any increased sales of the Defendant Suppliers' products—is not significant compared with the same benefit derived by Defendant Suppliers.

107. A comparison of A&P total annual sales and Woman's Day circulation, as shown by the graphs stipulated by the parties, shows that there is no relationship between the two. Woman's Day circulation increased rapidly from 1948 to 1952 and decreased from 1952 to 1955. However, A&P sales have increased steadily from 1948 to 1955.

108. The daily A&P sales in 65 A&P stores in the Chicago Metropolitan Area follow a regular weekly pattern of being low on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, increasing on Thursday and rising to a peak on Friday and Saturday. This pattern is not affected by the placing of Woman's Day on sale in those stores.

[Shopping Survey]

109. A&P and Woman's Day, Inc. caused to be made a Shopping Survey among 4,602 shoppers in 22 A&P stores located near each of plaintiff's stores.

(a) The persons who conducted the Shopping Survey and prepared the Survey Report are recognized experts in the field of consumer, customer and shopping surveys.

(b) The data gathered from the respondents is accurately reported in the Survey Report dated November 5, 1956.

(c) The sample design used in said Survey, the number of interviews conducted and the manner in which the interviews were conducted, were all in accordance with generally accepted standards of objective procedure in the field of opinion surveys.

(d) The form of the questions used and the manner of conducting the interviews were in accordance with generally accepted standards of objective procedure in the field of opinion surveys.

(e) The sample design utilized in the Survey was in accordance wtih generally accepted standards of statistical procedure for this type of survey.

(f) The entire Shopping Survey was conducted in accordance with prearranged operational schedules prepared by experts in the respective fields of statistical sampling, questionnaire drafting and field interviewing, and was designed by use of generally accepted scientific methods for opinion research and analysis.

(g) The sample design and all interviewer arrangements were prepared independently of A&P and its attorneys.

(h) Neither the interviewers nor the field supervisors engaged in the Shopping Survey were aware of the litigation, the purpose of the survey or the use to be made of the results of the survey.

(i) The A&P store managers did not know in advance on what day or at what hours the interviewing would be conducted in their stores, and the interviewers had no contact with A&P personnel other than to present their identification cards to the store managers.

(j) The testimony of the planners, supervisors and workers as to the planning, conducting and reporting of the Shopping Survey was stipulated by the parties.

[Survey Results]

110. The results of the Shopping Survey are as follows:

(a) Out of the 4,602 shoppers interviewed in the Shopping Survey, only 16 (three tenths of one per cent) gave Woman's Day as one of the reasons for shopping at A&P, and only 10 (two tenths of one per cent) gave "A&P magazines" as a reason for shopping at A&P.

(b) At least three of the ten persons who listed "A&P magazines" were not referring to Woman's Day since, in response to a later question, these three said they never purchased Woman's Day. Thus, only 23 shoppers out of 4,602 (less than five-tenths of one per cent) gave Woman's Day or "A&P magazines" as one reason for shopping at A&P.

(c) Later in the questioning, the persons who said that they bought Woman's Day were asked whether they would do less shopping at A&P if the magazine were available at all grocery stores. Only 11 shoppers (two-tenths of one per cent) said they would shop less at A&P and none said, in response to the next question, that they would shop more at any of the plaintiffs' stores.

(d) A series of probing questions were used to elicit all reasons for shopping at A&P that each shopper might think worthy of mention. The 9,621 reasons given by the 4,602 shoppers are collated and tabulated below:

Reasons	Number	Per Cent
Save money at A&P; like bargains; more reasonable than other stores	2708	28.1

[Conclusions from Survey]

111. Among the reasons people shop at a particular grocery store are: prices; convenience of location; friendliness and helpfulness of personnel; quality of merchandise; variety of brands carried; extent of stock; quality of fresh meats, vegetables, fruits; arrangement of store; cleanliness; quickness of checkouts; convenient parking; air-conditioning; specials, premiums or trading stamps; delivery service; convenience of hours—if open some evenings; availability of credit; adjustment policy; policy on cashing checks.

112. S. W. Shea, who has been with A&P for 34 years, whose duties have required him to keep informed on sales volumes, trends and causes of increases or decreases in sales, and who is now General Sales Director of A&P, testified as follows:

> "It is his considered opinion that the availability of Woman's Day in A&P retail stores does not increase the traffic in such stores."

113. The testimony of Harley V. McNamara, President of National Tea Co., plaintiffs' only witness, is stipulated by the parties. Mr. McNamara states that in 1950, when National Tea did not distribute a store magazine, "it was his belief that food store magazines * * * helped develop customer good will, and might develop store traffic and sales for the merchandise advertised therein." However, after six years' experience with a store magazine (Everywoman's), Mr. McNamara concluded only that the magazine had aided "in maintaining and developing customer good will," saying nothing about the magazine as a sales or traffic builder.

114. In the Price Survey (A&P Exhibit 26), prices were checked on 99 different items in all plaintiffs' stores and, to make up a pair with each plaintiff's store, in an A&P store near each plaintiff. All but 5 of the items were those selected by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the U. S. Department of Labor for use in its Consumer Price Index. Together, the items make up a typical "market basket."

115. In comparing prices between A&P and plaintiffs, the Price Survey established that:

(a) For every one of the twenty-four pairs of stores included in the survey, the total "market basket" was lower priced in the A&P store than in plaintiffs' store.

(b) The total "market basket" was 4.2 per cent higher in plaintiffs' stores than in A&P stores.

(c) On Friday and Saturday the price advantage of A&P stores over plaintiffs' stores on the total "market basket" was approximately double that which it was on other days. There was little variation between morning and afternoon or between each of the three weeks.

116. The Composites (A&P Exhibits 1 to 24) accurately reflect the following:

(a) A map of the locality in which each plaintiff retailer is situated, the area which the plaintiff marked on the map as approximating the area from which he believed he drew a majority of his customers, and the location of some of his competitors;

(b) A photograph of each plaintiff retailer, certain A&P stores and stores of independent and chain supermarkets in the vicinity of plaintiff's store; and

(c) The location of each of said stores on said map.

117. The Composites establish as to the area of each plaintiff's retail store one or more of the following factors:

(a) The nearest A&P is so far from plaintiff's store that competition between them is negligible.

(b) There are a number of chain stores or independent supermarkets, larger and more attractive than plaintiff, either close to the A&P or nearer to the plaintiff than the A&P.

(c) Price advantages, location, size, type of service, hours, parking facilities or variety of products make the A&P stores and other supermarkets more attractive to shoppers than plaintiff's store.

118. In addition to the grocery stores shown on the Composites, there are numerous other grocery stores near each plaintiff and each A&P in the same locality.

119. The Shopping Survey (A&P Ex. 25) was fairly and expertly planned and conducted.

120. If any plaintiff has lost or failed to gain any customers (and there is no evidence thereof), there are many stores other than A&P and many considerations other than Woman's Day which more logically are the cause of this loss or failure to gain.

121. If Woman's Day were no longer available at A&P, it would not necessarily follow that, even if some persons did stop patronizing A&P, they would choose plaintiffs' stores in preference to the many supermarkets and other grocery stores in the locality of the A&P.

122. The distribution of Woman's Day in A&P stores has no immediate impact on the sales of those stores.

123. Woman's Day cannot be isolated as a factor causing persons to shop at A&P stores.

[A&P Benefits from Woman's Day]

124. The only benefits received by A&P from Woman's Day (other than increased consumer demand shared by A&P and other stores, resulting from product advertising in the magazine) are the following:

(a) Dividends paid by Woman's Day, Inc. to A&P (Maryland) averaging $39,736 per year since 1937.

(b) Mention of the "A&P" name or the fact that Woman's Day can be purchased only at A&P stores in advertising and promotional activities involving Woman's Day.

(c) Gross profit of 2¢ per issue on the sale of the magazine by A&P stores.

125. The entity which receives dividends from Woman's Day, Inc. is A&P (Maryland), the parent company, and not the several A&P companies which operate the retail stores and do the buying and advertising therefor. The latter have never received any dividends of any kind from Woman's Day, Inc.

126. The dividends paid by Woman's Day, Inc. are negligible in comparison with A&P net profit, before and after taxes.

[Profits of Woman's Day, Inc.]

127. In 1953, the percentage of the net profit of Woman's Day, Inc. to that of A&P was five-tenths of one per cent; in 1954, it was seven-tenths of one per cent. In 1955, Woman's Day, Inc. suffered a substantial loss.

128. The amounts spent on advertising by A&P are shown annually in the following table:

Year	Amount
1948	$13,987,000
1949	17,298,000
1950	17,024,000
1951	18,100,000
1952	19,946,000
1953	20,620,000
1954	22,426,000
1955	23,697,000

129. The amount spent by Woman's Day, Inc. on newspaper, radio, and TV advertising which may result in advertising benefit to A&P is quite small:

	Newspaper Space & Preparation	Radio and TV Time
1952	$46,235	none
1953	32,192	none
1954	31,447	none
1955	4,665	$25,544

In 1953 and 1954, minor amounts, not segregated on A&P's books, were spent on preparing suggestions for radio and TV spot material. The actual programming was done and paid for by A&P.

130. In those instances where the advertising by Woman's Day, Inc. was directed to the public (promotional signs, TV commercials, radio and TV spots in the summer of 1950, ads in New Yorker) the A&P advertising is limited to mentioning the "A&P" name or a statement that the magazine can be purchased only at A&P stores.

131. A substantial portion of Woman's Day, Inc. magazine advertising expenditures is for obtaining non-supplier advertising and for trade journals advertising directed at the advertiser and the agency, not the consumer. Examples are the motion picture, "A Geography of Retailing" and advertisements appearing in National Advertising Journal, Advertising and Selling, Printers Ink, Tide, Sales Management, Media

Digest, P. I. B., Advertising Age, Electrical Merchandising, Retailing Daily, Woman's Wear Daily, Sales Management, Boot and Shoe Recorder, and other similar magazines.

132. A&P has, at its own cost, engaged in substantial promotion of Woman's Day. With the exception of commercials on the TV program "Today" and TV spots in six cities in the summer of 1950, A&P has paid for all radio and TV advertising of Woman's Day. A&P has paid the cost of all inserts in store newspaper advertisements featuring Woman's Day, except those appearing in the summer months of 1952, 1953 and 1954.

133. The net benefit which A&P receives from promotional activities of Woman's Day, Inc. is not significant in view of the relatively small amounts spent by Woman's Day, Inc. for such promotion, the limited advertising benefit to A&P from such promotion and the necessity of offsetting even these benefits by the expenses incurred by A&P itself in promoting Woman's Day.

134. No payment for advertising in Woman's Day by any A&P supplier enables A&P to shift to such supplier a substantial portion of the advertising costs of A&P.

135. Whatever benefit is derived by A&P from Woman's Day and the advertisements therein is incidental in comparison with the benefit derived by a supplier of A&P from its payments for advertising in Woman's Day.

[Similar Magazines Analyzed]

136. There are five major store magazines other than Woman's Day that are or were obtainable only at retail grocery stores. However, only three of these are currently being published. Pertinent facts concerning these five magazines are as follows:

Family Circle: This magazine started publication in September 1932. Its retail price is now 7¢, having been raised from 5¢ in April 1956. It is available to and obtainable in various stores (other than plaintiffs' stores) throughout the United States, including the stores of Albers Super Markets, Inc., American Stores Company, H. C. Bohack Company, Inc., H. E. Butt Grocery Company, Dixie-Home Stores, First National Stores, Inc., The Grand Union Company, H. G. Hill Stores, Inc., Jewel Tea Co., Inc., The Kroger Company, Red Owl Stores, Inc., The Safeway Stores, Inc., J. Weingarten, Inc., Winn & Lovett Grocery Company, Fur's Inc., Hinke & Pillot, Inc., Krambo Food Stores, Inc., Big Chain Stores, Inc., Child's Food Stores, Inc. and Food Fair Super Markets.

Western Family: This magazine started publication in June 1941. It is given away free in stores served by various outlets in the western part of the United States.

Everywoman's: This magazine started publication in January 1951. Its retail price is now 7¢, having been raised from 5¢. It is available to and obtainable at various independent grocery stores and chains throughout the United States. In the Chicago Metropolitan Area it is only available to and obtainable at the stores of the National Tea Company.

American Family: This magazine started publication in January 1948 and suspended publication in June 1954. Its resale price was 7¢, having been raised from 5¢. It was available at stores of 17 independent store groups, including the Independent Grocers' Alliance, Progressive Food Stores, Inc., Certified Grocers of Illinois, Inc., Central Grocers Cooperative, Cardinal Food Stores, Royal Blue Stores, Grocerland Cooperative, Inc., Spot-Lite Stores, and certain of the plaintiff's stores who were members of such groups. This magazine was also available to retail stores purchasing from a number of independent wholesalers throughout the United States, including Holleb & Co., Monarch Finer Goods (a Division of Consolidated Foods Corporation), and others in the Chicago Metropolitan Area.

Better Living: This magazine started publication in May 1951 and suspended publication in May 1956. Its resale price was 7¢, having been raised from 5¢. It was available in various independent grocery stores throughout the United States. In Chicago it was available to and obtainable at independent grocery stores who were members of the Super Market Institute, Certified Grocers of Illinois, Inc., Oh Boy Stores, various independent stores, and certain of the plaintiffs' stores as indicated in the Summary of Store Facts.

137. In the Chicago Metropolitan Area, the following purchasing cooperatives which independent retailers may join offered to its customers either American Family or Better Living at some times during the last two years:

Certified Grocers of Illinois, Inc. (Certified)

Central Grocers Cooperative, Inc. (Centrella)

Grocerland Cooperative, Inc. (Grocerland)

Independent Grocers' Alliance (IGA)

Progressive Food Stores, Inc. (Progressive)

138. American Family was available to retail stores purchasing from a number of independent wholesalers throughout the United States, including Holleb & Co., Monarch Finer Foods and others in the Chicago Metropolitan Area, and Better Living was available to members of the Super Market Institute, Oh Boy Stores and various independent stores.

139. Of the twenty plaintiff retailers, seventeen (operating 22 of the plaintiffs' 25 stores) purchased their groceries from one of these purchasing cooperatives or independent wholesalers who distributed American Family or Better Living:

Certified:	Dominick's Finer Foods, Inc., Cicero, Lake Food Mart, Stevens Certified Super Mart (2 stores), and Save-Way Food Mart
Centrella:	Berg's Food Store, Franklin Grocery and Market, Fifth Avenue Food Mart, and Carl A. Schletz, Inc.
Grocerland:	Fruitland Foods
IGA:	Norwood Park IGA, Wagner Grocery and Market, Schuetz' IGA Food Store (2 stores)
Progressive:	Goldstein's Progressive Foods, Harvey's Super Mart, Clover Food Mart
Oh Boy:	Leo's Food Mart
Holleb and Monarch:	Alliance Meat Shop (3 stores) and Supreme Meat Market

140. Not all of plaintiff retailers took advantage of the store magazines available to them. Thus, all four Certified stores handled Better Living or American Family. Two of the Centrella customers carried American Family and two did not. One of these, Muir (Fifth Avenue Food Mart), carried the magazine for only three months. Of the three IGA customers, only two distributed the available magazine and one of these (Schuetz) did not carry the magazine during all the time it was available. None of the plaintiffs who were customers of Progressive or Grocerland distributed American Family. Plaintiff Bernard (Leo's Food Mart), who bought from Oh Boy, occasionally handled Better Living, but Markus (Alliance Meat Shops and Supreme Meat Market), who bought from Holleb and Monarch, never sold a store magazine in any of his four stores, one of which is now closed.

141. Defendant Suppliers have each advertised certain of their products in store magazines other than Woman's Day, including those which were available to and distributed by certain of the plaintiff retailers.

142. A store magazine other than Woman's Day was available to a substantial number of plaintiff retailers during the entire two year period immediately preceding the filing of the Complaint herein.

143. Defendant Suppliers have advertised their products in store magazines other than Woman's Day, one of which was available to a substantial number of plaintiff retailers during the entire two year period immediately preceding the filing of the Complaint herein.

144. During the two year period immediately preceding the filing of the Complaint herein, none of the plaintiffs, individually or collectively, published and distributed, directly or indirectly, a store magazine. Thus, no plaintiff was able to furnish to any of the Defendant Suppliers advertising space in a magazine published and distributed by it and for which each of the Defendant Suppliers would make payment.

145. At all times pertinent to the Complaint, A&P purchased directly from Defendant Suppliers some of their products and is continuing so to do.

146. Hunt Foods has made no sales to any plaintiff retailer at any time during the period involved in the Complaint. No employee of Hunt Foods called on any plaintiff retailer during the period involved. Hunt Foods has not at any time exercised any control over the price at which plaintiff retailers or any one else have purchased or sold any Hunt Foods product.

147. Hunt Foods sells more than 15 different products, some under the brand name of "Hunt" and some under other brand names—"Snider's" and "Pride of the Farm." Only three products of Hunt Foods were advertised in Woman's Day at any time and only one product prior to September, 1955. The record is silent as to whether any product sold by Hunt Foods to plaintiff wholesalers was advertised in Woman's Day, or as to whether any product of Hunt Foods sold by any plaintiff retailer was advertised in Woman's Day.

148. General Foods merchandises more than 50 different products, only 15 of which were advertised in Woman's Day at any time during the period involved in this suit and none was advertised regularly therein.

149. There is no evidence that either of the two plaintiff wholesalers sold any product of General Foods to any retailer who was competing with A&P in its resale at or near any time that it was advertised in Woman's Day.

150. The record is silent as to whether any product of General Foods sold by any plaintiff retailer was advertised in Woman's Day (except that Instant Maxwell House Coffee was advertised in the March, 1954 issue).

151. Hunt Foods made sales at all times pertinent to the Complaint and are still making sales to plaintiff wholesalers and other wholesalers and cooperative purchasing organizations situated within the Chicago Metropolitan Area, who in turn sold such products to some retailers.

152. All of plaintiff retailers at some time or times since March 1, 1954, and some of plaintiff retailers at all times since March 1, 1954, have handled and sold to retail consumers one or more products of Hunt Foods.

153. General Foods has made at all times pertinent to the Complaint, and still is making sales of various of its products to plaintiff wholesalers and to other wholesalers and cooperative purchasing organizations situated within the Chicago Metropolitan Area, which in turn have sold and sell such products to retailers.

154. Plaintiff retailers, Leo Bernard, Bernard Bruski, John E. Markus, Stanley Piekarz, Anthony Racz, Robert M. Wagner, and Elizabeth Wagner, d/b/a Wagner Grocery and Market, Atlas Market Company, a corporation, and Carl A. Schletz, Inc., a corporation, have made no purchases of any product from General Foods at any time since January 1, 1954. The only products that have been sold by General Foods to any plaintiff retailer since January 1, 1954, are some products of Maxwell House Division.

155. Plaintiffs Goldstein and Muir Bros. made no purchases of Maxwell House products for more than one and a half years after the appearance of the last issue of Woman's Day containing a Maxwell House advertisement.

156. Except as to Maxwell House products purchased from General Foods by some plaintiff retailers, the record is silent as to which, if any, products of General Foods advertised in Woman's Day were handled or sold by any plaintiff retailer.

157. General Foods paid for the advertisement of Instant Maxwell House Coffee which appeared in the March, 1954 issue of Woman's Day on February 28, 1954, prior to the period concerning which these suits are brought, and no Maxwell House advertisement has appeared in Woman's Day since that issue.

158. Each plaintiff retailer at some time since March 1, 1954, has handled and sold, and is presently handling and selling, to retailer consumers one or more products of General Foods.

159. General Foods does not exercise, and has not exercised at any time, any control of any kind over the resale price by anyone of any of its products.

160. Morton has sold and is selling its products to plaintiff wholesalers. All plaintiff retailers handled and sold to retail consumers products of Morton and have done so at all times pertinent to the Complaint. However, Morton at no time pertinent hereto sold any of its products to said retailers.

161. Morton neither possessed nor exercised any control whatever over the price at which plaintiff retailers either purchased or sold Morton products, nor did Morton possess or exercise any control whatever over the retailership between cooperatives, jobbers or wholesalers, on the one hand, and retailers on the other hand.

162. Save only for possible instances of meeting competitive situations created by other salt producers, Morton has granted no differentials in price, discounts, rebates, refunds, advertising allowances, cooperative advertising deals or allowances, free goods or any other consideration by reason of the purchases of its products which were not offered and made available to all customers or potential customers of Morton within a given marketing area, including A&P and plaintiffs herein.

163. At times the prices of some of General Foods' grocery store products were based on volume of purchase. Such prices applied uniformly to A&P and all other purchasers from General Foods within a marketing area. In addition, General Foods has from time to time, for limited periods, offered free goods, premiums or allowances, based upon purchase of stated units of a particular product by retailers. Such offers were available to all, including A&P, on the same or proportionally equal terms within a marketing area.

164. All rebates, refunds, free goods, allowances and discounts to the purchasers of Hunt Foods' products were made available on the same or proportionately equal terms to all retailers and wholesalers, including A&P, and the prices charged by Hunt Foods were on the same basis to all.

165. The prices paid by A&P for each of the products purchased from each Defendant Supplier are the prices published by the respective Defendant Suppliers on printed price lists published to the trade in general, including where applicable any quantity or other price consideration likewise published to the trade in general.

166. With the exception of products of the Maxwell House Division of General Foods, no plaintiff retailer purchased products of Defendant Suppliers directly from Defendant Suppliers and (with the same exception) there is no evidence that any plaintiff retailer handled or sold any product of General Foods or Hunt Foods that was advertised at any time in Woman's Day.

167. Each of the defendant suppliers maintained a direct relationship with each of the plaintiff retailers and other retailers similarly situated. Each defendant supplier furnished to each of the afore-described retailers services in connection with the resale by that retailer of the commodity produced by the defendant supplier. Employees of the defendant, General Foods, known as sales representatives, visited the individual retailers within said area, including the plaintiffs, and made available directly to such retailers display and merchandising assistance and personnel, such as demonstrators, sign painters, window trimmers, artists, food display men, layout personnel and the like. Said defendant also furnished directly to said retailers a wide variety of in-store advertising material. In addition, promotional men were sent directly from the offices of the defendant, General Foods, to the said retailers, which promotional men took direct orders of General Foods' products which such representatives of General Foods themselves transmitted to a wholesaler or which said representatives of General Foods themselves wrote up for the retail grocer to send directly to his cooperative supplier, as the case might be. Such promotional representatives of General Foods made as many as eight or ten calls upon retail grocers in the Chicago area each and every day.

The defendant, Morton Salt, furnished direct sales advertising and promotional material to the aforesaid retailers and used personnel of Morton Salt to prepare the retailers' food, counter, window and shelf displays. In addition, Morton Salt salesmen made direct calls upon the individual retailers, giving them direct promotional assistance and materials. Frequently, the Morton Salt salesmen, to assure purchase of Morton products by the retailer, actually wrote out the order for the retailer on the order pad given by the cooperative buying group to the retailers. For retailers who were not members of such a cooperative, the Morton Salt salesmen themselves transmitted the order directly to the wholesaler or jobber designated by the retailer.

The defendant, Hunt Foods, made available to purchasers of the company's products window trimmers, stock cards and additional sales and promotional material.

168. None of the Defendant Suppliers have exercised any control over the prices at which their products are sold by the plaintiff retailers.

169. No Defendant Supplier has discriminated in favor of A&P in the prices at which its products are sold to wholesale or retail grocers.

170. There is no evidence that A&P knowingly induced or received any price discrimination from any Defendant Supplier.

171. There is no evidence that any plaintiff has lost sales or customers or profits as a result of the distribution of Woman's Day by A&P stores.

172. There is no evidence that the publication and distribution of Woman's Day has resulted in a decrease in A&P's cost of doing business or an increase in any plaintiff's cost of doing business.

173. There is no evidence that Woman's Day has attracted customers to A&P stores away from any of plaintiffs' stores.

174. There is no evidence that any retailer purchased less from any wholesaler because of the existence of Woman's Day or its distribution by A&P.

175. The plaintiff wholesalers did not sell to any plaintiff retailer.

176. There is no evidence that any plaintiff paid any more for his supplies, nor that he spent more for advertising nor that he sold any less products by reason of any Defendant Supplier's advertising in Woman's Day.

177. There are many differences among the retailer grocery stores and wholesale grocers in the Chicago Metropolitan Area, such as type of store or business, size, parking and credit facilities, hours of business, type of merchandise handled, advertising activities and methods of purchasing.

178. There is no evidence to indicate the number of retailers in the Chicago Metropolitan Area who sold General Foods products which were advertised in Woman's Day.

179. There is no evidence to indicate the number of retailers in the Chicago Metropolitan Area who sold Hunt Foods products which were advertised in Woman's Day.

180. No plaintiff was authorized by any other person to sue on behalf of or represent such other person in this litigation.

181. Three of the original plaintiffs in this action have withdrawn and no additional parties have intervened or joined as plaintiffs.

182. The legislative purpose of Sections 2(d) and 2(e) is as set forth in the Committee Reports as follows:

> "Still another favored medium for the granting of oppressive discriminations is found in the practice of large buyer customers to demand, and of their sellers to grant, special allowances in purported payment of advertising and other sales-promotional services, which the customer agrees to render with reference to the seller's products, or sometimes with reference to his business generally. Such an allowance becomes unjust when the service is not rendered as agreed and paid for, or when, if rendered, the payment is grossly in excess of its value, or when in any case the customer is deriving from it equal benefit to his own business and is thus enabled to shift to his vendor substantial portions of his own advertising cost, while his smaller competitor, unable to command such allowances, cannot do so."

183. The legislative interpretation of the phrase "proportionally equal terms" as provided in Sections 2(d) and 2(e) is set forth at 80 Cong. Rec. 9416:

> "But it is further claimed that the provisions of the bill with regard to advertising allowances work a hardship on the small manufacturer, in that they require such allowances to be granted to all competing customers on proportionally equal terms. But proportional to what? Proportional naturally to those customers' purchases and to their ability and equipment to render or furnish the service or facilities to be paid for."

Conclusions of Law

1. The Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter of this action and the parties hereto.

2. There can be no violation of the Robinson-Patman Act by reason of:

(a) The organization of Woman's Day, Inc. by A&P (Maryland) for the purpose of publishing the magazine Woman's Day; and

(b) The selection by Woman's Day, Inc. of A&P (New Jersey) as its customer to the exclusion of plaintiffs; and

(c) The rendering by Woman's Day, Inc. of advertising services as agreed and paid for in return for bona fide advertising payments from advertisers; and

(d) The acceptance by Woman's Day, Inc. of bona fide advertising payments from advertisers, including suppliers whose products are sold by A&P and plaintiffs, where the only benefit derived by A&P from such payments is incidental, both causally and quantitatively.

3. The payments of Defendant Suppliers for advertising in Woman's Day were not "to or for the benefit of" A&P for a "service or facility" furnished by A&P.

4. It was the intent of Congress that advertising payments are not unlawful under Sections 2(d) and 2(e) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, where advertising services are rendered as agreed and paid for and where the recipient derives only an incidental benefit therefrom.

5. It was not intended by Congress that Sections 2(d) and 2(e) should be applied so as to hamper legitimate advertising.

6. To the extent that the Woman's Day advertisements of Defendant Suppliers are beneficial, i. e., result in increased sales of the advertised products, such benefit is shared by all grocers who handle the advertised products. Therefore such advertisements are inherently non-discriminatory and are not, within the meaning of Sections 2(d) and 2(e), "in connection with" the resale of Defendant Suppliers' products by A&P.

7. Payments made to Woman's Day, Inc. by Defendant Suppliers were for the advertisements of specific products placed in the magazine Woman's Day by Defendant Suppliers through their respective advertising agencies and were not payments for the maintenance of the magazine itself.

8. The fact that the advertising payments of the three Defendant Suppliers is part of the total income of Woman's Day, Inc., does not make any Defendant Supplier responsible for the continued existence of Woman's Day. In the sense that the payments for advertising by all advertisers in Woman's Day might be said to help to "make possible" the continued existence of Woman's Day, such "fact" is of no legal significance.

9. The payments of Defendant Suppliers for advertising in Woman's Day do not constitute the furnishing or contributing to the furnishing of a service or facility by Defendant Suppliers to A&P.

10. Woman's Day is not a service or facility within the meaning of Sections 2(d) and 2(e).

11. Woman's Day is not a service or facility furnished "in connection with" the resale by A&P of products manufactured by Defendant Suppliers.

12. The payments by Defendant Suppliers for advertising in Woman's Day are not in violation of Sections 2(d) and 2(e).

13. Inasmuch as plaintiffs are unable to furnish the Defendant Suppliers with advertising space in a store magazine published and distributed by it, Defendant Suppliers' payments for advertising in Woman's Day are not in violation of Section 2(d) since it was thus impossible for the Defendant Suppliers to make such payments available to the plaintiffs on proportionally equal terms.

14. The payments by Defendant Suppliers for advertising in Woman's Day do not constitute, either directly or indirectly, a discrimination in price in favor of A&P in violation of Section 2(a).

15. A&P has neither induced nor received a direct or indirect price discrimination in violation of Section 2(a) and is not, therefore, in violation of Section 2(f).

16. No plaintiff has established the right to injunctive relief by proving a "threatened loss or damage by a violation of the antitrust laws" within the meaning of Section 16 of the Clayton Act.

17. Plaintiffs have failed to discharge their burden of proving, by a preponderance of the evidence, the following:

(a) That the payments to Woman's Day, Inc. for advertising in Woman's Day constitute, directly or indirectly, a discrimination by Defendant Suppliers in the price of their products in favor of A&P and against plaintiffs;

(b) That A&P knowingly induced or received such a discrimination in price;

(c) That the payments to Woman's Day, Inc. for Defendant Suppliers' advertisements in Woman's Day, either—

(i) Constitute payments to or for the benefit of A&P as compensation for a service furnished by or through A&P in connection with the sale of Defendant Suppliers' products by A&P; or

(ii) Constitute discriminations in favor of A&P and against plaintiffs as purchasers of a commodity from Defendant Suppliers by contributing to the furnishing of a facility to A&P connected with the sale of such commodity;

(d) That these payments to Woman's Day, Inc. constitute a price discrimination to A&P in the guise of a payment for advertising or that A&P derives from these payments a benefit to its own business equal to that derived by Defendant Suppliers and can thus shift to Defendant Suppliers substantial portions of its own advertising costs.

18. Plaintiffs' objection to the admissibility in evidence of A&P Exhibit 25, the Shopping Survey, is overruled and the Shopping Survey is admitted in evidence.

Judgment

Accordingly let judgment enter for each and all of the defendants and this cause is hereby dismissed at plaintiff's costs.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. No. M 18-304. Filed June 27, 1957.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Grand Jury Investigation—Validity of Service of Subpoena Duces Tecum.—A subpoena duces tecum addressed to a British company and served upon one of its subsidiary companies in a certain judicial district in the United States in connection with a grand jury investigation of possible violations of antitrust laws through cartel activities in the radio-television industry was held to be properly served upon the British company when the British company held United States patents upon radio and television apparatus, exchanged the licensing rights of these patents with another American company, held 96.4% of the stock and had board members and officers in one large United States recording company, and held all of the preferred stock and the ordinary voting stock of and had officers and board members in the subsidiary company that was served. These two subsidiary companies were not mere distributors of the British company, but were reciprocating partners who recorded the same artists and promoted each other's labels. The United States subsidiary was a proper agent upon which to effect service.

Opinion

LAWRENCE WALSH, District Judge [In full text]: Electric & Musical Industries Ltd. moves to quash a subpoena directed to it and served upon its American subsidiary, Electric & Musical Industries (U. S.) Ltd. It claims that it is not within the jurisdiction of this Court because it is not present in this country. It further contends that E. M. I. (U. S.) is not its agent and that service upon E. M. I. therefore cannot be made through the officers of E. M. I. (U. S.). The motion is denied.

The subpoena was issued in aid of a current grand jury investigation of possible violations of the anti-trust laws through cartel activities in the radio-television industry.

Such a subpoena may run to any district in the United States. Clayton Act § 13, 38 Stat. 736, 15 U. S. C. § 23. Service must be made by delivering a copy thereof to the person named. Fed. R. Civ. P., Rule 45(c); Fed. R. Cr. P., Rule 17. In the absence of any rule to the contrary, service upon a corporation may be made by delivering a copy of the subpoena to an officer or a managing or general agent of the corporation named. See Fed. R. Civ. P., Rule 4(d). This agent may be an individual, a partnership, or another corporation. United States v. United States Alkali Export Association, Inc., (I. C. I. case), Civ. No. 24-464, S. D. N. Y., July 16, 1946 (Unreported opinion, p. 8); United States v. Watchmakers of Switzerland Inf. C., S.D.N.Y. [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,096], 133 F. Supp. 40, 46.

[Issues Defined]

Like other process issued pursuant to the anti-trust statutes, a subpoena may be served only in a district in which the person named is "found". Section 12 of the Clayton Act (38 Stat. 736; 15 U. S. C. § 22) provides:

> "Any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found or transacts business; and all process in such cases may be served in the district of which it is an inhabitant, or wherever it may be found".

Accordingly, the question is whether E. M. I.'s activities within this district are sufficient to sustain service here, and, if they are, whether E. M. I. (U. S.) Ltd. is a proper agent upon which to effect service.

E. M. I. is a British corporation. It has subsidiaries in twenty-four countries. It is a manufacturer of (1) gramophone records; (2) domestic electronics, including radio, television, gramaphones, household appliances, dictating and tape machines, relay and sound amplification equipment; and, (3) electronic capital equipment, that is, electronic equipment for industry and commerce, such as television transmitting equipment, electronic business machines, and other equipment used by aircraft and as aids to navigation.

[E. M. I. Activities in U. S. A.]

With respect to the United States, E. M. I's activities are as follows:

1. Radio and television patents. It holds United States patents upon apparatus for radio and television. It has granted to Radio Corporation of America a non-exclusive license and the right to grant non-exclusive licenses to others with respect to these United States patents in return for a similar grant by R. C. A. with respect to patents held by it outside the United States, Canada and Australia.

2. Gramophone records. E. M. I. is the largest producer of gramophone records in the world. As stated in its 1956 annual report, it is "strongly represented" in the United States by two subsidiaries: Capitol Records, Inc., and E. M. I. (U. S.) Ltd.

[E. M. I. Subsidiaries Described]

Capitol is a California corporation. It is one of the largest producers of records in the United States. In 1954 E. M. I. acquired 96.4% of its common stock. Three of its nine directors are now officers or directors of E. M. I. but there has been no change in its management.

The second United States subdisiary is E. M. I. (U. S.) Ltd., a New York corporation, which concentrates upon the classical field in which its sales have become the fourth largest in the United States. It was organized in 1953. It became the licensee of E. M. I.'s listings under the Columbia label, replacing Columbia Recording Corporation, another American corporation which had enjoyed this position in prior years.[1] Next year it is expected to gain similar rights with respect to E. M. I.'s other classical label, His Master's Voice, which since 1901 has been licensed to Victor (now RCA-Victor). The development of E. M. I. (U. S.) Ltd. was apparently part of a larger plan by which E. M. I. decided to depend upon its own sales organizations for the exploitation of the United States market, rather than upon its former contractual arrangements with RCA-Victor and Columbia.[2] It is apparently underset by a policy of sharpened competition with [1] From 1935 to 1954 this arrangement had been embodied in a contract between Columbia Recording Corporation and a wholly owned British subsidiary of E. M. I., Columbia Gramophone Company Limited.

[2] Its 1956 annual report states:

"Now I want to explain to you the reasons for the ending—after more than half a century of collaboration—of the matrix and artists exchange agreement between His Master's Voice and R. C. A. Victor.

"This step was the logical result of our experiences in the last three years, since the termination of a similar agreement we had with Columbia Records of America. As long as we were contractually tied to American sales organizations they had a free hand to publish or not to publish the vast wealth of our European catalougues. In 1953 we established E. M. I. (U. S.) Ltd. to sell our Columbia classical recordings in the U. S. A. In less than three years Angel—the trade mark under which we now sell the European Columbia catalogue in America—has made us one of the four leading classical record companies in America with an unrivalled reputation for the superior artistic and technical qualities of our records made with British producers, British technicians and pressed in our own Hayes factory.

"With our own powerful and enterprising sales organizations in America—Capitol and Angel—we shall, within a few months, be in a unique and unprecedented position properly and profitably to sell in the Americas the vast resources of Europe of which E. M. I. has the lion's share."

RCA-Victor which apparently has invaded the European field.[3]

E. M. I. (U. S.) Ltd. was organized pursuant to an agreement with a former independent record producer, Dario Soria, who became its president. E. M. I. financed the new company, holds all of its preferred stock and all of its voting ordinary stock. Soria has a twenty-five percent equity interest represented by non-voting stock which he must offer to E. M. I. before selling or encumbering. Of the five man board of directors, three are officers or directors of E. M. I.; two are Americans, including Soria. Soria states that he has in large part taken over his own pre-existing organization. His management of the American company is substantially without interference by the parent.

[E. M. I. Activities Support Service]

It is my conclusion that under the holding of United States v. Scophony Corp. [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,238], 333 U. S. 795, E. M. I.'s activities in this district are adequate to support the service of process.

[E. M. I. Course of Conduct]

Looking first to "the whole course of conduct" as urged by that opinion, it is apparent that E. M. I. is in world-wide conflict for supremacy in the field of musical recordings; that the United States is one of the most important world markets; that E. M. I. has two organizations here which it is using not as mere distributors which buy its products for resale but as reciprocating partners in this competition, partners who record both European and American artists and European and American music for distribution by E. M. I. abroad, as well as distribute E. M. I. listings here, and which are headed by men of aggressiveness, independence and prestige whose contribution to the E. M. I. organization goes beyond that of local distribution and includes the building up of a substantial part of the total E. M. I. repertoire, as well as counsel in the tactics of this competitive struggle. It was precisely this loyalty which E. M. I. was unable to develop under its former contractual arrangements notwithstanding their exclusivity and the express provisions emphasizing the personal quality of their joint undertakings and the duty to exchange information and promote each other's labels. It was precisely in order to secure the loyalty of Soria and Wallichs (President of Capitol) as its agents that E. M. I. in substance bought out their respective organizations. Once this agency is recognized, there is no doubt as to the continuity of the activity. E. M. I. (U. S.) Ltd. sells 1,250,000 records per year producing $3 million in revenue. Capitol's sales are over $25 million.

[Corporate Fiction]

Here, as in the Scophony case, E. M. I. relies upon the cases which hold that a manufacturing parent cannot be said to be present upon the basis of business done by a distributing subsidiary. Cannon v. Cudahy, 267 U. S. 333; People's Tobacco Co. v. Am. Tobacco Co., 246 U. S. 79 and the dictum in Eastman Co. v. Southern Photo Co., 273 U. S. 359. Although not overruled, these prece-

[3] Thus, the president of E. M. I. (U. S.) has reported to the chairman of E. M. I. (England):

"The future of E. M. I. (U. S.) Ltd., as a subsidiary of E. M. I. Ltd., is dependent on the development of its parent company. In appraising the future, two new elements have entered the picture.

"1) The world expansion of RCA Victor. RCA is now establishing its label beyond the western hemisphere and is encroaching on the European market.

"2) The expansion on this continent of E. M. I. Ltd. Through the recent acquisition of Capitol, E. M. I. Ltd. now has two companies in the United States, one specializing in the popular field, the other in the classical field. Through Capitol, E. M. I. Ltd. has also fortified its international position in the popular field.

"The purchase of Capitol relieves Angel of the obligation to promote popular music and artists from E. M. I.'s European labels. With the exception of a small catalogue on its Blue Label of 'light music from the Continent', folk music, and special 'snob' items, it is free to concentrate all its efforts on the development of Angel as a major classical label.

"With the bold growth of RCA Victor in the foreign field, it will be advisable and necessary for E. M. I. Ltd. to give new life to the traditional HMV label and to rebuild its catalogue, to the same strength as the Angel- Columbia catalogue. This will be a healthy and constructive move not only for the world market but for America where HMV has been languishing.

"When E. M. I. (U. S.) Ltd. was founded it was planned that if and when other E. M. I. Ltd. classical labels became free in this country, they would be transferred to Angel. With the coming expiration of the RCA-HMV contract, E. M. I. (U. S.) Ltd. envisages a magnificent and musically balanced future catalogue, drawn from European Columbia, HMV and Pathe, which will assure proper and equal promotion, sales and artist representation for each of the various elements concerned."

dents were limited to their facts by the holding in the Scophony case, 333 U. S. at p. 816. The court held that without reappraising their validity it was enough that they not be extended to defeat an anti-trust complaint against a foreign national. See 333 U. S. at p. 817. In other words, we may still indulge in a heavy-handed fiction of corporate personality to protect a parent corporation from service outside of a state in which it is active but there is a clear warning in Scophony that such a fiction is not to be used to protect the parent from being served at all, particiularly in a proceeding under the anti-trust laws.[4] The practical reality of these holdings should not be lost by laboring the fiction by which they were rationalized. The prevention of unfair forum-shopping in private litigation does not necessitate allowing a corporate veil to block a grand jury investigation into crime, particularly a violation of the anti-trust laws.

[Convenience To Stand Trial]

It would not be unfairly inconvenient to require the petitioner to stand trial in this district. See Latimer v. S/A Industrias Reunidas F. Matarazzo, 2 Cir., 175 F. 2d 184, 186, cert. den. 338 U. S. 867; Kilpatrick v. Texas & P. Ry. Co., 2 Cir., 166 F. 2d 788, 791, cert. den. 335 U. S. 814; Hutchinson v. Chase & Gilbert, 2 Cir., 45 F. 2d 139. And there will, of course, be no need for a trial if the petitioner produces the records which the grand jury requests.

No question was raised in this motion as to the scope of the subpoena.

[Motion to Quash Denied]

The motion is denied.

It is so ordered.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Grand Jury Proceedings—Return of Subpoenaed Records.—When a court allowed Government attorneys to remove documents produced pursuant to a grand jury's subpoena duces tecum, a witness's motion to require that the documents be used by Government counsel in the instant proceeding only and be returned to the grand jury or the witness "with all copies" was denied. If books and papers coming to the knowledge of the Government attorneys in a grand jury investigation develop a demand, and an adequacy of proof, for resort to civil litigation in the public interest, it is both proper and incumbent upon them to use the information in their hands for that purpose. Reliance must be placed in the honesty of the officers of the Department of Justice to retain all such information for the sovereign and not for private competitors.

Memorandum of the Court on Motion to Amend Receipt for Papers Subpoenaed

ALBERT V. BRYAN, District Judge [In full text]: For convenience in the study of the books and papers produced by the witnesses appearing before the grand jury, the court has allowed the Government Attorneys to remove this evidence to their offices in the Department of Justice, just across the Potomac in Washington. But it exacts of them a receipt for each document withdrawn. The receipt binds the attorney, as an officer of the court, to return the evidence to the Clerk, meanwhile to keep it from the public eye and separated from the records of other witnesses or companies.

[4] Anderson v. British Overseas Airways Corp., S. D. N. Y., 144 F. Supp. 543; State Street Trust Co. v. British Overseas Airways Corp., S. D. N. Y., 144 F. Supp. 241 and Lane v. Maple Leaf Milling Co., S. D. N. Y., 87 F. Supp. 741 may be in conflict with these views but they need not be considered because none of them purports to interpret section 12 of the Clayton Act.

[Motion of Witness]

Full ready to tender all the papers described in the grand jury's subpoena duces tecum, the Standard Oil Company of Texas, however, moves the court to straighten the receipt by adding the stipulation that, "unless otherwise directed by the court", the documents shall be used by Government counsel "in this proceeding only" and be returned to the grand jury or the witness "with all copies". The Government demurs to this restriction in the use of the papers as well as to the requirement for surrender of the copies. It recognizes, of course, its obligations to return the originals of the books and papers.

[Use of Documents Feared]

Obviously, the motion springs from the Company's fear lest the documents, or the information contained in them, be used by the Government for a purpose different from that for which they were subpoenaed. The Company further urges, in its concern, that access to the documents during the Government's custody be limited to those attorneys authorized by the warrant of the Attorney General to appear before the grand jury. The public interest would always be safeguarded, Standard maintains, by the suggested reservation in the receipt of the right to the Government, at any time or times, to ask from the court a different direction in respect to the evidence. Such directions could, presumably, include the impounding of the documents, together with all copies, while the court considered the legality of the requested use.

Without reflection, the possibility of the Government's devotion of the documents to another use affronts the sense of fair play. It implies an abuse of process. But, studied, the diversion proves to be altogether correct, legally and ethically. In the study it must be remembered, always, that the books and papers necessarily have first been obtained without treading upon the Fourth or Fifth Amendment, or upon any other Constitutional protection. This is true because the evidence would not otherwise be before the grand jury.

[Motion Unsound]

The present motion is unsound because it ignores realities. Suppose inspection of the documents in a given case should expose the commission of a criminal offense; or suppose the revelation should unearth a criminal scheme; and suppose the committed or the planned offense to be wholly foreign to the object for which the records have been requisitioned. Is the Government attorney to close his eyes to the disclosure or forswear his duty to enforce the law? To obtain the consent of the court before acting would, by delay or signal, thwart apprehension or prosecution of the accused.

[Use of Documents]

Akin is the anticipated use by the Government of the documents, or the knowledge derived from them, in a civil action should the grand jury not indict. A civil suit predicated on antitrust or similar legislation, when brought by the Government, is in fact and in law a prosecution. Its aim is not compensation but correction. The obligation of the Justice Department to invoke civil remedies in an appropriate situation is just as bounden as its duty to institute requisite criminal proceedings. Consequently, if books and papers coming to the knowledge of the Government's attorneys in a grand jury investigation develop a demand, and an adequacy of proof, for resort to civil litigation in the public interest, it is certainly proper, indeed incumbent upon them, to use for that purpose the information in their hands. This is nonetheless true though no process available in a civil action has the competency to discover this data beforehand.

[Copies of Documents]

Likewise impracticable is the position taken by Standard opposing the retention by the Department of copies of the papers produced. Indisputably, Government counsel would be entitled to make notes of the contents of the papers as they are produced in the grand jury room. If they can make notes, they can make extensive notes, and these might approach copies. Moreover, if notes or copies can be made in the grand jury room without impropriety, they can be made, under the surveillance of the court, in another room in the Federal building or in the not-distant offices of the Department. The surrender of all of this memoranda at the end of the grand jury's deliberations would hardly be practicable. Officializing their work sheets, the very requirement would injuriously hamper the Government attorneys in the investigation.

[Rights and Duties of Government Attorneys]

If the notes consisted only of copies of the papers, the copies might be collected and returned. But a covenant for the return even of the copies seems but a futile gesture. The attorneys would know the papers' content; their right and their duty would enjoin them to use that knowledge in the public interest. United States v. Wallace Co., 1949, 336 U. S. 793, 799. To hold that the Government may avail itself of the memory of its attorneys, but it cannot retain the same information in the form of copies of the papers, would be an absurdity.

The sovereign, not private competitors, retains the copies or the knowledge. It is preserved in the public interest. Against their improper use, as well as against an unjustified calling of a grand jury to educe the evidence, reliance must be placed in the honesty of the officers of the Department of Justice, with the right to seek the judgment of the court upon the validity of their acts. United States v. United States District Court [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,540], 1956, 238 F. 2d 713, 721. These are not slender reeds. Our entire system of government rests on the integrity of its officials, always with recourse to the courts for determination of any doubt in the propriety of their conduct.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. No. 360—October Term, 1956. Docket No. 24506. Argued June 11, 1957. Decided July 8, 1957.

Appeal from an order of the District Court for the Southern District of New York dismissing that part of the amended complaint which claimed damages alleged to have been caused before the date of a general release executed by the appellant. HERLANDS, Judge. Appeal dismissed.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Appeal and Error—Final Order.—An appeal from an order dismissing part of a claim for treble damages under the antitrust laws on the ground that the appellant had signed a valid and binding release releasing the appellees "from any and all claims of plaintiff accruing prior to February 4, 1954," was dismissed for want of jurisdiction on the ground that the order was neither final, and consequently appealable, nor appealable as an interlocutory order. The order merely dismissed part of the appellant's claim and left the remainder pending for trial in the district court.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9015.12.

For the appellants: Aaron E. Koota (Francis T. Anderson on the brief).

For the appellees: Simpson, Thacher & Bartlett (Albert C. Bickford, Whitney North Seymour, Jr., and William J. Manning of counsel), for all appellees except Columbia Pictures Corp. Schwartz & Frolich (Myles J. Lane and Bernard R. Sorkin of counsel) for Columbia Pictures Corp.

For prior opinions of the U. S. District Court, Southern District of New York, see 1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,307, 68,392, 68,515.

[Treble Damage Suit]

PER CURIAM [In full text]: This suit was brought to recover treble damages under the anti-trust laws.

[Order Appealed]

The appellees answered with a general denial and, in an amended answer, pleaded the affirmative defense of a general release which the appellant had executed and delivered to appellees, United Artists Corporation and Loew's Incorporated on February 5, 1954. The appellees then moved for a summary judgment which was denied without prejudice. After further proceedings, which need not be set forth, there was a hearing before Chief Judge Clancy, without a jury, to determine whether the release was executed because of a mutual mistake of fact, or any unilateral mistake by the appellant, or the fraud of any appellee. Judge Clancy found no mistake and no fraud. Judge Herlands then adopted such findings, held the release valid and binding upon the appellant, and that it released the appellees "from any and all claims of plaintiff accruing prior to February 5, 1954." He dismissed the complaint, with prejudice, insofar as damages were claimed for anything which was alleged to have occurred before February 5, 1954. This appeal is from that order.

[Order Not Appealable]

We cannot reach the merits for the order was neither final, and consequently appealable, nor appealable as an interlocutory order under § 1292 of Title 28 U. S. C. It is perfectly obvious that all the order did was to dismiss only part of the appellant's claim and to leave the remainder pending for trial in the district court. Baltimore Contractors v. Bodinger, 348 U. S. 176. Rule 54(b) F. R. C. P. was inapplicable, see Kam Koon v. E. E. Black Ltd., 9 Cir., 182 F. 2d 146, as the judge well knew since he was unwilling to make any determination or direct an entry of judgment pursuant to the provisions of that rule. So we have no jurisdiction. Kuly v. White Motor Co., 6 Cir., 174 F. 2d 742.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Necessary Averments To State Cause of Action—General Requirements.—A complaint by an operator of a drive-in theatre against certain motion picture producer-distributors and exhibitors, seeking treble damages under the antitrust laws, was stricken on the ground that it was not simple, concise, and direct within the requirements of Rule 8 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The complaint should have set out in reasonable detail the acts complained of, not the circumstances from which plaintiff drew its conclusion that violations of acts of Congress had occurred and that plaintiff had been damaged.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9009.170.

For the plaintiff: William Gold, New York, N. Y.

For the defendant: Benjamin Melniker for Loew's Inc., New York, N. Y.; Archie Weltman for Loew's Theatre & Realty Corp. (Joseph A. Macchia, of counsel), New York, N. Y.

[Motion To Strike Complaint]

RICHARD LEVET, District Judge [In full text]: This is a treble damage action under the anti-trust laws. The defendants move to strike the complaint in its entirety on the ground that it fails to comply with the requirements of Rule 8(a)(2) and Rule 8(e)(1) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and for certain alternative relief.

[Federal Rules of Civil Procedure]

Rule 8(a)(2) is as follows:

"(a) Claims for Relief. A pleading which sets forth a claim for relief, whether an original claim, counterclaim, cross-claim, or third-party claim, shall contain (1) a short and plain statement of the grounds upon which the court's jurisdiction depends, unless the court already has jurisdiction and the claim needs no new grounds of jurisdiction to support it, . . ."

Rule 8(e)(1) is as follows:

"(e) Pleading To Be Concise and Direct; Consistency.

"(1) Each averment of a pleading shall be simple, concise, and direct. No technical forms of pleading or motion are required."

[Plaintiff and Defendants Described]

Plaintiff, it is alleged, owns and operates the Woodbridge Drive-In Theatre in New Jersey. Defendants are Loew's Incorporated (a producer-distributor of motion pictures) and Loew's Theatre & Realty Corporation (an exhibitor of motion pictures). Certain distributors and exhibitors are named as co-conspirators, although not named as defendants.

[Unreasonable Clearances Claimed]

Stripped of verbiage, it appears that plaintiff claims that its theatre is not in substantial competition with theatres in downtown Newark, New Jersey; that the defendants, pursuant to agreements and arrangements with the co-conspirators, imposed unreasonable clearances upon plaintiff's theatre in favor of other threatres; and that plaintiff's request for earlier exhibition rights was denied because of unlawful agreements to maintain clearance.

[Allegations Attacked]

In addition, plaintiff makes the following allegations which the moving defendants seek to strike as an alternative to striking the entire complaint:

(1) A national conspiracy by the defendants and alleged co-conspirators to restrain and monopolize first run exhibition in the larger cities of the country. (Paragraph 5)

(2) Exclusion of independents from first run exhibition in said cities and allocation of pictures to the defendants and their alleged co-conspirators. (Paragraphs 6 and 11(c))

(3) The granting of unreasonable clearances, nationwide, to theatres (not limited to first run) formerly operated by the distributors. (Paragraph 8)

(4) Conclusions of law. (Par. 7(g))

(5) (a) Pooling agreements and joint interests throughout the United States formerly existing among the defendants and co-conspirators. (Paragraph 9(a))

(b) Continued relationships between the distributors and the divorced exhibitor companies. (Paragraph 9(b))

(c) References to the status of the divorcement proceedings between Loew's Incorporated and Loew's Theatre & Realty Company pursuant to the decree in United States v. Paramount. (Paragraphs 9(c), (d) and (e))

(d) References to ownership of theatres by the alleged co-conspirators RKO and Stanley Warner. (Paragraphs 11(b), (i), (iii))

(e) References to theatres situated between the Newark downtown theatres and plaintiff's theatre without regard to ownership. (Paragraph 12(b))

[Failure To Show Relevancy and Damages]

Paragraphs 5 and 6 allege a national conspiracy of the so-called "integrated distributors" with respect to so-called "first exhibitions." However, no allegation appears whereby the relevancy of these most general statements to the local situation is set forth, nor is there any allegation of damages to plaintiff as a result of the alleged nation-wide conspiracy.

[Time Extended]

Paragraph 9(a) goes far afield when it refers to "predecessors" of the "integrated distributors" and to "affiliates of both of them," thus extending the time backward in endless fashion.

[Remote References]

Paragraphs 9(b), 9(c), 9(d) and 9(e) again refer to formal corporate divorcement proceedings involving the "integrated distributors." Such references are most remotely connected with the present claims by plaintiff and should be eliminated.

[Ambiguous Statements]

Subdivisions (b)(i) and b(iii) of Paragraph 11 refer to theatres of "integrated distributors," some of which were "divested." Ambiguous statements are also set forth in Paragraph 11, such as "likewise owned and operated by integrated distributors and which still remain parts of their divorced circuits or which were of either of them, . . ." Paragraph 12(b), which refers to theatres "In the area of Newark and between said theatres in downtown Newark and plaintiff's theatre at Woodbridge," is equally vague, without identification of ownership or specification. The identification of theatres is made even more difficult by the usage of the words "some of which" in three separate clauses of a single sentence.

[Averments Not Simple, Concise, Nor Direct]

On the whole, the complaint is not in compliance with Rules 8(a)(2) and 8(e)(1). This statement is made with due consideration for the necessity of some detailing of facts in an anti-trust action. The averments are neither simple, concise nor direct. The allegations particularly referred to above have no relevance to the cause of action concerned. To such allegations, the defendants should not be required to plead.

[Dissertations on Economics]

Much of the remaining parts of the complaint consist of dissertations on the economics of the motion picture industry, the development of motion picture art and unnecessary historical commentary. For example: "It concerns the motion picture industry which involves a continuity of transactions consisting of [etc.]" (Paragraph 1(b)); "During the period of plaintiff's operation of the said theatre as aforesaid and for some time previous, [etc.]" (Paragraph 4(b)); "The motion picture is a relatively new art form recognized as an effective and universal medium for the diffusion of aesthetic, recreational and educational values [etc.]" (Paragraph 7(a)); "Over the years the defendants herein with and among the film distributors and the theatre operating subsidiaries of, and which were of, the largest of the said distributors, [etc.]" Paragraph 10(e)), etc. ad infinitum. Such prolixities and such complexities do not constitute sound pleading. The issues in an anti-trust action may be economic as well as legal, but counsel for the defendants are entitled to a short and plain statement of the claim in order to answer and to prepare to meet the issues presented. The purpose of Rule 8(a)(2) is to avoid verbose allegations; to notify the defendants of the claim upon which plaintiff seeks recovery; to assist and not deter the disposition of litigation on its meries to achieve brevity and clarity in pleading and to shape the issues for trial.

[Acts Complained of To Be Set Out]

It is necessary in an anti-trust action for treble damages to set out in reasonable detail the acts complained of, not the circumstances from which plaintiff draws its conclusions that violations of acts of Congress have occurred and that plaintiff had been damaged. A nation-wide conspiracy may be alleged only if plaintiff is properly alleged to be affected thereby and damages therefrom to this plaintiff are alleged. New Dyckman Theatre Corp. v. Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation, D. C. S. D. N. Y., 1954 [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,853], 16 F. R. D. 203; Metropolitan Theatre Co. v. Warner Bros. Pictures, D. C. S. D. N. Y., 1952, [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,304], 12 F. R. D. 516; Brownlee v. Malco Theatres, D. C. W. D. Ark., 1951 [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,911], 99 F. Supp. 312. A direction to make a more definite statement (Rule 12(e)) in this instance would merely compound the present complexity.

[Complaint Stricken with Leave To Amend]

Accordingly, the complaint is stricken with leave to plaintiffs within twenty days to file an amended pleading which contains simple, concise and distinct averments in conformity with Rule 8 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The amended complaint should avoid the infirmities of the present complaint herein referred to. Defendants shall file answers or move with respect to the amended complaint within ten days after service thereof.

[Motion]

JUERGENS, District Judge [In full text]: On March 17, 1954, certain defendants propounded a series of 72 interrogatories to the plaintiffs. On March 22, 1957, the plaintiffs filed their answer to the interrogatories so propounded. On April 1, 1957, the defendants filed their motion to compel the plaintiffs to make further answer to certain interrogatories designated in said motion. No objections have been filed by the plaintiffs to the motion of the defendants to compel the plaintiffs to make further answer to the interrogatories described in said motion. At the time of the hearing on the motion to compel plaintiffs to make further answer to the interrogatories the plaintiffs agreed that they would file further answers to interrogatories 24, 69, 70, and 71; therefore, the motion as pertaining to those interrogatories will not be considered by the court.

As to interrogatories 12a and 23, the defendants withdraw their motion to plaintiffs to make further answer.

[Objection to Interrogatories]

As to the remaining interrogatories, namely, interrogatories 4, 8, 11, 22, 22a, 30, 38, 39, 44, 49, 50, and 60, the plaintiffs orally objected because depositions were taken and the information sought to be elicited by the interrogatories could have been interrogated about at the time that the depositions were taken, also that the answers to the interrogatories with which the motion is concerned lie within the knowledge of the defendants as well as the plaintiffs and, therefore, the plaintiffs should not be required to answer same.

[Federal Rules of Civil Procedure]

The authority for propounding interrogatories and insisting on answers thereto being made is founded on Rule 33 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. In Bowles v. Safeway Stores, 4 F. R. D., 469, the court said,

> "It is no objection to interrogatories propounded under Rule 33 that the information sought is within the knowledge of the interrogating party. The purpose of interrogatories, under Rule 33, is to obtain admissions from the adversary, thereby limiting matters in dispute to avoid unnecessary attendance of witnesses and waste of time of the parties and the court. The intent of said rule is that both parties have the same information, why compel formal proof to be made of things within their joint knowledge."

Rule 33 should be given a liberal and broad interpretation by the courts and under the several holdings it has been held and determined that the mere fact that the party propounding the interrogatories may have the answers within his own bosom, that that is no valid reason for not requiring the party to whom the interrogatories are propounded to answer same. The propounding of interrogatories serves two separate and distinct purposes: (1) to ascertain facts, and (2) to narrow the issues. The court does not deem it necessary to go into a lengthy discussion as to these two purposes. In Onofrio v. American Beauty Macaroni Co., 11 F. R. D. 181, the court said,

> "The prevailing general opinion seems to be that under the present rule the interrogator may seek facts relating to his adversary's case and is not limited to facts exclusively or peculiarly within the knowledge of the opponent. This is true even where the interrogator has at its disposal an adequate or even better source of information. In 7 F. R. D. 250, 'Although the interrogator may have the better source of information, it is not unfair to require that his opponent answer the interrogatories in question to the best of his ability so that the questions of fact may be reduced to a minimum before trial.'"

In Moore's Federal Practice, Volume 4 (2nd Edition), at page 2269, the following appears:

> "Under Equity Rule 58 it was the practice to obtain by proper interrogatories admissions by the adverse party of the possession, custody, or control of relevant documents before making his motion to the court for an order for their production for discovery purposes. Not only may such admissions be obtained by interrogatories under Federal Rule 33, but further disclosure, which some courts formerly might have regarded as a 'fishing expedition' under Equity Rule 58, may be sought, namely, disclosure of 'the existence, description, nature, custody, conditions, and location of any books, documents, or other tangible things' relevant to the subject matter involved in the pending action."

[Motion Granted]

Without going into detail as to each interrogatory, the court is using interrogatory 4 as an example. The answer to interrogatory 4 is as follows:

> "Plaintiffs know the location of the documents referred to in interrogatory 3, and have same, except for such of said documents as may have been destroyed by fire, which occurred at the Annex Theatre Building in August of 1955."

The answer is not complete and does not give a minimum answer to the interrogatory propounded and does not advise the defendants which of the documents are still in existence and which of the documents have been destroyed by the fire which occurred at the Annex Theatre Building in August, 1955. The above serves as an example of the answers to the interrogatories with which the motion is concerned, and the court is of the opinion that the interrogatories concerned in the motion should be answered by the plaintiffs and they are so ordered to answer same.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages and Injunctive Relief—Pretrial Procedures—Interrogatories.—Interrogatories with respect to first run theatres were objectionable, since it was not shown how such information was relevant. Certain interrogatories seeking information as to activities of defendants for a period of more than twenty years were unreasonably oppressive, and other interrogatories referring to "affiliated" or "allied" corporations were improper since ambiguous. Interrogatories requesting information obtainable from available documents were oppressive since such documents could be secured and the information compiled from them.

[Motion to Strike]

LEVET, District Judge [In full text]: Each of the defendants herein has moved for an order in accordance with Rule 33 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure striking all or part of the interrogatories propounded by plaintiffs to the respective defendants.

[Allegations of Complaint]

This is an action instituted pursuant to the Sherman, Clayton and Robinson-Patman Acts, 15 USCA §§ 1-27, for treble damages. The plaintiffs are the owners and operators of the Marlowe Theatre in Buffalo, New York, and the defendants are motion picture distributors or exhibitors, or both. The complaint alleges that the defendants have conspired with "affiliated exhibitors, large unaffiliated circuits, and locally favored exhibitors, to monopolize motion picture exhibition in the various localities in the United States including Buffalo. . . ."

Although during his examination before trial the plaintiff, Mieczyslaw M. Konczakowski, acknowledged that his grievance concerned the relative playing positions between his Marlowe Theatre and those of his competitor, the Niagara Theatre, the complaint states in broad terms that the plaintiffs are the victims of the local impact of a national conspiracy. The substance of the plaintiffs' allegations appears to be found in subdivisions (c) and (d) of paragraph 18, and in paragraph 19 of the complaint, which read as follows:

"(c) Pursuant to and in furtherance of such unlawful monopoly and conspiracy, the defendant distributors, acting illegally in concert and in combination with and for the benefit of the defendant affiliated exhibitors, unlawfully discriminated and conspired against plaintiffs by illegally usurping from plaintiffs' Marlowe Theatre in or about the year 1939 its long-established run of motion pictures and by granting said run to said Niagara Theatre and by unlawfully withholding from said Marlowe Theatre the right to exhibit motion pictures until long after they had been exhibited in downtown Buffalo first run and move-over theatres and in said Niagara Theatre.

"(d) Pursuant to and in furtherance of such unlawful monopoly and conspiracy, the defendant distributors and exhibitor defendants unlawfully discriminated and conspired against plaintiffs by engaging in monopolistic practices favorable to the exhibitor defendants and detrimental and injurious to plaintiffs relating to or concerning film rentals; maintenance of minimum admission prices; advertising allowances; deduction in film rentals on playing of double features; deduction in film rentals for extra expense incurred for patronage stimulants; granting of move-overs including the creation of a move-over run granted to the exhibitor defendants' Teck Theatre in downtown Buffalo; permitting extended runs and day and date runs; selection and rejection of films theretofore contracted for; tie-in sales (block booking); road show and so-called pre-release showings and privileges; requirements respecting playing of foreign produced pictures; playing of pictures on preferred play dates; overage and underages (i. e. permitting commitments for one theatre to be worked off in other theatres of the defendant exhibitors or their affiliates); playing of pictures out of order of release; bidding for pictures; checking box office receipts and auditing books; determining 'split figures' (allowance for theatre operation expense on percentage rental pictures); guaranteed minimum film rentals; joint advertising campaigns; rebates, discounts or allowances as to film rentals and advertising and other elements of exhibition expense.

"19. The distributor defendants and the exhibitor defendants combined, conspired and agreed to exclude arbitrarily the Marlowe Theatre from the motion picture benefits to which it was clearly entitled by reason of its history, appointments, size, location, management and other relevant factors, and to award unjust and unlawful benefits to said Niagara Theatre and the Buffalo first run downtown and move-over and neighborhood first run theatres operated, managed or controlled by the exhibitor defendants. . . ."

[Clearances Not in Issue]

That the motion picture industry may establish successive runs or exhibitions of a feature in a given area, or prescribe the clearance or period of time which must elapse between runs of the same feature within a particular area or in specified theatres, is not now open to question. It has been judicially declared that "[T]he nature of the product with which motion picture distributors and exhibitors deal is such as to require the regulation of the manner of exhibition. . . . So preference must be given to certain theatres. And to make such preference effective, the exhibition of pictures at other theatres must be limited to a lapsed period after exhibition of the picture at first-run theatres." Fanchon & Marco v. Paramount Pictures [1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,909], D. C. S. D. Cal., 1951, 100 F. Supp. 84, 89, affirmed [1954 Trade Cases ¶ 67,843] 9 Cir., 1954, 215 F. 2d 167, cert. denied 348 U. S. 912. It is the manner in which the defendants regulated and awarded successive runs and clearances of films to the alleged detriment of plaintiffs' Marlowe Theatre in Buffalo upon which this action is bottomed. Mr. Konczakowski has testified that what the plaintiffs want for their Marlowe Theatre is a run after the Victoria Theatre and that when the Niagara Theatre came into existence on or about July 10, 1940, it was awarded a run following the Victoria run with clearance over the Marlowe. Mr. Konczakowski also said that since the Marlowe was an established theatre when the Niagara Theatre came into existence, it was his belief that "the established theatre should have a clearance over a new theatre."

[Salient Rules as to Interrogatories]

Before considering the specific interrogatories addressed to each defendant to which objections have been raised, it is appropriate to note certain salient rules which are applicable to some of the interrogatories propounded herein.

Where a complaint in an anti-trust action by a theatre owner against motion picture producers and distributors alleges that certain conduct in a designated area was part of a national conspiracy, the plaintiff may obtain answers to interrogatories concerning the size of the defendants, the amount of their business and the degree of integration between them, and these interrogatories need not be restricted to purely local matters. Burroughs v. Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc. [1952 Trade Cases ¶ 67,339], D. C. Mass., 1952, 12 F. R. D. 491. However, where the interrogatories seek information concerning the national or local activities of the producers and distributors which do not affect the plaintiff theatre owner, such interrogatories are irrelevant and improper. Thus, it was held in T. C. Theatre Corp. v. Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc. [1954 Trade Cases ¶ 67,761], D. C. S. D. N. Y., 1954, Fed. Rules Serv. 33.321, Case 4, that in an anti-trust suit involving a conspiracy to deprive plaintiff's theatre of second run films, inquiries into the affairs and transactions of defendants' first run theatres in the community were not relevant and, moreover, where the inquiries were on a nationwide scale, they were clearly irrelevant. The plaintiffs have not shown how information concerning first run theatres in Buffalo is relevant. Indeed, Mr. Konczakowski indicated during his examination that he was not interested in theatres in Buffalo such as the Victoria and the Elmwood because these theatres enjoyed runs which were senior to his Marlowe and were, therefore, "no opposition." Since plaintiffs do not claim that they are entitled to a first run in said city, the defendants' objections to interrogatories with respect to first run theatres are sustained. See Vilastor Kent Theatre Corp. v. Brandt [1955 Trade Cases ¶ 68,102], D. C. S. D. N. Y., 1955, 18 F. R. D. 199; Ball v. Paramount Pictures [1944-1945 Trade Cases ¶ 57,311], D. C. W. D. Pa., 1944, 4 F. R. D. 195.

[Available Documents]

With regard to those interrogatories which request information and data obtainable from available documents, the general rule is that a party should not be permitted to compel his opponent to make compilations or perform research and investigations with respect to statistical information which he might make for himself by obtaining the production of the books and documents pursuant to Rule 34 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, or by doing a little footwork, as the case may be. Leonia Amusement Corp. v. Loew's Inc. [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,134], D. C. S. D. N. Y., 1955, 21 Fed. Rules Serv. 33.321, Case 4; Pappas v. Loew's Inc. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,432], D. C. Pa., 1953, 13 F. R. D. 471; Tivoli Realty Inc. v. Paramount Pictures [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,598], D. C. Del., 1950, 10 F. R. D. 201; Cinema Amusements Inc. v. Loew's [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,622], D. C. Del., 1947, 7 F. R. D. 318; Byers Theatres, Inc. v. Murphy, D. C. W. D. Va., 1940, 1 F. R. D. 286. Accordingly, interrogatories which ask for the distances between forty named theatres in Buffalo or which seek a list of titles of all motion pictures produced or distributed by distributor defendants and which were exhibited in twelve named theatres during a period of approximately twenty years, are oppressive. If relevant, this information can be compiled by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs can acquire the list of motion picture titles by obtaining the production of books and records, under Rule 34, which contain this information and by compiling the list of titles themselves. However, defendants may, if they wish, give plaintiffs a list of these titles rather than producing books and records for this purpose. See Cinema Amusements Inc. v. Loew's, supra.

[Ambiguous Interrogatories]

Some of the interrogatories contain ambiguous language in that they refer to "affiliated" or "allied" corporations. Words of such character are improper. See Leonia Amusement Corp. v. Loew's Inc., supra; Savannah Theatre Co. v. Lucas & Jenkins, D. C. Ga., 1943, 10 F. R. D. 461. Furthermore, interrogatories addressed to corporations which seek a list of agreements to which they or "any of their subsidiary, affiliated or allied corporations" were parties are objectionable because a corporation cannot be charged with knowledge of the acts of its subsidiaries where they are not in effect its agents. See Stanzler v. Loew's Theatre and Realty Corporation [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,439], D. C. R. I., 1955, 19 F. R. D. 286; Savannah Theatre Co. v. Lucas & Jenkins, supra.

[Oppressive Interrogatories]

The defendants also object to certain interrogatories on the ground that the information sought relates to activities of the defendants for a period of more than twenty years. Objection to interrogatories of this character was sustained in Stanzler v. Loew's Theatre and Realty Corporation, supra, where the court said at page 288 as follows:

> ". . . Although it is true that in actions of this sort a certain amount of freedom should be permitted in the discovery of data of an historic nature and although at a trial on the merits it may well be that evidence of defendants' activities twenty or more years prior to institution of suit will be admitted, it is the opinion of this Court that to compel a defendant to produce prior to trial a great bulk of such information under the usual penalties for failure to obey a court order would be unreasonably oppressive and not within the scope of permissible discovery under Rule 33. To the extent that it is not unreasonable and oppressive, it is permissible and proper to compel answers concerning defendants' activities for some period beyond the statutory period of limitations but such period cannot be extended indefinitely . . . ."

As to the objections of the Paramount defendants and defendants American Broadcasting-Paramount Theatres, Inc. and Buffalo Paramount to all interrogatories which seek to elicit information for any period prior to December 30, 1949, on the ground that all claims which accrued against them prior to said date were dismissed, said objections are sustained. The interrogatories addressed to the other defendants which seek information prior to July 10, 1940, the time when the Niagara Theatre came into existence and allegedly usurped the run of plaintiffs' Marlowe Theatre, are objectionable in that they attempt to uncover evidence of all of the wrongdoings of the motion picture industry for the last twenty-two years without any relevance to the basic issues in this case.

[Specific Interrogatories]

There remains for consideration the defendants' objections to specific interrogatories. These objections are disposed of as follows:

Paramount Pictures Inc., Paramount Film Distributing Corporation and Paramount Pictures Corporation

The following interrogatories are to be limited to information subsequent to December 30, 1949: First through Fifteenth and Forty-First through Forty-Sixth.

The objections to interrogatories Tenth, Thirteenth and Fourteenth, in so far as they relate to "subsidiary, affiliated or allied corporations," are sustained.

The objection to the request for copies of documents contained in interrogatory Tenth is sustained without prejudice to plaintiffs' obtaining these documents under Rule 34 upon a showing of good cause.

Objections to interrogatories Eleventh, Fourteenth and Fifteenth, in so far as they relate to "subsidiary, affiliated or allied corporations," are sustained.

The objections to the following interrogatories are sustained in that they seek to elicit the names and addresses of patrons of the Niagara and Elmwood Theatres: Thirty-Fourth through Thirty-Sixth.

Interrogatory Fifth, which seeks the degree of competition between the Marlowe Theatre and defendants' theatres in Buffalo and which also asks for the facts and factors which are determinative of said degree, is improper in that it calls for a conclusion based upon defendants' opinion. The objection to this interrogatory is sustained.

Objections to the following interrogatories, to the extent that they seek to elicit answers from corporations not parties to this action, or which are ambiguous in that they refer to "affiliated or allied corporations," are sustained: Eleventh through Fifteenth and Forty-Second.

The objections to interrogatories Tenth through Fourteenth, Sixteenth, Twentieth and Twenty-First, to the extent that they seek to elicit answers from corporations not parties to this action, or which are ambiguous in that they refer to "subsidiary, affiliated or allied corporations," are sustained.

The objection to interrogatory Tenth, to the extent that it calls for copies of documents, is sustained without prejudice to plaintiffs' obtaining these documents under Rule 34 upon a showing of good cause.

Loew's Incorporated

The following interrogatories are to be limited to information subsequent to July 10, 1940. First through Twelfth and Forty-Sixth.

Objections to the following interrogatories seeking detailed information as to the Buffalo, Paramount, Hippodrome, Great Lakes, Center, Teck, Elmwood, North Park, Allendale or Victoria Theatres are sustained: First, Second, Third, Fifth, Seventh, Eighth and Ninth.

The objection to interrogatory Twelfth, in that it seeks irrelevant information beyond the Buffalo area, is sustained.

The objection to interrogatory Sixth, in that it seeks the release dates of motion pictures for a period of over twenty years, both nationally and locally, is sustained.

The objection to the request for copies of documents contained in interrogatory Tenth is sustained without prejudice to plaintiffs' obtaining these documents under Rule 34 upon a showing of good cause.

The objections to interrogatories Tenth, Eleventh, Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Forty-Fifth, to the extent that they seek to elicit answers from corporations not parties to this action, or which are ambiguous in that they refer to "subsidiary, affiliated or allied corporations," are sustained.

As to All the Defendants Herein

All objections to interrogatories which have not been specifically sustained, as indicated above, are overruled.

So ordered.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Antitrust Law Violations Charged as Counterclaims—Right to Trial by Jury.—The defendant in a trade-mark infringement case, who alleged by way of answer and also by way of counterclaim that plaintiff had violated the antitrust laws, was denied a writ of mandamus to require the trial court to try the counterclaim by jury trial either before or simultaneously with the trial of the complaint and answer, which the court had determined to try separately, sitting without a jury. A dissenting opinion held that the effect of the decision was to deprive the defendant of his right to jury trial which had been timely demanded.

JAMES ALGER FEE, Circuit Judge [In full text]: An application for leave to file petition for writ of mandate has been lodged with Clerk of this Court. It sets up that a civil complaint was filed on May 7, 1956, in the United States District Court for the Southern District of California, Central Division, entitled G. D. Searle & Co., a corporation, plaintiff, v. Institutional Drug Distributors, Inc., a California corporation, et al., No. 19884-Y. There are three causes of action therein. One cause alleged infringement and the other two unfair competition. The relief sought is injunction pendente lite, and thereafter permanently, and accounting for profits and damages suffered by plaintiff as a result thereof. Petitioner filed an answer, which contains a general denial and a separate defense that Searle had used the alleged trademark in violation of the anti-trust laws and alleges by reason thereof Searle was in court with unclean hands. A defense that no claim is set forth in the complaint upon which any relief can be granted is also included.

[Counterclaim]

A counterclaim by Institutional against Searle is also set forth separately in the same answer. Stephen Chase, Lewis S. Hoyt and Julius K. Holbein were also named therein as third party defendants. The relief asked is that Searle and the third party defendants be enjoined from engaging in acts of conspiracy, boycott, monopoly and other acts in alleged violation of the anti-trust acts of the United States, that the complaint be dismissed, that the alleged trademark sued on by Searle be held to be descriptive and not a valid trademark, that the third party defendants be summoned and required to present any defenses they may have to the counterclaim, that Searle be adjudged to have used the alleged trademark in violation of the anti-trust laws so that the mark will be unenforceable against Institutional, that the trademark be ordered cancelled by the Commissioner of Patents and stricken from the Federal Register of Trademarks, that the court deny Searle all relief on the ground of unclean hands, "in view of its unconscionable conduct in entering into agreements with its distributors requiring said distributors to submit noncompetitive and sham bids to public bodies and institutions." There is also a prayer that defendant have judgment under its counterclaim for $100,000.00, trebled to $300,000.00, and reasonable attorney fees. There is a further prayer that the court grant "such other relief as to it seems just and proper."

[Jury Demand]

A demand for jury trial was filed by Institutional on the counterclaim as to Searle and the third party defendants.

The petition alleges no date as to the filing of the answer and counterclaim. There is no allegation that the third party defendants were served or filed answers to the counterclaim. There is an allegation that subsequently (no date given) the trial court "entered an injunction pendente lite against petitioner." We may infer from the blank text of the order attached that this action was taken in 1956. Again it is alleged that "subsequently, the court below set the entire action down for trial on April 23, 1957." When this action was taken the petition does not advise us.

[Trial Without Jury]

It is then alleged that on April 16, 1957, the trial judge in open court, on his own motion and over objection of petitioner, "made an order directing that the trial of the complaint and answer," including the defense of "unclean hands" by reason of claimed violations by Searle of the anti-trust laws but excluding trial of the counterclaim against Searle and the third party defendants, be held commencing April 23, 1957, before the District Judge sitting without a jury, and that the trial of and determination of these issues be made by the District Court before any trial by jury of the issues raised by the counterclaim.

The petition alleges such action deprives Institutional of a right to trial by jury on the counterclaim and that the order is without jurisdiction of the District Court.

This application to file the petition came on for hearing before this Court on April 23, 1957, the day which had been set for trial. The District Court postponed the hearing for one day to give this Court opportunity to act. There was a motion before this Court by Institutional that the District Court delay the trial further so this Court might advise of the matter. No one appeared for petitioner. There was an appearance for Searle.

The Court from the bench, one judge dissenting, ordered that a motion for further delay of the trial be denied.

[Claims Separated]

The reasons for this order, although not announced at the time, were obvious. First, the trial court had plenary power under the Civil Rules to take such action. For convenience, the "separate trial of any claim, cross-claim, counter-claim or third-party claim or of any separate issue" may be ordered by the trial court. Rule 42(b), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. See also Rule 13(i). These rules are of the same force as any other. Second, the motion to postpone was presented to this Court on the morning that the trial was to proceed in the District Court. If counsel had only been advised of the intention of that court at the beginning of the trial or the day before, more consideration might have been given. An appellate court should not embarrass a trial court by preventing or intervening in the trial of a case already in progress or on the threshold. Third, there is some evidence that the parties and the court have been proceeding for a considerable period of time on the theory that equity had jurisdiction of the complaint and the defense of unclean hands because of violation of the anti-trust laws. The record shows that an injunction pendente lite was issued some considerable time ago and the whole case set for trial. Some of the issues were unquestionably already adjudicated, at least preliminary, and an equitable remedy granted.

The order denying the motion for a temporary stay was correct.

The question of whether this Court should allow the application for permission to file petition for writ of mandamus is next considered. This application might well be denied on the same grounds set out above.

[Issue of Jury]

The sole relief asked is that the trial court be required to try certain legal issues by jury either before or simultaneously with the trial of other issues by the judge.

This Court has insistently protected the right of trial by jury, guaranteed by the Federal Constitution "in Suits at common law where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars." We have prevented courts from trying factual issues in a law action after withdrawing them from a jury.[1] Summary judgments have been set aside where factual issues which might have been tried to a jury were involved.[2] Waivers of the right by failure to file demand have been scrutinized here.[3] Where the case is essentially one at law, this Court has approved trial of legal issues where the complaint had asked for a declaratory judgment.[4] Nor has the position of this Court now changed. In these times, trial by jury is essential to preserve our system of government.

Nor do we raise the question of power.

[Equity Jurisdiction]

However, as we have heretofore pointed out, the right of trial by jury was limited to actions at common law at the time of the adoption of the Constitution.[5] Equity was a flourishing system at that period. The boundary between the systems was defined with some clarity. A jury trial was not accorded as of right by the Chancellor. There were two fields of equitable jurisdiction. There was the exclusive jurisdiction. There was also the field of concurrent jurisdiction with law. In the latter, if the court of equity first took jurisdiction, complete relief there could be afforded even though issues were decided upon which the common law gave a remedy which the Chancellor had determined was inadequate. In either field, incidental relief in damages might be afforded.[6]

It is not on every complaint now filed that a jury trial is accorded, even if there are issues normally triable at law and even if there is the requisite demand therefor. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure did not change these principles, but affirmed them, since specific reference is made to the Seventh Amendment.[7] A law action may be pleaded in the same complaint as a suit in equity. But, if the whole matter fall within the limits of equity jurisdiction, even separate statement and timely demand will not suffice. It is obvious also that, although an independent counterclaim can be and often must be pleaded under the Rules, it does not change the limits of equity jurisdiction.

It would be improper for this Court, at this stage of the litigation, to pass upon the complaint or the counterclaim. Suffice it to say that neither clearly states an action at common law. It is true, a portion of the prayer for relief in the counterclaim sets up a claim for damages which might have been the subject of an action at law, and appropriate allegations of damage appear in the body thereof. Most of the prayers seem to sound in equity. Another consideration is that this Court has not the record of the proceedings in the District Court. Therefore, the District Court must not be trammeled by premature expressions on our part. If a mistake be made, there are methods of correction, which are no more expensive than retrials, which this Court has been compelled to order in other cases. The District Court has the full record before it and must determine whether Institutional was ever entitled to a jury trial and whether that right, if any, has been waived or still exists. As the record appears, the right of Institutional, if any, has not been formally denied. Perhaps it may only be held in abeyance. Equity had power to enjoin a trial even in a separate tribunal of common law, under certain circumstances, until the issues cognizable in chancery had first been determined.

Nothing in the record shows what the course of the trial judge may be. It is in his power to grant a jury trial sometime in the future,[8] or perhaps even before the equitable issues are determined.[9] In any event, the rule gives the trial judge discretion.[10] In case of appeal from the final judgment, this Court may be required to determine whether that discretion has been abused, if the complete record shows on appeal that a constitutional right of jury trial has been denied. The argument that petitioner had only a week to take action after the trial judge had decided to try the equitable issues is of no avail. This Court should not interdict a trial unless it is demonstrated that a right of petitioner has been infringed. We are bound to assume that the trial court is proceeding properly. There has been no showing to this Court that, if it be assumed Institutional had a right, appeal from the final judgment or some other course would be a clearly inadequate remedy.

As it is, we are haunted by the specter of multiple appeals to this Court.[11] That is indeed an evil. To avoid such appeals in this and other cases, no action should be now taken.

The application to file a petition for writ of mandamus is denied.

diction being with this Court. (U. S. Alkali Export Ass'n v. United States [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,372], 325 U. S. 196, 204), I do not believe the petition should be denied.

The issue involved is petitioner's right to a trial by jury, for which timely demand was made, on an issue of fact. It is settled that an action for damages for an Antitrust violation is one at law. Weeks v. Bareco Oil Co., 7 Cir. [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,173], 125 F. 2d 84. The majority opinion would deprive the counter-claimant of his jury trial. When the issue is once tried by the court, it has become moot, and the law of the case is fixed. An appeal, or appeals, may be available to petitioner, but they might well be "a clearly inadequate remedy," as is suggested by Judge Biggs in the first case cited below.

I would prefer to follow the path suggested, under very similar circumstances, in the case of Canister Co., et al. v. Leahy, 3 Cir., 191 F. 2d 255 (1951), Cert. Den. 342 U. S. 893, 72 S. Ct. 201.

And as to the procedure suggested, see: Webster v. Kalodner, 3 Cir., 145 F. 2d 316 (1947); Paramount v. Rodney, 3 Cir. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,736], 186 F. 2d 111, Cert. Den. 340 U. S. 953, 71 S. Ct. 572 (1950).

The majority seem troubled by the alleged deficiencies in the record. We have before us the pleadings. They are enough. (Schaefer v. Gunzberg, decided April 26, 1957).

Next the majority finds fault in the presentation of this motion on the morning that the trial was scheduled to begin in the District Court. The District Court's Order severing the counterclaim was made on April 16, 1957. Until that time petitioner had no way of knowing that he would not be afforded full protection of his constitutional rights. Thereafter, it prepared the instant petition with diligence and argued it before this Court exactly one week to the day after the trial court had made its order. Under these circumstances I do not see how the moving party can be criticized for delay.

Of course the District Court has power under Rule 42(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure to order the separate trial of any claim, or counterclaim, or any separate issue. But it cannot do so in such a manner as to deprive a litigant of a constitutional right, which to all practical purposes is here accomplished.

No constitutional rights could be prejudiced were there here to be a simultaneous trial of the legal and equitable issues. This is that case where this should be done, and we should aid its accomplishment. To talk of our zeal in preserving the right to jury trial generally does nothing to aid its preservation for one about to lose that constitutional right.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Jurisdiction of Federal Courts—Removal of Proceedings from State to Federal Courts.—A motion by plaintiff to remand to the New York Supreme Court on the ground that removal from that court was improvident and without jurisdiction was denied. The court found that plaintiff's motion to strike two paragraphs from the answer, service of notice for the taking of depositions, and service of reply to defendant's answer and counterclaim constituted consent to the jurisdiction of the court, even assuming that such acts were taken through inadvertence.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9007.35.

For the defendant: Friedland, Jobrack & Zurkow (Louis G. Greenfield and Sidney W. Rothstein, of counsel), all of New York, N. Y.

EDMUND L. PALMIERI, District Judge [In full text]: This is a motion, pursuant to § 1447(c) of the Judicial Code, 28 U. S. C. § 1447(c), for an order remanding this cause to the Supreme Court of the State of New York, County of New York, on the ground that it has been removed from that court improvidently and without jurisdiction, in violation of 28 U. S. C. § 1441(b).

The defendant contends that the removal to this court was proper in view of the fact that diversity of citizenship, the requisite jurisdictional amount in controversy, and the existence of a counterclaim under the anti-trust laws of the United States are not in dispute. Since I rest my decision on other grounds, however, I shall accept, for the purpose of this motion, the plaintiff's contention that removal was improperly secured in violation of the express provisions of § 1441(b). That section provides that, except in the case of civil actions of which the district courts have original jurisdiction founded on a claim or right arising under the Constitution, treaties or laws of the United States, "[a]ny other such action shall be removable only if none of the parties in interest properly joined and served as defendants is a citizen of the State in which such action is brought." The defendant is a New York corporation, a fact plainly revealed on the face of the papers, and it is on that basis that the removal is claimed to have been improper.

The main thrust of plaintiff's argument in support of its motion to remand depends upon the interpretation to be given to the word "jurisdiction," as that word appears in § 1447(c). The pertinent portion of § 1447(c) reads as follows:

> "If at any time before final judgment it appears that the case was removed improvidently and without jurisdiction, the district court shall remand the case, and may order the payment of just costs."

Plaintiff contends that the word "jurisdiction," as it there appears, means "removal jurisdiction," and not "original jurisdiction." Plaintiff's view is that if there was no right to removal, as distinguished from a situation where the right to removal was defectively exercised, then the motion to remand must be granted, provided it is made before final judgment.

Defendant urges the proposition that so long as the district court would have jurisdiction over the suit, had it originally been brought here, plaintiff does not have an absolute right to have it remanded prior to final judgment, but only a qualified right to obtain a remand, which right must be timely asserted. In this case, defendant claims, the plaintiff waived whatever right it had to secure a remand by taking certain affirmative steps in the district court proceedings.

This action might properly have been commenced in this court originally, on the basis of diversity together with the existence of the requisite jurisdictional amount in controversy. That this court has jurisdiction over the subject matter of the controversy is not disputed. Jurisdiction over the person of the plaintiff is all that is in question.

It is well established that jurisdiction over the person on removal may be conferred upon the court by consent. Bailey v. Texas Company, 47 F. 2d 153 (2d Cir. 1931), and cases there cited. In Chevrier v. Metropolitan Opera Association, Inc., 113 F. Supp. 109 (S. D. N. Y. 1953), removal from the New York Supreme Court to this court was improper for the same reason that plaintiff contends (and I have assumed) removal was improper in the instant case, namely, that the defendant was a citizen of the State of New York. It was there held that, since the action might properly have been brought originally in this court, jurisdiction could be conferred by the consent of both parties notwithstanding the improper removal.

The issue before me is whether the plaintiff manifested such consent. In Chevrier v. Metropolitan Opera Association, Inc., supra, such consent was found from the following affirmative acts by the plaintiffs in recognition of and submission to the jurisdiction of this court: requesting notice of defendant's appearance, serving notice of motion to substitute written interrogatories for proposed oral examination of plaintiffs, stipulating for adjournments of the return date of motion and of the examination pending decision, and appearing at argument of the motion without questioning the jurisdiction of the court. In Green v. Zuck, 133 F. Supp. 436 (S. D. N. Y. 1955), the affirmative acts of filing a note of issue and a demand for a jury trial were deemed sufficient to manifest and constitute plaintiff's consent to the jurisdiction of the court.

Plaintiff in this suit concedes that it took the following steps in this court: (a) Plaintiff moved on May 17, 1957, to strike two paragraphs from the answer. Its motion was granted on June 20, 1957. (b) On June 14 and 25, 1957, plaintiff served notices for the taking of the depositions of defendant's president and two other representatives. (c) Plaintiff served a reply to defendant's answer and counterclaim on June 28, 1957. The failure of plaintiff to have moved earlier to secure a remand is claimed to be the result of inadvertence. Plaintiff's attorneys were substituted as counsel in this matter only after it had already been removed to this court, and they did not notice until June 25, 1957, that the cause had been improvidently removed. Assuming arguendo, as plaintiff urges, that it took its affirmative acts in this court through inadvertence, those acts were sufficient nevertheless to establish consent to the jurisdiction of this court.

Accordingly, the motion is denied.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Antitrust Law Violations as Defenses—Misuse of Patents.—When a patentee assigned exclusive patent licenses under a contract whereby a corporate licensee agreed to pay royalties therefor, the licensee could not defend himself against an action of the patentee for royalties on the ground that the license was misused because its use was conditioned on an agreement that the patentee must not manufacture items similar to the patented items unless requested and ordered by the licensee to do so. The licensee was the moving party in the misuse of the patent to eliminate competition, while the patentee's actions were merely passive.

Opinion

[Action for Royalties]

K. P. Grubb, District Judge [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: This is an action for royalties allegedly due under a patent license agreement. For some years prior to October 1948, plaintiff* was engaged in the development, manufacture and sale of paint rollers and paint trays. Plaintiff had become experienced with paint rollers and paint trays in Fond du Lac, Wisconsin, at a time he was part owner of a casket company. On April 5, 1945 he applied for a patent No. 2427581 which was isssued September 16, 1947 on a paint roller. This patent was thereafter assigned to defendant's predecessor. On October 12, 1945 he applied for a patent on a paint tray. There was an interference proceeding involving one William R. Faust. Faust assigned his application to defendant's predecessor and on July 6, 1947 letters patent 2444584 was issued on plaintiff's application to defendant's predecessor, and on June 29, 1948 letters patent No. 2444096 was issued on the application filed by Faust to defendant's predecessor.

[Findings of Fact]

In 1945 plaintiff caused a Wisconsin corporation to be organized, under the name of E Z Paintr Corporation, for the purpose of manufacturing and marketing paint rollers and paint trays on a national basis. Plaintiff had a substantial interest in the corporation. He became its president and remained president of it and its successor corporations until October 1948.

Plaintiff was thoroughly familiar with the details of the manufacture and sale of paint rollers and trays on a national basis. He had personal contacts with customers and potential customers. He personally effected sales to the United States government, to the shipping department of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, to Sherwin-Williams Company, and to the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company, among others. He persuaded the Fuller Paint Company in San Francisco to sell E Z Paintr products in all of its stores in thirteen states. The testimony establishes that he was one of the pioneers in the development, production and marketing of these products.

Notwithstanding the success of the products, the corporation found itself in serious financial difficulty. In July 1947 additional capital was put into the corporation by Stern & Co. through a loan of $25,000 and the purchase of stock in an amount of $25,000.

For reasons not clearly shown by the testimony and which are probably not material to the questions presented, plaintiff and others, in the management of the company, came to disagreement. In October 1949 a contract was entered into between the plaintiff and defendant's predecessor, the basic terms of which were that the plaintiff and his wife, the plaintiff Eleanor Touchett, sold all of their stock to the corporation, the consideration being set forth in paragraph 3 of the agreement. Under the terms of the agreement, the corporation agreed to assign to plaintiff the title to the three patents. Plaintiff agreed to enter into an exclusive license royalty agreement, the terms of which were outlined in that contract, Plaintiff's Exhibit 21. Thereafter, and on January 5, 1949 a contract was entered into between plaintiff and the corporation, reciting that plaintiff was the owner of the three patents, that he granted to the corporation an exclusive license, that the corporation agreed to pay royalties, and in paragraph 4 of Defendant's Exhibit 1,

> "Touchett (plaintiff) agrees to be precluded from manufacturing or selling or causing the manufacture or sale of any of any of the items covered by the foregoing patents or of any paint rollers or paint trays substantially similar to the items covered by said patents provided only that Touchett shall be entitled to manufacture such items upon the request and order of the corporation. * * *" (Parenthesis supplied.)

Plaintiff also reserved the right to manufacture and sell the items in Canada and to manufacture them and export them to Canada only.

[Defenses]

In the A. L. Touchett case, the defendant has pleaded several defenses. The principal defenses relied upon are (1) misuse of patents, and (2) eviction.

[Damages Issue Severed]

The issue of damages was severed, and the matters are now before the court for a decision on the other issues.

ALLEGED MISUSE OF PATENTS

It is the contention of the defendant that the contract to pay royalties is void because the patents were used to stifle and prevent competition, thereby extending the monopoly unlawfully. Plaintiff's position in that respect is that there has been no such misuse; that the doctrine of misuse of patents is applicable only in the main where there are "tie-in sales"; that a judgment in the county court of Fond du Lac county, dated March 13, 1950, in an action between the parties is res judicata on the validity of the contracts in question. Defendant claims that the judgment in question was a consent decree; that, in any event, a contract which is void as against public policy, such as one involving misuse of patents, cannot be made valid by the doctrine of res judicata; otherwise, the defense of misuse of patents could be avoided by the entry of such judgment.

[Mercoid Case Ruling Applied]

The basic principles of the doctrine of misuse of patents are set forth in Mercoid Corporation v. Mid-Continent Investment Co. [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,201], 320 U. S. 661. It is there set forth that public interest is the dominant consideration. The doctrine denies to the patentee the "power to use it in such a way as to acquire a monopoly which is not plainly within the terms of the grant." The patentee has the power to refuse a license but that does not enable him to enlarge the monopoly of the patent by the expedient of attaching conditions to its use.

Most of the many cases cited on the doctrine of misuse of patents involve "tie-in sales". The doctrine is broad enough and there are decisions applying it to situations where an attempt is made, by use of the patent, to stifle competition with unpatented articles. That is the claim here. Defendant's claim here is that plaintiff, who was a pioneer in the field of paint rollers and paint trays, who was thoroughly acquainted with the market nationally, has bound himself not to manufacture or sell "any paint rollers or paint trays substantially similar to the items covered by the patents."

The evidence shows clearly that there were many paint rollers and paint trays and devices on the market, other than the patented articles, which were used for the same purpose and which were in substantial and vigorous competition with the patented articles. Plaintiff's position is that the language quoted only goes as far as to cover the doctrine of equivalents, in other words, to prohibit plaintiff from manufacturing or selling articles which were the equivalent of those covered by the patents. The court does not believe that that language is susceptible of such narrow interpretation for the reason that the manufacture and sale of articles which were the equivalent of the patented articles (assuming the patents were valid) could be prevented in actions for infringement. That fact, together with a large number of competing devices which were clearly not covered by the patents, impels a finding that the language in question was intended to, and if the contracts are valid, did prohibit plaintiff from selling devices which were not covered by the patent, which were competitive on the market and which were used for the same purposes as the patented articles. The sentence in question uses the disjunctive "or" in stating he will not make or sell the items covered by the patent "or" articles substantially similar to the patented articles.

On the claim that the doctrine of res judicata prevents the defense of misuse of patents, the court is of the opinion that to sustain such a position would make it easy to void the defense of misuse of patents by collusive or friendly litigation. This doctrine is for the protection of the public and to prevent unlawfully extending the monopoly granted by a patent. This position is well brought out in the case of Mercoid Corporation v. Mid-Continent Investment Co., supra.

[Public Policy in Issue]

The doctrine of misuse of patents involves public policy. It involves more than the contracting parties. It is for the protection of the public. The many cases cited on that doctrine do not always draw a clear line of demarcation. It is an equitable doctrine and the rule seems to be that he who asserts it "must have clean hands". It is based upon the use of the patent for the purpose of unlawfully extending the monopoly.

[Amending of Contract by Court]

The court believes that if two separate transactions had been entered into, substantially the same result could have been accomplished without raising the question of misuse. The corporation could have purchased the interest of plaintiff and his wife in the business and placed them under reasonable restrictions as to competition. In a separate contract a license could have been granted under the patents which did not contain a restriction on competition. The rule in Wisconsin, Journal Company v. Bundy, 254 Wis. 390, 37 N. W. 2d 89, and the general rule elsewhere, is that in connection with the sale of a substantial interest in a business, the purchaser can lawfully bind the seller not to compete, provided that the restriction is reasonable with respect to time and territory, that the restriction is not any more broad than absolutely necessary to protect the purchaser in the "goodwill" of the business that he has purchased. In the October contract there is a provision that if any court held that the restrictions are too broad as to time or as to territory covered, the court might amend the contract so that it is reasonable in those respects. The October contract was to cover a period of seven years, which has long since expired. No doubt the restriction covering the entire United States would be void as covering far too large a territory and seven years is a long time and might be questioned in that respect. This action was commenced July 13, 1953, a very short time before the expiration of the seven-year period. The court finds that the provisions in that contract, both as to territory and as to time, are unreasonable. An amendment now would not change the situation because the seven years had almost expired before the action was commenced.

[Parties Misusing Patents]

Coming to the other considerations involved in the alleged misuse of patents, at the time the October 1948 contract was entered into, the corporation owned the patents, not plaintiff. The corporation would be the principal gainer by eliminating competition. The only gain to plaintiff might be that by eliminating his competition, his royalties would be increased through the larger volume of business of the corporation. As against his gain in that respect, there would be his loss of freedom to take advantage of his knowledge of the business and of the market in selling competing, but non-infringing (assuming the validity of the patents) articles. There is no doubt that such provision was much more to the advantage of the corporation than it was to the advantage of plaintiff, if it was actually to plaintiff's advantage at all. Nevertheless, he entered into the agreement, and the testimony shows that he has, in fact, lived up to the agreement. If he was a party to an illegal contract, he has not purged the misuse. Neither has the misuse been purged by the corporation, it not having released plaintiff from that agreement and not having permitted him to compete. It is the finding of the court that the corporation was the moving party in misuse of the patents to eliminate competition and that plaintiff's part was much more passive than the part of the corporation.

[Applicability of "Misuse of Patent" Doctrine]

Plaintiff claims that the doctrine of the misuse of patents is not applicable against the licensee, and that while technically the corporation is the licensee, that was a colorable transaction and, in truth and in fact, the defendant stands in the position of licensor because prior to these contracts the defendant, not plaintiff, owned the patents. In the case of McCullough v. Kammerer Corp. [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,231], 166 F. 2d 759 (C. A. 9, 1948), the doctrine was applied against a licensee. An overwhelming majority of the cases that apply the doctrine apply it against the licensor. If the basic purpose of protecting the public is to be fulfilled, the court can see no logical reason why it should not be applied both ways.

Here, there is a question as to how equitable it would be to apply the doctrine against plaintiff when the corporation was the moving and urging party, the party to gain most by eliminating competition. There is no doubt that the contract provision was intended to eliminate competition and its purpose was to eliminate the competition of plaintiff who would have been a dangerous competitor.[1] The footnote indicates the present trend insofar as the Senate is concerned.

[Defendant Actively Stifled Competition]

For the reason that the court believes that it was the defendant rather than the plain-

[1] There has been some criticism of the application of the doctrine of misuse of patents. Thus, in the report of the Study of the Subcommittee on Patents, Trademarks, and Copyrights of the Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, February 7, 1957, Study No. 1 states at page 23:

"The doctrine of misuse, which bars relief to the plaintiff in infringement suits, often connected with antitrust violation, has resulted in destruction of patents in cases where other action could be more beneficial to the patent system as a whole. We should have a sound patent system, and then the destruction of the patent grant should be earnestly avoided."

and Study No. 2 of the same Subcommittee, released in 1957, states at page 36:

"The misuse doctrine has a broad sweep and many facets. These cannot be treated in detail here. Consideration will accordingly be confined to the underlying conceptual considerations bearing on the subject and to the clash of theory that should be borne in mind in all applications of the doctrine.

"The fundamental misuse logic finds support in well-accepted judicial decisions. Carried too far, however, the logic departs from realty and effectively destroys the patent right. Virtually any practical use of a patent in some measure influences the sale of products outside the scope of the patent."

No action has yet been taken by Congress to narrow the doctrine and if such action were taken, it would, no doubt, not be retroactive and would not affect this litigation.

tiff who actively used the patents to stifle competition and that plaintiff was at most a passive party to that misuse of patents, the court believes that as an equitable proposition, the doctrine should not be applied in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiffs in these cases.

DEFENSE OF EVICTION

* * * it is the opinion of the court that there has, in fact, been an eviction and that the judgment in the Thomas case [113 F. Supp. 827], which became final through failure of an appeal, has deprived defendant of what it agreed to pay royalties for. If the court is in error in this view, then the defendant would be liable to pay the minimum royalty because it still has the license under the Faust patent.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—When Recovery Under Antitrust Laws May be Barred—Statutes of Limitation—Applicable Statute.—There being no federal statute of limitations applicable to suits under the antitrust laws at the time the suit was brought, the statutes of limitations of the state in which the suit was brought controlled. Plaintiffs' action for treble damages under the Clayton Act was regarded as an action brought for a forfeiture upon a penal statute within the meaning of a New Jersey statute of limitations, and, therefore, the plaintiffs' suit was barred by the two-year limitation imposed by this statute.

Affirming judgments of the U. S. District Court, District of New Jersey, 1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,573.

Before MARIS, STALEY and HASTIE, Circuit Judges.

Opinion of the Court

[Question Raised]

By MARIS, Circuit Judge [In full text]: These appeals from summary judgments entered by the District Court for the District of New Jersey in favor of the defendants raise the question whether the plaintiffs' actions for treble damages under section 4 of the Clayton Act [1] are barred by an applicable statute of limitations.

[Parties to Actions]

The complaints, one by Frank I. Gordon and Marion V. Gordon and the other by John C. Gordon, Helen Gordon and Joseph Gordon, were each filed in the district court on March 3, 1955 against the same defendants, Loew's Incorporated, a Delaware corporation, Paramount Film Distributing Corporation, a Delaware corporation, Paramount Pictures, Inc., a New York corporation, RKO Radio Pictures, Inc., a Delaware corporation, Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation, a New York corporation, Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation, a Delaware corporation, Warner Bros. Pictures Distributing Corporation, a New York corporation, Columbia Pictures Corporation, a New York corporation, Universal Film Exchanges, Inc., a Delaware corporation, and United Artists Corporation, a Delaware corporation, all of which were motion picture producers or distributors.

[Assertions of Plaintiffs]

Plaintiffs Frank and Marion Gordon asserted in their complaint that they were the sole stockholders of Northwest Theatre Company, an Illinois corporation which had been dissolved on February 16, 1950 and which had leased and operated the Wicker Park Theatre in Chicago from April 15, 1929 to May 14, 1949. Plaintiffs John, Helen and Joseph Gordon asserted in their complaint that they were the sole stockholders of Gordon Brothers Theatre Company, an Illinois corporation which had been dissolved on January 25, 1949 and which had operated the Chopin Theatre in Chicago from September 1, 1922 to January 1, 1947.

Each complaint asserted that the defendants had uniformly followed a system which violated the antitrust laws of releasing feature motion pictures for exhibition in Chicago to the injury of the theatre operated by the corporation of which the plaintiffs were surviving stockholders. Each complaint sought to recover treble damages for the alleged injury to the business and property of the corporation. All the plaintiffs claim the right to bring these suits as surviving stockholders of their respective corporations and, in addition, all of them except Joseph Gordon claim the right to bring the suits as assignees from their respective corporations of the causes of action sued on.

[1] "Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee." 15 U. S. C. A. § 15.

[Dismissals Appealed]

By an earlier order with which we are not here concerned the district court dismissed the complaints as against defendants Paramount Pictures, Inc., and Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation, New York corporations, for improper venue. Thereafter, the remaining defendants filed motions for summary judgment, asserting that the causes of action had abated at the expiration of two years after the dissolution of the respective corporations by virtue of the provisions of section 94 of the Illinois Business Corporation Act or, in the alternative, that the actions were barred by the New Jersey statute of limitations. The district court decided that the causes of action had abated under the Illinois Business Corporation Act and accordingly entered judgment in each case dismissing the complaint. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,573] 147 F. Supp. 398. These appeals followed. Since substantially the same questions are involved in each case the appeals were consolidated and considered together in this court.

[New Jersey Statute Applicable]

At the time these suits were instituted there was no federal statute of limitations applicable to suits under the federal antitrust laws,[2] it being then settled that the statutes of limitations of the state in which the district court was sitting were to be applied by that court to federal antitrust litigation.[3] Accordingly, since these cases were brought in the District Court in New Jersey we must determine whether the statutes of that state operate to bar their prosecution.

At the outset we note that New Jersey has not enacted a so-called "borrowing statute," i. e. a law directing that the statute of limitations of the state in which a cause of action arose shall be applied to bar a suit on such cause of action if brought in New Jersey. New Jersey has thus not departed from the settled common law rule of conflict of laws that the forum applies only its own procedural statute of limitations and does not give effect to a statute of another state in which the cause of action arose unless that statute has been held by the state which enacted it to be substantive in nature, operating as a condition terminating the existence of the right instead of merely barring the remedy.[4] For this reason we do not need to take account of the limitation imposed by section 94 of the Illinois Business Corporation Act[5] to the extent that it is procedural in nature. And in view of our conclusion as to the applicability of the New Jersey statute we are not called upon to determine the question whether the Illinois statute can have the substantive effect of terminating at the expiration of two years after the dissolution of their respective corporations the causes of action which these plaintiffs as surviving stockholders assert have been given them by the federal antitrust laws.[6]

The sections of the New Jersey Revised Statutes having possible applicability here as statutes of limitations are as follows:

"2A:14-1. 6 years.

"Every action at law for trespass to real property, for any tortious injury to

[Application of Statutes to Actions]

Upon examining these statutes we observe that the period of limitation applicable to the actions here in question is six years, as provided by section 2A:14-1 unless the plaintiffs' actions for treble damages under section 4 of the Clayton Act are to be regarded as actions brought for a forfeiture upon a penal statute within the meaning of section 2A:14-10, in which case the limitation of two years provided by that section is applicable.

In the action brought by John, Helen and Joseph Gordon it appears from the face of their complaint that the cause of action sued upon arose more than six years before the complaint was filed. For in that case it is alleged that their corporation ceased operating the theatre in question on January 1, 1947 and was dissolved on January 25, 1949, both dates being more than six years before the suit was instituted. It is therefore, perfectly clear that their suit is barred by section 2A:14-1[7] if not by section 2A:14-10. The district court accordingly did not err in dismissing it.

In the suit brought by Frank and Marion Gordon, however, it appears from their complaint that their corporation operated the theatre in question up to May 14, 1949 and was not dissolved until February 16, 1950, both dates being less than six years but more than two years prior to the date the suit was instituted. Their suit was, therefore, not barred by section 2A:14-1 but would be barred by section 2A:14-10 if it is applicable.

[Addiss Case]

This brings us to the question whether section 2A:14-10 of the Revised Statutes of New Jersey was applicable to bar Frank and Marion Gordon's suit for treble damages under section 4 of the Clayton Act. In determining that question we must, we believe, take that statute to have the meaning and scope which the New Jersey courts have given it in relation to state suits analogous to federal antitrust actions.[8] A recent decision of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, Addiss v. Logan Corp., 1957, 23 N. J. 142, 128 A. 2d 426, sheds much light upon this question which was not available to the district court in this and prior cases.[9] The Addiss case involved the question whether section 2A:14-10 applied a bar to an action for treble damages brought by a tenant against his landlord under the State Rent Control Act. The Supreme Court of New Jersey held that section 2A:14-10 was applicable to such an action. Justice Burling who delivered the opinion of the court stated (pp. 148-149):

"Plaintiffs urge upon their cross-appeal that the trial court erroneously limited their recovery of treble damages to rental overcharges occurring within a two-year period prior to commencement of the action. The holding in this regard was based upon N. J. S. 2A: 14-10 which provides, inter alia:

"'All actions at law brought for any forfeiture upon any penal statute made or to be made, shall be commenced within the periods of time herein prescribed:

"'b. Within 2 years next after the offense committed or to be committed against the statute, or cause of action accrued, when the benefit of the forfeiture and the action therefor is or shall be limited or given to the party aggrieved; * * *' The argument is that the State Rent Control Act is not a penal statute, hence the limitation does not apply.

"The statutory penalty of N. J. S. 2A:42-38 is both remedial and penal, a factor inferentially recognized in Friedman v. Podell, supra. Cf. Ryan v. Motor Credit Co., Inc., 130 N. J. Eq. 531 (Ch. 1941) affirmed 132 N. J. Eq. 398 (E. & A. 1942). The tenant recovers the measure of unlawful rental extracted and by statutory direction is the recipient of the punitive award. The total recovery is arbitrarily computed; it takes cognizance of the actual loss only as a base. According to the statutory direction the landlord 'forfeits' an amount three times that base. This operates as a sanction. True, it is largely a wrong to the individual but excessive rental charges also impugn the statutory purpose of stabilizing rentals in emergency areas and thus incidentally wrong the public. Compare Cruickshanks v. Eak, 33 N. J. Super. 285 (Law Div. 1954). A further point why the court below was correct in applying the limitation is the desire to prevent actions such as this, having penal characteristics, from being unlimited. See Boswell v. Robinson, 33 N. J. L. 273 (Sup. Ct. 1869); Borough of Fair Lawn v. Fairlawn Transportation, Inc., 25 N. J. Misc. 331 (Sup. Ct. 1947). But cf. Shelton Electric Co. v. Victor Talking Mach. Co., 277 F. 433 (D. C. N. J. 1922). We concur in the conclusion that the two-year limitation of N. J. S. 2A:14-10(b) was applicable to the plaintiffs' causes of action."

[Clayton Act Regarded as Penal]

The action for treble damages given by section 4 of the Clayton Act is essentially similar in its pertinent characteristics to the action for treble damages which the New Jersey State Rent Control Act gave to a tenant. To paraphrase what Justice Burling said in the Addiss case with regard to the State Rent Control Act, the person injured by reason of action forbidden by the antitrust laws recovers the measure of the injury to his business or property and by statutory direction is the recipient of the punitive award. The total recovery is arbitrarily computed; it takes cognizance of the actual loss only as a base. According to the statutory direction the defendant must pay an amount three times that base. This operates as a sanction. True it is largely a wrong to the individual but violations of the antitrust laws also impugn the Congressional purpose of freeing interstate commerce from restraints and monopolies and thus incidentally wrong the public. Indeed the violation of those laws is not only subject to this sanction but is also made a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment.[10] We think it is clear, in the light of the Addiss opinion, that for the purpose of the application of section 2A:14-10 of the New Jersey Revised Statutes, section 4 of the Clayton Act must be regarded as a penal statute within the purview of that section.

It is suggested that section 4 of the Clayton Act cannot thus be held to be a penal statute because the Supreme Court of the United States held in Chattanooga Foundry v. Atlanta, 1906, 203 U. S. 390, that the five years limitation upon suits "for the enforcement of any civil fine, penalty or forfeiture, pecuniary or otherwise" imposed by the predecessor of section 2462 of title 28, United States Code, was not applicable to such a suit. It must, of course, be conceded that such a suit is not for a penalty within the meaning of the federal statute of limitations now incorporated in section 2462. But it does not follow that the law which authorizes such a suit to be brought may not be a penal statute within the meaning of section 2A:14-10 of the New Jersey Revised Statutes. For "penal" and "penalty" are not words of art. On the contrary, as is the case with many other terms used in the law, their meaning varies with the circumstances in which they are used and takes on the meaning in each instant which the user intends. See Huntington v. Attrill, 1892, 146 U. S. 657. As an illustration we may point out that actions under the antitrust laws at other times and in other settings have been described by the federal courts as authorizing the recovery of a penalty.[11] And indeed the fact that the antitrust laws had been held to be penal in respect to the application of the statutes of limitations of some states but not of others was one of the reasons why Congress in 1955 enacted the uniform statute of limitations applicable to these cases.[12]

All we are called upon to decide and all we do decide is that section 4 of the Clayton Act is a penal statute within the meaning of that phrase as used in section 2A:14-10 of the Revised Statutes of New Jersey, and that, therefore, the suit brought by Frank and Marion Gordon is barred by the limitation imposed by that section.

[Persuasive Circumstances]

It is persuasive, although of course not controlling, that in similar cases in the federal district court in Illinois involving the application of the Illinois statute of limitations to suits for treble damages under the Clayton Act the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit reached a conclusion similar to that to which we have come in this case.[13]

"It can therefore be seen that not only are the provisions of State law establishing time limitations upon actions to recover a statutory liability inconclusive insofar as ascertaining the correct period in which to bring suit is concerned, but they frequently create the additional problem of determining whether the statutory liability imposed under the antitrust laws is in the nature of a penalty or forfeiture, or otherwise.

"It is one of the primary purposes of this bill to put an end to the confusion and discrimination present under existing law where local statutes of limitations are made applicable to rights granted under our Federal laws. This will be accomplished by establishing a uniform statute of limitations applicable to all private treble damage actions as well as Government damage actions, of 4 years."

filing of the bill a temporary restraining order was entered and later, after a hearing, such order was continued in effect as a preliminary injunction pending a hearing of the cause on the merits. The form of the injunction was assented to by counsel for the respondent and was duly entered on May 1, 1956.

[Bases for Appeal]

Thereafter on June 22, 1956 complainant filed a motion to adjudge respondent in contempt for violating said injunction. After a hearing in the superior court, the trial justice found as a fact that respondent had violated the injunction and he adjudged it in contempt. A decree to that effect was duly entered and respondent was therein given an opportunity to purge itself of such contempt "by ceasing to make any sales in Rhode Island at less than the prices set forth in Supplement 54 (appended hereto as Appendix A) to Sunbeam Fair Trade Contracts in the State of Rhode Island, either on the respondent's premises or otherwise, including Cash on Delivery purchases." The cause is here on respondent's appeal from that decree.

The respondent has filed twelve separate reasons of appeal, some of which are repetitious. However, we need concern ourselves with only three of them, namely, (4) that the decree appealed from is vague, uncertain and indefinite; (8) that the restraining order of April 19, 1956 which was continued in effect on May 1, 1956 is vague, indefinite and uncertain and therefore the trial justice erred in holding respondent in contempt thereof; and (12) that he erred in allowing respondent to purge itself only "by ceasing to make any sales contrary to the fair trade provisions in the State of Rhode Island either on the premises or otherwise, including C. O. D. purchases."

[Issue of Ambiguity]

Those three reasons are basically predicated upon respondent's main contention that the restraining orders of April 19 and May 1 are ambiguous and therefore it cannot lawfully be adjudged in contempt thereof. The respondent also argues that the decree appealed from is erroneous for the same reason and for the further reason that it goes beyond the prayer of the bill and the terms of the restraining order of May 1 in requiring it to refrain from making sales "either on the premises or otherwise, including C. O. D. purchases."

In reply to those contentions complainant argues that they are in effect indirect attacks upon the validity of the restraining orders of April 19 and May 1 which respondent may not lawfully make because it formally assented thereto and did not appeal therefrom. There is no merit in that argument because its premise is faulty. The respondent is not attacking the validity of those restraining orders. It is maintaining merely that they are so indefinite and uncertain that they are not enforceable in the circumstances of this case by a judgment in contempt. The fact that respondent assented to them does not preclude it from claiming that such orders submit to an interpretation which leaves it free to act as it did in selling complainant's products. That such an interpretation is different from complainant's understanding of the force and effect of those orders only goes to show that they are lacking in precision. The respondent's interpretation need not be the more reasonable one. If it is reasonable then the restraining orders are ambiguous. In such a case respondent is unquestionably within its rights in raising that issue here in its defense to an adjudication for contempt.

[Injunctive Prohibitions]

Is the restraining order of May 1 ambiguous? The pertinent portion thereof reads that "this respondent be enjoined from advertising, offering for sale or selling, in its place of business at 290 Westminster Street, Providence, Rhode Island, any products bearing Sunbeam Corporation's name or trade-marks at less than the prices stipulated pursuant to Sunbeam Retailer Fair Trade Contracts in force and effect with other retailers in the State of Rhode Island; from making any allowance, gift, rebate or concession in connection with the advertising, offering for sale or selling, in respondent's said place of business, of any of said commodities at less than said prices." (italics ours)

[Respondent's Contentions]

The respondent contends that such injunction submits to two interpretations as follows: 1. That respondent is enjoined from advertising for sale in its place of business, offering for sale or selling in said place any of complainant's products at less than fair trade prices. 2. That respondent is enjoined from advertising in its place of business. selling therein, or offering to sell therein whether the sale be made therein or elsewhere, as less than fair trade prices. It contends that the first interpretation is the proper one and that the entire context of the injunction was intended to prevent any sale in its place of business or any offer to make such sale therein. It further contends that it complied with its understanding of the terms of the injunction and did not sell or offer to sell therein any of complainant's products at less than the fair trade price, but it concedes that it did make two sales at less than such price outside of its place of business.

[Alleged Injunction Violations]

The undisputed evidence is that Mrs. Mary Dropot and Mrs. Mary A. Little each purchased from respondent an electric frying pan at less than the fair trade price. Each sale occurred in the following manner. Mrs. Dropot went to respondent's place of business and asked for a Sunbeam frying pan. The salesman told her they had one for sale but he could not sell it there but it could be delivered at her home and sold to here there for cash on delivery. The respondent accepted Mrs. Dropot's offer to purchase the frying pan by delivering it to her the next day at her home and receiving payment at that time.

Mrs. Little's purchase was consummated under somewhat different circumstances. She went to respondent's place of business seeking a Sunbeam frying pan and offered to pay for one on delivery at her home. However, when it did not arrive she inquired of respondent the reason therefor, and was told that there was trouble with the delivery truck but if she would come to the entrance of the store the deliveryman would deliver it to her there. She went to the store and tried to have respondent accept the money and deliver the pan to her in the store but respondent refused and told her that no sale could be made in the store and that she could get the pan only from the delivery boy who was outside at the entrance on Mathewson street. She then went there and obtained the pan from the boy after paying him the stipulated purchase price.

[Court's Interpretation of Injunction]

We are of the opinion that the terms of the injunction reasonably submit to more than one interpretation. We cannot say there was no basis for respondent's understanding that it was enjoined from doing the acts prohibited by the injunction only "in its place of business at 290 Westminster Street * * *." That may or may not be a less reasonable interpretation than complainant's understanding, but regardless of that fact the injunction cannot be deemed other than ambiguous.

[Applicable Law Discussed]

The law is well settled that an injunction to be enforceable by contempt proceedings should be clear and certain and its terms should be sufficient to enable one reading the writ or order to learn therefrom what he may or may not do thereunder. 43 C. J. S. Injunctions § 206(b)(c), pp. 932, 933, and § 259(b), p. 1008. The party enjoined should not be punished for disobedience of an order which is capable of a construction consistent with innocence. 17 C. J. S. Contempt § 12, p. 16.

The terms of the order should be specific, clear and precise so that one need not resort to inference or implications to ascertain his duty or obligation thereunder. Franklin v. Franklin, 26 N. J. Misc. 350, aff'd 2 N. J. 103. As the respondent must obey the order at his peril it should be clear, definite and explicit so that an unlearned man can understand its meaning. Tierney, Inc. v. James, 56 N. Y. S. 2d 8. This is a reasonable requirement, since contempt of the order may involve punishment by way of not only loss of property but also loss of liberty. Ketchum v. Edwards, 153 N. Y. 534. In line with that view the supreme court of New Jersey has held: "It is fundamental that the order imposing a restraint should be so clear, definite and certain in its terms that the person to whom it is directed may readily know what he is restrained from doing." State ex rel. State Board of Milk Control v. Newark Milk Co., 118 N. J. Eq. 504, 524.

The complainant, however, argues that those requirements are met in the instant case if one reads the bill of complaint in connection with the order. In support of its claim that the pleadings and the order should be read together to remove any uncertainty, it cites Starkweather v. Williams, 31 R. I. 134. That case is clearly not an authority for such a proposition. Furthermore the respondent therein was not relying upon any ambiguity in the order and was not claiming that he had complied with his interpretation of it, but was actually contending "that he was not obliged to comply with the decree in question because the same ought not to have been entered in the cause * * *." The law with reference to this matter is, in our opinion, well settled. In State ex rel. State Board of Milk Control v. Newark Milk Co., supra, it was expressly stated at page 524: "Those commanded should not be remitted to the pleadings and proofs, and required to interpret them to determine the scope and extent of the injunction." See also Richards v. West, 3 N. J. Eq. 456, and Tierney, Inc. v. James, supra.

The complainant finally contends that in any event respondent is guilty of violating the injunction under its own interpretation of it, since the delivery of the frying pan to Mrs. Little outside the entrance to its store was in effect a sale upon respondent's premises. This contention fails to recognize that the injunction specifically enjoins respondent from making a sale or selling "in its place of business * * *." The respondent interprets the quoted words literally. A sale on the sidewalk outside its place of business is not in it. This may be a narrow construction of the injunction in its favor, but under the law as we understand it the respondent is entitled to rely on such a construction. Thus it has been held that a party should not be punished for disobedience of an order which is capable of a construction consistent with innocence. North v. Foley, 267 N. Y. S. 572; National Labor Relations Board v. Express Publishing Co., 312 U. S. 426; National Labor Relations Board v. Brashear Freight Lines, Inc., 127 F. 2d 198; Budd Mfg. Co. v. National Labor Relations Board, 142 F. 2d 922. For constructions by this court of the terms of injunctions consistent with such rule, see Kennedy v. Frechette, 45 R. I. 399, and Jackson Furniture Co. v. Lieberman, 65 R. I. 224.

[Injunction Not Violated]

In view of our conclusion that respondent has not violated the injunction of May 1, 1956, it is unnecessary for us to consider its other contention that the decree appealed from goes beyond the prayers of the bill and the terms of such injunction.

[Cause Remanded]

The respondent's appeal is sustained, the decree appealed from is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the superior court for further proceedings.

Case No. 1309 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Clayton and Sherman Antitrust Acts

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Civil Suits for Injunctive Relief—Discovery and Production of Records.—On a motion for discovery and production of documents dating back 27 years, the court ruled that where the claim of relief was an illegal conspiracy in restraint of trade or an attempt to monopolize under the Sherman Act, approximately 10 years was a sufficient period in which plaintiff might retrace its proof. However, where the charge was an illegal acquisition of stock in violation of the Clayton Act, the Government was entitled to a longer period of years in which to scrutinize the relationship between the parties for a number of years preceding the acquisition.

Opinion

ALEXANDER HOLTZOFF, District Judge [In full text]: This case is before the court on a motion by the plaintiff for discovery and production of numerous documents, under Rule 34 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

[Nature of Suit]

The action is a civil suit brought by the Government for an injunction under the antitrust laws against the Maryland and Virginia Milk Producers Association, Inc., an agricultural cooperative association, composed of nearly two thousand milk producers, most of whom are located in the States of Maryland and Virginia. The defendant is charged with an attempt to monopolize interstate trade and commerce in milk, in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U. S. C. 2); with entering into contracts in restraint of trade in milk, in violation of Sections 1 and 3 of the Sherman Act (15 U. S. C. 1 and 3); and with purchasing and acquiring in 1954 substantially all of the assets of Embassy Dairy Company, an independent producer, the effect of this transaction being to restrain competition or to create a monopoly, in violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C. 18). The relief sought is an adjudication that the acts complained of are unlawful and an injunction against a continuation of the illegal activities. By the present motion, the plaintiff seeks the production of numerous documents, including contracts, correspondence, records and similar papers, dating back to 1930. The defendant objects to such a discovery as too broad, unreasonable and burdensome.

[Discovery Provisions]

The discovery provisions of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure must be liberally construed, Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U. S. 495. Broad discovery is one of the outstanding, progressive innovations introduced by modern practice. It is a potent weapon in the attainment of justice. The court will take no step to abridge or detract from its beneficent effects. Nevertheless, discovery must be subject to the reasonable control of the court, since counsel in their zeal may at times unintentionally and unwittingly impose unnecessary and unduly onerous burdens on opposing parties. That this possibility was contemplated by the framers of the Rules appears by Rule 30, which reposes in the court a residual control over the taking of depositions, and from the very fact that discovery of documents under Rule 34 may be had only on motion for good cause shown. This rule necessarily implies that the extent of the discovery of documents is not to be unlimited and unbridled, but is to be subject to the sound discretion of the court.

[Reasonability of Period Covered]

In this instance in order to establish two of its three claims for relief, it is necessary for the Government to prove the existence of restraints of trade and attempts to monopolize, or threats to do so, as of the time of the trial. To be sure, it would be unreasonable and might even defeat the ends of justice to confine the Government in its proof to evidence of acts done on any particular day. The Government must be free to retrace the defendant's activities for a considerable period, if it deems it necessary to do so, in order to establish the background and the setting in which the acts complained of were being committed. This is true of any case involving a continuing conspiracy. There is a serious question, however, whether it is reasonable to go as far back as 1930,—a period of twenty-seven years. No reason is stated and none appears discernible why this arbitrary date was selected by counsel.

[Cut-Off Dates Fixed by Court]

The question whether evidence is too remote is in all cases to be determined by the court. The decision depends in large part on the issues. It is the function and the duty of the court of its own motion to exclude evidence that it deems too remote, even though possibly it may have some nebulous logical distant relevancy to the issues. In this respect there is no distinction between an antitrust case and any other case. Consequently, it is entirely proper and even desirable for the court to fix a so-called "cut-off" date, or a series of "cut-off" dates.

In due course the court will determine how long a period the plaintiff may retrace in its proof. The period need not necessarily be the same as to all transactions involved in this action. The court feels that under the circumstances, the appropriate time to make this ruling will be at the pretrial hearing, which has been set for October 1. Tentatively, for the purpose of the present motion, only, the court is of the opinion that approximately a ten-year period more or less should be generally sufficient as to the first two claims for relief. As to the third claim, a much longer time is suitable. The court will dispose of the pending motion on this basis, without prejudice to a renewal in the event that at the pretrial hearing the court determines to extend the period.

It is true, as stated in the memoranda submitted by the Government in connection with this motion, that in the past in some antitrust cases the Government introduced evidence concerning a much longer period. Counsel cite three such cases in which a period of forty years was covered in this manner. The inordinate length of trials in antitrust litigation, however, caused largely by voluminous evidence reaching back many years that at times eventually has proven unnecessary, has created serious difficulties for the Federal courts throughout the country. The problem has grown to such magnitude that the Judicial Conference of the United States has taken cognizance of it, and has created a Committee to devise means to shorten these proceedings. One device is to reduce the period to be covered by the evidence to a reasonable length, bearing in mind that the ultimate question in a civil suit for an injunction is whether at the time of the trial acts are being committed or threatened that should be enjoined for the future. Injunctions look to the future and not to the past, and the past is important only as throwing light on the present and on future intentions.

[Excessive Length of Trials]

Excessive length of trials is closely related to the problem of congestion in the courts. There are two principal causes of congestion. One is increase of business. This cannot be regulated, since no one should be impeded in access to the courts. The other basic cause of congestion is that individual trials on the average take too long a time. If the duration of trials could be reduced to a point where three cases would be tried in the same length of time that is now consumed by two, congestion would before long become a thing of the past. The court feels that it has a duty to do what is reasonably necessary and proper to shorten what otherwise might be an inordinately long trial, to the extent to which this may be done without detriment to the rights of any party. Federal judges are clothed with common law powers to control trials, and, naturally should exercise them in the light of reason.

[duPont Case Distinguished]

Among the cases relied on by counsel for the Government is the recent decision of the Supreme Court in United States v. E. I. duPont de Nemours Co. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,723], (June 3, 1957). There evidence was introduced concerning matters that had transpired fifty years previously. That case, however, involved a different principle and is not apposite as to two of the claims for relief in the case at bar. The action was brought under the provision of law that under certain circumstances prohibits a corporation engaged in commerce to acquire stock of another corporation. The transaction attacked in that suit was a single acquisition of stock that took place in 1917. The Government was in a position to challenge it, because the statute of limitations does not run against the United States. Naturally, in an action to set aside a transaction that took place forty years ago, it is reasonable to introduce evidence of acts that transpired during the ten-year period preceding that date. In the case at bar, however, there is charged a continuing conspiracy in restraint of trade and an attempt to monopolize. As to these charges the rights of the parties must be adjudicated as of the date of the trial and not as of the date of a specified transaction that took place in the past. A different principle governs the charge that stock of Embassy Dairy Company was illegally acquired. That purchase took place in 1954, and the Government is entitled to scrutinize the relations between the defendant and Embassy Dairy for a number of years preceding 1954.

[Ruling on Motion]

In accordance with the foregoing discussion, the pending motion will be disposed of as follows. The motion is granted to the extent of directing the defendant to produce for inspection and an opportunity to copy, all papers and documents listed in the following paragraphs of the motion:

Paragraph I, sub-paragraphs 1(c) and 4.

Paragraph II.

Paragraph III, sub-paragraphs 4 and 5.

Paragraph III, sub-paragraph 6, limited, however, to the period from March 1, 1955 to February 7, 1957.

Paragraph IV.

In other respects, the motion is denied, without prejudice to a renewal after the pretrial hearing, if as a result of pretrial further discovery appears necessary or desirable.

[Motion For Reargument]

MORTIMER W. BYERS, District Judge [In full text]: This is a motion for reargument of the decision filed June 6, 1957 [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,737] in this case, and is addressed to so much thereof as dealt with the counterclaims asserted in Paragraphs Thirty-third and Thirty-fifth of the Second Amended Answer.

[Plaintiff a Purchaser from Peerless]

The plaintiff properly criticizes the opinion in that as to the Peerless Instrument Co. the court assumed that it was a purchaser of the plaintiff's products. That assumption was based on the allegation that it and another "were substantial suppliers and subcontractors of the plaintiff."

The error lay in thinking that the foregoing quotation meant that Peerless, being a sub-contractor of the plaintiff, probably in performing its sub-contracts, was a purchaser from the plaintiff.

It now appears that the contrary is the fact, and that the plaintiff was a purchaser from Peerless.

[Threat To Withdraw Purchases]

It is not seen that this changes the aspect of the characterized pleading, since a threat to withdraw purchases in order to induce Peerless not to do business with this defendant, would be no better in the legal sense, than a threat to discontinue sales to Peerless for the same reason.

On such a motion, it must be obvious that the court cannot undertake to decide whether the allegation is true or false, although the affidavits submitted on behalf of this motion are addressed to that proposition.

[Government Not Subject to Robinson-Patman Act]

If the opinion of June 6 [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,737] can be construed to suggest that sales to the Government can be thought to be subject to the provisions of the Robinson-Patman Act, a full disclaimer of any such intention is hereby made.

All that this court intended to suggest was that in ruling upon a motion to dismiss a given pleading, the court was not in a position to say that the motion should be granted on the ground that the counterclaim, in all human probability could not be established.

Memorandum

SIDNEY SUGARMAN, District Judge [In full text]: The indictment herein, charging a conspiracy commencing "in or about the year 1943, the exact date being to the Grand Jurors unknown" must be accorded its plain meaning, viz.: that between January 1, 1943 and December 31, 1943 the conspiracy was born.

[Nolo Contendere]

If it was hatched on or before May 28, 1943, when the informations to which movants pleaded nolo contendere were filed, there is an overlapping of time. If it was hatched after May 28, 1943 there is not.

Obviously the alleged overlapping cannot be determined from the face of the indictment alone.

[Alleged "Admissions" of Government]

Movants point to two alleged "admissions" by the government as extraneous proof of overlapping. These occurred in connection with a motion made by the government to make certain subpoenas for the production of documents "for the years 1943 through December 31, 1956," served by it, on the defendants, effective.

One is a statement in an affidavit of May 14, 1957 that

> "the period of time covered by the subpoenas is not excessive since it is no broader than the conspiratorial period charged."

The other is a statement in the government's brief on that motion that

> "the conspiracy charged extends back 14 years. Evidence from the time of the formation of the conspiracy is relevant to the charges and should be produced."

These statements no more "establish" that the conspiracy now charged overlaps that to which the movants pleaded nolo contendere in 1943 than do the statements in the affidavit and brief submitted by the government in opposition to this motion establish the contrary.

[Opposing Affidavits]

Here it is said in the opposing affidavit that

> "the government unequivocally states that the conspiracies charged in the 1957 indictment began on or after May 29, 1943" and in the brief that

> "the government can and will file a bill of particulars stating the commencement date of the conspiracies in the 1957 case to be on or after May 29, 1943."

[Motion to Dismiss Denied]

Accordingly, the motions to dismiss the indictment herein upon the ground of former jeopardy are at this time denied but without prejudice to appropriate consideration thereof, if warranted on the proof, at the trial. Cf. Short v. United States, 91 F. 2d 614 (4th Cir. 1937).

In view of the foregoing, no opinion is expressed as to the alleged identity of the industry, area and terms of the conspiracies charged here and in 1943.

It is so ordered.

Sur Motion for Production of Documents

WILLIAM H. KIRKPATRICK, Chief Judge [In full text]: The general policy against disclosure of proceedings before a grand jury has been invoked by the Government in the course of the argument, but the scope of that policy need not be considered here, because the defendants' motion for the production of the grand jury minutes must be denied upon entirely different grounds.

[Other Cases Distinguished]

The defendants contend that Jencks v. United States, 353 U. S. 657, and United States v. Joel Rosenberg, Court of Appeals, Third Circuit, June 26, 1957, are controlling, but neither of those decisions goes any further than to hold that disclosure of prior statements of a person, made either to a government agent or before a grand jury, may be compelled for the purpose of impeaching him when called as a witness in the course of a criminal proceeding. In the present case the discovery is asked for not for impeachment but for the purpose of obtaining information to be used by the defendants in the preparation of their case. It may be that some of the witnesses who appeared before the grand jury will be called at the trial, but, before the applicability of the Jencks and Rosenberg decisions can be considered, the witness must be actually called or, at least, the prospect of his being called must be definite and immediate.

[No Showing of Good Cause]

The question, therefore, before me at the present time is simply whether good cause, under Rule 34, has been shown for the request for the production of a document or documents. On this point, the Court of Appeals for this circuit has indicated pretty definitely that, if a party has the names of the witnesses whose statements he wants and can interview them or take their depositions without undue burden or delay, he would be "unable to show such special circumstances . . . as would justify production of the statements in question." Alltmont v. U. S., 177 F. 2d 971, 979. There would seem to be no difficulty in the present case about interviewing the witnesses or taking their depositions. I do not think that a showing of good cause has been made.

Clayton and Sherman Antitrust Acts

Private Enforcement and Procedure—When Recovery Under Antitrust Laws May be Barred—Statute of Limitations—Tolling the Period of Limitations.—A motion by defendant to limit damages to those accruing within six years prior to the commencement of a private antitrust suit was granted. The court ruled that the tolling statute suspending the running of the statute of limitations applied only to the named defendants in the government litigation and, therefore, did not operate against the defendant, a wholly owned subsidiary of another defendant, since the defendant subsidiary was not a party to the prior government suit against the parent company. Further, imputation to one conspirator of the onus of the acts of his fellow conspirators did not abrogate the particular statute of limitations which may be available to any one of the conspirators.

[Motion]

NORDBYE, GUNNAR H., Judge [In full text]: In substance it may be stated that defendant's motion is that, as to it, damages herein be limited to those accruing within two years prior to the commencement of this action, or, in the alternative, that the limitation period be set at six years. In view of this Court's decision in Homewood Theater v. Loew's, Inc., 1951, 101 F. Supp. 76, that the six-year statute of limitations is applicable to antitrust suits brought upon claims arising in Minnesota, it follows that only the alternative motion of the defendant need be considered.

[Complaint]

This action was brought on November 6, 1952, against eight motion picture distributors and this moving defendant to recover treble damages for the violation of the Sherman Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 1, et seq., and the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 12, et seq. MAC was incorporated in 1932 and was a wholly owned subsidiary of one of the defendants in this action. For the purposes of this motion, it must be deemed to have entered into the conspiracy alleged in the complaint in violation of the antitrust laws, at least as early as 1936. Furthermore, it appears from the allegations of the complaint that MAC was one of the instruments, so to speak, by which the parent corporation named as a defendant herein benefited from the conspiracy. It is conceded that the parent corporation, as well as the other distributor defendants, are subject to the tolling of the statute of limitations which was suspended when the Government brought an antitrust action against the parent company of MAC and the seven other defendants herein on June 20, 1938. The government suit now has been terminated as to all of these distributor defendants, but the suit was terminated at different times as to each defendant. The question presented to this Court is whether or not the tolling statute operates against MAC, which was not a party to the Government's suit. If it does, then the damages can be sought from MAC for a period prior to six years from the date of the commencement of this action, that is, prior to November 6, 1946. The tolling statute, 15 U. S. C. A. § 16, reads as follows,

[Tolling Statute]

"Whenever any suit or proceeding in equity or criminal prosecution is instituted by the United States to prevent, restrain or punish violations of any of the antitrust laws, the running of the statute of limitations in respect of each and every private right of action arising under such laws and based in whole or in part on any matter complained of in said suit or proceeding shall be suspended during the pendency thereof."

It is plaintiff's contention that this statute tells the period of limitation on all suits arising out of any matter complained of in the government litigation. But obviously the "matter complained of" pertains to the matters which were in issue between the Government and the named defendants. It would be a surprising theory of construction if the tolling of the statute applies to one who is not a party to the government litigation. It must be remembered that one of the primary purposes of this statute was to give private litigants the benefit of decrees in the government litigation. No decree has been entered as to MAC. The conclusion that the tolling statute applies only to the named defendants in the government litigation is in harmony with the views indicated by the courts which have considered this question. Sun Theatre Corp. v. RKO Radio Pictures [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,722], 7 Cir., 1954, 213 F. 2d 284, 292; Electric Theater Co. v. Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corp. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,777], W. D. Mo., 1953, 113 F. Supp. 937, 945; Christensen v. Paramount Pictures [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,751], D. C. Utah, 1950, 95 F. Supp. 446, 455.

[Conspiracy Law]

But plaintiffs argue that if the above construction of the tolling statute is sound, it does not follow that the six-year limitation statute is available to MAC because it was sued within the applicable six-year period of the statute and is responsible, according to plaintiffs' contention, for the total damage sustained by the plaintiffs, although such damages began to accrue as early as 1936. Plaintiffs rely upon the well-known principle of conspiracy law as enunciated in 11 Am. Jur. 580, Conspiracy, § 48,

> "The connection between the parties having been established, whatever was done in pursuance of the conspiracy by one of the conspirators is considered as the act of all the conspirators; all are equally liable therefor as joint tortfeasors, regardless of whether they were original parties to the conspiracy and irrespective of either the fact that they did not actively participate therein or the extent to which they benefited thereby."

Plaintiffs recognize that if MAC terminated its participation in the conspiracy more than six years prior to the filing of the complaint, this action as to it would be barred, but they assert the argument that, having been sued within the six-year period and because the acts and deeds of the conspirators are evidentiary admissible as to all conspirators who may have entered into the conspiracy later, the damages which accrued during the entire impact of the conspiracy is likewise a burden which MAC must assume. In this regard, it must be remembered that the conspiracy itself is not actionable. The statute of limitations does not begin to run from the date of the inception of the conspiracy. Rather, it begins from the date when an overt act of the conspirators produces damages. A continuing conspiracy as such is not actionable. It is the impact of the conspiracy which gives rise to a claim for damages, and it is the date of such impact of the wrong engendered by the conspiracy from which this statute of limitations begins to run. Imputing to a fellow conspirator the deeds and acts of his co-conspirators may perchance continue over a period of many years, but the wrong caused by the conspiracy sets in motion the applicable statute of limitations. Deeds and acts of fellow conspirators which are not followed by an overt act causing injury are not affected by the statute of limitations. One may be responsible for the acts and deeds of one conspirator if a co-conspirator, with knowledge of the purposes and objects thereof, enters into and upon the unlawful scheme, but to sustain an action for damages against such co-conspirator, it must be enforced by the commencement of an action within the statutory period after the damage complained of has occurred. Assume, for instance, that there are three conspirators and the conspiracy continues over a period which exceeds the applicable statute of limitations. However, two of the conspirators are not amenable to suit because of their absence from the jurisdiction of the Court and the statute of limitations by a state enactment is tolled as to them. The resident conspirator is not deprived of the applicable limitation statute merely because the statute has been tolled as to his fellow conspirators, although the acts and conduct of each of the conspirators extends over a period in excess of the six-year statute and may be proven in establishing the inception and continuing nature of the conspiracy. In absence of the tolling of the statute of limitations as to MAC by reason of Section 16, Title 15, U. S. C. A., there is no rational basis for the assumption that the imputation of the acts of the conspirators to a co-conspirator also embraces the tolling of the statute which may apply to one or more of the co-conspirators. Imputation to one conspirator of the onus of the acts of his fellow conspirators does not abrogate the particular statute of limitation which may be available to any one of the conspirators. This principle seems so patent and evident, and plaintiffs have cited no case to the contrary. Reference is made, however, to certain language found in Walder v. Paramount Publix Corp. [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,097], 1955, S. D. N. Y., 132 F. Supp. 920. Two of the defendants in that case, Paramount Pictures Corporation and American Broadcasting-Paramount, maintained that the complaint should be dismissed as to them because they were not formed until 1949 and could not be held for acts committed by other conspirators before they came into existence. In rejecting this contention, the court stated,

> "* * * This contention overlooks the fact that these defendants are charged with having joined a conspiracy continuing from 1928 to the filing of the complaint. Under well established principles of conspiracy law, they may be held as fully liable as the original or earlier participants in the conspiracy."

It should be noted, however, that in view of the factual situation therein, the import of the paragraph is not to the effect that general conspiracy law abrogates the effect of the statute of limitations. The court held that general conspiracy law imposes upon a latecomer to the conspiracy liability for prior acts of damage inflicted by other conspirators, but the case does not hold that this principle deprives the latecomer of the defense afforded him by the statute of limitations. The paragraph cited was written to answer the defendants' contention that liability could not be imposed upon them for acts done before they joined the conspiracy; it was not written to abolish the statute of limitations as to defendants who were latecomers to the conspiracy.

[Damages Limited to Six-Year Period]

It follows from the foregoing that defendant Minnesota Amusement Company is entitled to a partial summary judgment limiting damages which may be assessable against it to a period of six years prior to the commencement of this action. Judgment may be entered accordingly. It is so ordered.

An exception is allowed.

Case No. 1330 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Sherman Antitrust Act and Wilson Tariff Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Construction of Sherman Act and Wilson Tariff Act—Foreign Commerce—Import Trade.—In an action charging a conspiracy to restrain the importation of Japanese wire nails in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act and Section 73 of the Wilson Tariff Act, a motion to dismiss the Sherman Act charge on the ground that Section 73 of the Wilson Tariff Act applies the prohibitions of the Sherman Act to import trade and therefore, being the more specific statute, supersedes the Sherman Act with regard to import trade was denied. Both acts can be applied to restraints on import trade.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2035.350.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Construction of Sherman Act and Wilson Tariff Act—Foreign Commerce—Applicability of Foreign Law and Effect of Treaty.—In an action charging that American importers and an American subsidiary of a Japanese corporation conspired to restrain the importation of Japanese wire nails in violation of the Sherman Act and the Wilson Tariff Act, the defendants' contention that the principles of international law and comity of nations put the charges of the action within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Japanese courts or require that Japanese law be applied was rejected. Only American corporations and American nationals were named as defendants, and the only commerce sought to be regulated was the importation and sale of such nails in the United States. Even assuming that the alleged conspiracy had its situs in Japan and that most of the acts in furtherance of the alleged conspiracy had been done in Japan, a United States court was not deprived of jurisdiction since the conspiracy was alleged to have operated as a direct and substantial restraint on commerce of the United States. The fact that the conspiracy might be lawful in Japan was irrelevant. Also, a motion to dismiss the action on the basis of the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation between the United States and Japan was denied. Even if the Treaty were held to provide an exclusive remedy for antitrust violations, the defendants would have no standing to invoke it, since they were American corporations and subject to their country's own laws.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2035.350.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Criminal Prosecutions—Indictment—Motion to Strike Allegations as Surplusage.—A motion to strike as surplusage allegations of an indictment which related to the activities of foreign co-conspirators was denied on the ground that the allegations contained relevant facts pertaining to the formation of the alleged conspiracy, the acts done pursuant to the alleged conspiracy, and the effects of the conspiracy in the United States. Such a motion should not be granted unless it is clear that the allegations are not relevant and are prejudicial or inflammatory.

See Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8025.700.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Criminal Prosecutions—Indictment—Bill of Particulars.—A motion for a bill of particulars was granted to enable certain defendants properly to prepare their case and avoid surprise at trial because of the complexities of the action and the generality of the allegations of the indictment. However, another motion for a bill of particulars was denied in part because it would have required too great a disclosure of evidence on the Government's part.

See Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8025.800.

[Indictment]

EDWARD P. MURPHY, District Judge [In full text]: This is a criminal action charging a conspiracy in restraint of interstate and foreign commerce in Japanese wire nails, in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act [1] and Section 73 of the Wilson Tariff Act.[2] Brought together as defendants are five United States corporations which import Japanese wire nails for resale on the West Coast of the United States, three officers of these corporations, and an American subsidiary of a Japanese corporation which exports wire nails to the United States. In addition, a number of Japanese firms are named as co-conspirators but not joined as defendants.

Briefly, the facts alleged in the indictment are these. Although there are over 200 Japanese nail makers, the wire rod used in the manufacture of these nails is made by only five Japanese rod makers. With respect to wire nails to be sold on the West Coast of the United States, the defendant importers have engaged in a conspiracy with the five Japanese rod makers and certain Japanese exporters whereby the rod makers have furnished wire rod to nail makers only for the manufacture of nails to be sold and shipped through the co-conspirator exporters and to the defendant importers; the defendant importers in turn have purchased a designated amount of nails and have resold them in allocated sales territories at designated prices. The results of the conspiracy are that the defendant importers have acquired complete control of the Japanese wire nail market on the West Coast, all other importers, as well as direct purchasers, have been excluded from this market, competition in the sale of wire nails on the West Coast has been eliminated, and prices at which the nails are sold on the West Coast have been stabilized.

[1] 15 U. S. C., Sec. 1.
[2] 15 U. S. C., Sec. 8.

[Motions]

Various motions are before this court, and there are many duplications. For purposes of discussion, each motion will be deemed to have been made by all defendants unless otherwise noted.

I. Relationship of the Sherman Act and the Wilson Tariff Act

It is contended that Count One of the indictment, charging a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, must be dismissed in view of Count Two, which charges a violation of Section 73 of the Wilson Tariff Act. The ground urged for this dismissal is that Section 73 of the Wilson Tariff Act applies the prohibitions of the Sherman Act to import trade and therefore, being the more specific statute, it must be held to have superseded the Sherman Act with regard to import trade.

This motion merits no discussion. It is well settled that both acts can be applied to restraints on import trade. United States v. General Electric Co., et al. [1948-1949 Trade Cases ¶ 62,318], 80 F. Supp. 989, 1016-17 (S. D. N. Y. 1948); United States v. General Dyestuff Corp., et al. [1944-1945 Trade Cases ¶ 57,303], 57 F. Supp. 642, 648 (S. D. N. Y. 1944); cf. United States v. Sisal Sales Corp., et al., 274 U. S. 268 (1927). Accordingly, the motion to dismiss Count One of the indictment is denied. The alternative motion to require election between the two counts of the indictment is also denied.

II. Jurisdiction

Relying mainly on American Banana Co. v. United Fruit Co., 213 U. S. 347 (1909), the defendants strongly urge that the indictment reaches too far, that all or part of the alleged conspiracy and acts in furtherance of the conspiracy are beyond this court's jurisdiction, or at least that Japanese law controls in determining the legality of these activities.

At the outset, it should be made clear that there is no attempt here to regulate Japanese commerce as such, or to indict Japanese firms or Japanese nationals.[3] Only American corporations and American nationals are named as defendants. The only commerce sought to be regulated is the importation and sale of wire nails on the West Coast of the United States. Surely this is within the jurisdiction of United States courts. Japanese firms and activities in Japan are considered only in so far as they relate to the precise charge, against American defendants, of a conspiracy in restraint of trade in the importation and sale of wire nails on the West Coast of the United States. Under these circumstances, it is absurd to say that principles of international law and comity of nations put the charges of this indictment within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Japanese courts, or require that Japanese law be applied.

There seems to be some disagreement as to where the alleged conspiracy was formed. But assuming, arguendo, that the conspiracy at least "has its situs" in Japan and that most acts in furtherance of the conspiracy have been done in Japan, this does not deprive the court of jurisdiction where, as here, the conspiracy is alleged to operate as a direct and substantial restraint on interstate and foreign commerce of the United States. United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, et al. [1944-1945 Trade Cases ¶ 57,342], 148 F. 2d 416 (2d Cir. 1945); United States v. Timken Roller Bearing Co.

[3] Even if the Japanese co-conspirators had been joined as defendants, this would not in itself be cause for dismissal of the indictment. United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, et al. [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,342], 148 F. 2d 416 (2d Cir. 1945): United States v. American Tobacco Co., et al., 221 U. S. 106 (1911): United States v. Pacific & Arctic Railway & Navigation Co., et al., 228 U. S. 87 (1913).

[1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,380], 83 F. Supp. 284 (N. D. Ohio 1949), modified and aff'd [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,837], 341 U. S. 593 (1951).

Nor does the fact that the agreement may be lawful in Japan serve to make it lawful in this country. United States v. American Tobacco Co., et al., 221 U. S. 106 (1911). Defendants also press the point that if the situation were reversed—i.e., if the agreement concerned exportation of American products to Japan—the agreement would be under the aegis of the Webb-Pomerene Act.[4] Suffice it to say that the situation is not reversed.

Much is made of the fact that this is a criminal action. A criminal statute of course must be construed more strictly than a civil statute. But it requires no stretching of the Sherman Act to apply it to the facts of this case. The Supreme Court had no difficulty in similarly applying the Sherman Act in United States v. American Tobacco Co., et al., supra, and United States v. Pacific & Arctic Railway & Navigation Co., et al., 228 U. S. 87 (1913), both criminal actions.

As to American Banana Co. v. United Fruit Co., supra, to the extent that the case still has vigor in anti-trust actions, the facts in the instant action are far closer to those in United States v. Sisal Sales Corp., et al., supra, where it was held that the American Banana case did not apply.

One further point raised by the defendants in support of their motion goes to the evidentiary problems which will come up at trial because of the inclusion of these foreign elements in the indictment. But evidentiary difficulties do not divest a court of jurisdiction. As to the argument that the defendants should not be put to an explanation of the acts of their foreign co-conspirators, it should not be forgotten that the government will have the burden of proof in this action.

For the foregoing reasons, the motion to dismiss the indictment for lack of jurisdiction is denied.

III. Effect of the Treaty

In 1953 the United States and Japan entered into a Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation. The effect of the Treaty is to accord "national treatment" and "most favored nation treatment" by one party to nationals of the other party (I use the term "nationals" to include companies as well as individuals.) In other words, nationals of one party are not to be discriminated against by the other party.

Article XVIII of the Treaty states:

> 1. The two Parties agree that business practices which restrain competition, limit access to markets or foster monopolistic control, and which are engaged in or made effective by one or more private or public commercial enterprises or by combination, agreement or other arrangement among such enterprises, may have harmful effects upon commerce between their respective territories. Accordingly, each Party agrees upon the request of the other Party to consult with respect to any such practices and to take such measures as it deems appropriate with a view to eliminating such harmful effects.
> 2. * * *

It is contended by the defendants that Article XVIII provides the exclusive remedy available to the government in reaching the conspiracy charged in the indictment.

I cannot agree that Article XVIII was intended to provide any such exclusive remedy. The language of this Article is permissive rather than mandatory. If it had been intended that the Article should operate as a pro tanto revocation of the anti-trust laws, the Article could easily have been so worded. The tenor of the entire Treaty is equal treatment to nationals of the other party, not better treatment. In view of these considerations, I conclude that Article XVIII was intended to supplement the anti-trust laws, not replace them.

Even if Article XVIII were held to provide an exclusive remedy for anti-trust violations, the defendant importers would have no standing to invoke this Article. All are American corporations. Certainly the Treaty was not intended to exempt nationals from the sanctions of their own country's laws. Cf. Skiriotes v. State of Florida, 313 U. S. 69 (1941).

Nor do I think Kinoshita & Co., Ltd., U. S. A., would have any standing to invoke Article XVIII. Though wholly owned by a Japanese corporation, the defendant Kinoshita is an American corporation organized under the laws of California. Article XXII of the Treaty is the only article devoted to definition of terms used in the Treaty. After defining "national treatment" and "most favored nation treatment" in paragraphs 1 and 2, respectively, Article XXII goes on in paragraph 3 to define "companies", and then states:

> * * * Companies constituted under the applicable laws and regulations within the territories of either Party shall be deemed companies thereof and shall have their juridical status recognized within the territories of the other Party. (emphasis added)
> 4. * * *

Thus by the terms of the Treaty itself, as well as by established principles of law, a corporation organized under the laws of a given jurisdiction is a creature of that jurisdiction, with no greater rights, privileges or immunities than any other corporation of that jurisdiction.[5]

If co-conspirator Kinoshita & Co., Ltd., Tokyo had wished to retain its status as a Japanese corporation while doing business in this country, it could easily have operated through a branch. Having chosen instead to gain privileges accorded American corporations by operating through an American subsidiary, it has for most purposes surrendered its Japanese identity with respect to the activities of this subsidiary.

Article VII of the Treaty in no way weakens the above conclusion.[6] Although it equates domestic subsidiaries with their foreign parents, it does so only for purposes of that Article, which has the effect of according nationals of one party engaging in business within the territory of the other party the same treatment accorded nationals of the other party. For example, an American subsidiary of a Japanese parent is to have the same rights as any domestically owned American corporation. The Article nowhere attempts to give greater rights to such subsidiaries.

The motion to dismiss the indictment on the basis of the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation between the United States and Japan is therefore denied.

IV. Motion to Strike

As an alternative to dismissing the indictment for lack of jurisdiction, there is a motion pursuant to Rule 7(d) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure to strike as surplusage those allegations in the indictment which relate to the activities of the Japanese co-conspirators. A motion to strike allegations of an indictment as surplusage should not be granted unless it is clear that the allegations are not relevant and are prejudicial or inflammatory. United States v. Klein, et al., 124 F. Supp. 476, 479-80 (S. D. N. Y. 1954). Here the allegations which the defendants ask this court to strike are relevant facts relating to the formation of the conspiracy, acts done pursuant to the conspiracy, and the effects of the conspiracy in the United States. Accordingly, the motion to strike is denied.

V. Balfour, Guthrie & Co., Ltd.

In addition to concurring in most of the above motions, defendant Balfour, Guthrie & Co., Ltd., has moved for dismissal on the ground that it did not sign a proposed agreement for distribution of Japanese wire nails in the United States and on the further ground, as stated in a supporting affidavit, that its purchase of Japanese wire nails has been on an order-by-order basis and that it has "shopped around" for the best price. This position may be well taken. But without any evidence before it, without any elaboration of the government's general and broad indictment, at best it would be premature for this court to say that Balfour, Guthrie & Co., should be dropped as a defendant. Therefore, this motion is denied, without prejudice to renew the motion at a later stage of the proceedings.

---

[5] But of course, the rights of an alien owned corporation may be less than those of domestically owned corporations. See Clark v. Uebersee Finanz-Korporation, A. G., 332 U. S. 480 (1947); Daimler Co. v. Continental Tyre & Rubber Co., (1916) A. C. 307 (H. L.)

[6] The pertinent provisions of Article VII read: "1. Nationals and companies of either Party shall be accorded national treatment with respect to engaging in all types of commercial, industrial, financial and other business activities within the territories of the other Party, whether directly or by agent or through the medium of any form of lawful juridical entity. Accordingly, such nationals and companies shall permitted within such territories: (a) to establish and maintain branches, agencies, offices, factories and other establishments appropriate to the conduct of their business; (b) to organize companies under the general company laws of such other Party, and to acquire majority interests in companies of such other Party; and (c) to control and manage enterprises which they have established or acquired. Moreover, enterprises which they control, whether in the form of individual proprietorships, companies or otherwise, shall, in all that relates to the conduct of the activities thereof, be accorded treatment no less favorable than that accorded like enterprises controlled by nationals and companies of such other Party."

VI. Bill of Particulars

Essentially, there are two motions for bills of particulars. The motions of the following defendants are identical and will be considered as one motion: R. P. Oldham Co., Winter Wolff & Co., Inc.; R. P. Oldham, Jr.; Al Perrish; Thos. D. Stevenson & Sons, Inc.; and William L. McGee. The motion of Kinoshita & Co., Ltd., U.S.A. will be considered separately.

Because of the complexities of this case —particularly in its foreign aspect—and the generality of the allegations in the indictment, I feel that a bill of particulars is necessary here to enable the defedants properly to prepare their case and avoid surprise at trial.

Motions of R. P. Oldham Co., et al. The section numbers referred to here will be those used in the collective motion of Defendants R. P. Oldham Co., Winter Wolff & Co., Inc., R. P. Oldham, Jr., and Al Perrish. The corresponding section numbers used in the joint motion of defendants Thos. D. Stevenson & Sons, Inc., and William L. McGee shall be deemed ruled on in the same manner.

The following requests seek to ascertain the precise nature of the charges against the defendants, and are granted: Paragraphs I-IV, inclusive; V(a); VI-X, inclusive.

The remaining requests—Paragraph V(b), (c) and (d)—would require too great a disclosure of evidence on the government's part, and the defendants will be adequately apprised of the specific charges against them by the granting of the other requests. Accordingly, they are denied.

Motion of Kinoshita & Co., Ltd., U.S.A. The following requests, or portions thereof, relate to the theory of the government's case with respect to defendant Kinoshita & Co., Ltd., U.S.A., particularly the extent to which the government claims this defendant is responsible for, or in identity with, co-conspirators Kinoshita & Co., Ltd., Tokyo and Shigeru Kinoshita: Paragraphs I-III, inclusive; IV, with the exception of "and by what means" in each of subparagraphs (a), (b) and (c); V and VI; VII, with the exception of "and by what means" in each of subparagraphs (a), (b) and (c). These requests are granted.

Those portions of the requests which have not been granted above are denied. These particular portions relate too heavily to the government's evidence, and their denial will not substantially impair defendant Kinoshita in preparation of its case nor result in surprise at trial.

Order

All motions to dismiss and strike are denied. The motions for bills of particulars are granted to the extent stated in Section VI, supra, and are otherwise denied.

It is so ordered.

California Cartwright Act

Combinations and Conspiracies Under State Laws—Practices—Refusal to Renew Franchise—Agreement—Legality.—A damage judgment in favor of an automobile dealer, who alleged that a sales subsidiary of an automobile manufacturer refused to renew his dealer franchise pursuant to an agreement with a competitive automobile dealer to eliminate the plaintiff as a dealer, was reversed on the ground that the nonrenewal of the plaintiff's franchise did not constitute an unreasonable restraint of trade in violation of the California Cartwright Act. Evidence established that the defendants agreed to eliminate the plaintiff as a dealer with the intent to do away with his competition in the competitive area. But the mere fact that the defendants placed some literal restraint on competition does not, per se, establish a breach of the Cartwright Act. The antitrust laws are concerned only with unreasonable restraints. The reversal was based on two decisions under the Federal antitrust laws (Schwing Motor Co. Inc. v. Hudson Sales Corp., et al., 1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,292, 68,564, and Packard Motor Car Co., et al. v. Webster Motor Car Co., 1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,682).

Action for damages for breach of contract and for violation of the Cartwright Act. Judgment for plaintiff on first cause of action, affirmed; judgment for plaintiff on second cause of action, reversed; judgment for defendant Reath on second cause of action, affirmed.

[Causes of Action]

PETERS, Presiding Justice [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: In 1949 John Milton, a former Hudson automobile dealer in East Oakland, filed the complaint that ultimately resulted in the judgments and orders from which the appeals here involved have been taken. The fourth amended complaint, upon which the cause proceeded to trial, alleges two causes of action, the first for breach of contract, and the second for damages for a violation of the Cartwright Act. (Bus. & Prof. Code, §§ 16700-16758.)

The first cause of action names Hudson Sales Corporation, a wholly owned subsidiary of the corporation that manufactures Hudsons, as the sole defendant. It charges that from September 15, 1948, to September 30, 1949, Hudson, in bad faith, failed to supply Milton with his reasonable requirements of new cars in violation of the terms of the contract between them.

The second cause of action is a double damage claim under the Cartwright Act, alleging a conspiracy to restrain trade by not continuing Milton as a Hudson dealer after his contract expired in 1949. It names as defendants Hudson; two of its employees —Young and VanDerzee; a former employee—Lawson; the Walter W. Anderson Company—another Hudson dealer in East Oakland; Walter W. Anderson—the former manager and chief owner of that company; and Donald C. Reath, a former employee of Anderson.

Prior to trial Anderson and his company secured a dismissal of the action against them for lack of prosecution. The jury awarded Milton $35,750 against Hudson on the first cause of action. Hudson appeals from the judgment entered on that verdict. On the second cause of action the jury's verdict was in favor of defendant Reath, and Milton appeals from the judgment on that verdict. As to the other four defendants, Hudson, Lawson, Young and Van Derzee, the jury found a conspiracy to restrain trade, and fixed Milton's damages as $50,000 (which, doubled, means an award of $100,000). Judgment was entered on these verdicts. Thereafter, the trial court, as to the second cause of action, granted the four defendants a new trial. Milton appeals from the order granting the new trial. The four defendants against whom judgment had been entered on the second cause of action, appeal from that judgment. Thus, there are four appeals before us. The reporter's transcript totals nearly 2,500 pages, while the briefs exceed 300 pages.

THE CONTRACT ACTION

For the foregoing reasons the judgment on the contract action should be affirmed.

THE RESTRAINT OF TRADE ACTION

[Allegations]

In this cause of action Milton alleged, in substance, that, because of his successful operation and ability to attract customers who might otherwise buy from competing Hudson dealers, certain of such dealers and Hudson desired and planned to eliminate him as a dealer; that pursuant to such plan, Lawson, Hudson's zone manager, and defendant Anderson, another Hudson dealer, agreed that, in return for Anderson improving his selling facilities, Lawson would cause Hudson not to renew Milton's franchise; that defendant Reath was made a party to the agreement; that in exchange for the participation of Reath and Lawson they were both to receive a financial interest in the Anderson Company, a corporation subsequently to be formed; that defendants Young and VanDerzee became parties to this agreement to eliminate Milton as a competitor; that Lawson furthered the object of the agreement by refusing to sell Milton his needs and requirements for automobiles; that Milton's franchise was not renewed because of the efforts of defendants. It may be assumed that the facts amply support these allegations.

The question is whether such allegations and proof state or prove a cause of action under the Cartwright Act. We think not.

[Cartwright Act]

The parties agree that the relevant provisions of the Cartwright Act are sections 16720, 16726 and 16750 of the Business and Professions Code. Section 16720 reads, in part:

"A trust is a combination of capital, skill or acts by two or more persons for any of the following purposes:

"(a) To create or carry out restrictions in trade or commerce. . . .

"(c) To prevent competition in manufacturing, making, transportation, sale or purchase of merchandise, produce or any commodity."

Section 16726 provides: "Except as provided in this chapter, every trust is unlawful, against public policy and void."

Section 16750 permits, in a civil action under the act, the recovery of double the damage sustained by any "person who is injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden or declared unlawful by this chapter."

[Federal Law]

There have been relatively few California cases construing the Cartwright Act. As a result the parties quite properly refer principally to the federal law. There is little doubt that cases decided under the Sherman Act and the common law policy against restraint of trade are applicable to problems arising under the Cartwright Act. (People v. Building Maintenance etc. Assn. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,651], 41 Cal. 2d 719 [264 P. 2d 31]; Speegle v. Board of Fire Underwriters [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,493], 29 Cal. 2d 34 [172 P. 2d 867].) But the same does not apply to all of the cases decided under the Clayton Act. As was pointed out by Mr. Justice Dooling in Rolley, Inc. v. Merle Norman Cosmetics, Inc. [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,937], 129 Cal. App. 2d 844, 851 [278 P. 2d 63, 282 P. 2d 991], the Clayton Act is broader in its prohibitions than the Sherman Act, and, in the same respects, is broader than the Cartwright Act, so "that cases based on the Clayton Act are inapplicable here."

[The Appeals]

Before discussing the case law applicable to the problem presented some mention should be made about the order in which the various appeals here involved will be considered by this court. As already pointed out, the jury returned a $50,000 verdict (doubled, $100,000) against Hudson, Young, VanDerzee and Lawson. These four have appealed from the judgment entered on that verdict. Subsequently, the trial court granted a new trial to these four defendants on this cause of action. On their appeal from the judgment it is the contention of Hudson, et al., that they are entitled to a directed judgment in their favor because there is no proof of public injury, as distinguished from injury to Milton individually, and that such is required by the Cartwright Act.

Of course, normally where there are such double appeals the appeal from the order granting the new trial is first considered, and, if affirmed, the appeal from the judgment is dismissed. (3 Witkin, California Procedure, p. 2299.) But such procedure indicates that a new trial should be had. If, as Hudson, et al., contend, the allegations and proof, as a matter of law, are legally insufficient to state or prove a cause of action, it would be futile to permit a new trial. In that event, judgment should be entered for Hudson, et al. For that reason, since we have concluded that Milton has not alleged or proved a case under the Cartwright Act, we will first consider the appeal from the judgment by Hudson, et al.

[Rule of Reason]

There is no doubt, under the allegations and proof, that Hudson, et al., agreed to eliminate Milton as a dealer with the intent to do away with his competition in the Alameda County area. But the mere fact that Hudson, et al., placed some literal restraint on competition among East Bay dealers in Hudson automobiles by their agreement, does not, as claimed by Milton, per se, establish a breach of the Cartwright

Act. This is so, because nearly every business contract eliminates competition in the sense that it prevents other parties from coming into the transaction. It has been recognized for many years that antitrust laws are concerned only with unreasonable restraints. In Chicago Board of Trade v. United States, 246 U. S. 231, 238 [38 P. 2d 242, 62 L. Ed. 683], the Supreme Court pointed out:

> "Every agreement concerning trade, every regulation of trade, restrains. To bind, to restrain, is of their very essence. The true test of legality is whether the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps thereby promotes competition or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition."

In Lawson v. Woodmere, Inc. [1954 Trade Cases ¶ 67,904], 217 F. 2d 148, p. 151, it was said:

> "In the classic cases of Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, v. United States, [221 U. S. 1 (31 S. Ct. 502, 55 L. Ed. 619)] . . . and United States v. American Tobacco Co., [221 U. S. 106 (31 S. Ct. 632, 55 L. Ed. 663)] . . . the Supreme Court established the celebrated 'rule of reason' by holding that not all restraints of interstate commerce are within the ambit of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, but only those restraints which are undue or unreasonable. The Act does not cover restraints that are merely incidental, casual and immaterial."

The California Supreme Court has written (People v. Building Maintenance etc. Assn. [1954 Trade Cases ¶ 67,651], 41 Cal. 2d 719, 727 [264 P. 2d 31]):

> "[I]t may be assumed that the broad prohibitions of the Cartwright Act are subject to an implied exception similar to the one that validates reasonable restraints of trade under the federal Sherman Antitrust Act. [Citing the Standard Oil Co. case.]"

[Issue]

Thus, the real question involved is whether the nonrenewal of a dealer's contract under the circumstances here involved constituted an unreasonable restraint of trade. Milton, of course, contends that it did. In support he cites and discusses many cases, several decided under the Clayton Act. Hudson, et al., also cite many cases and arrive at the contrary conclusion. It is not necessary to discuss these cases because we think two recent federal cases are decisive of the controversy.

[Controlling Decisions]

The first of these is Schwing Motor Co. v. Hudson Sales Corp. [1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,292], 138 F. Supp. 899; affirmed and District Court opinion adopted as opinion of the Court of Appeals—[1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,564] 239 F. 2d 176. There, the respective courts decided on the pleadings that the plaintiff had failed to allege any cause of action under either the Sherman or Clayton Acts. The case there alleged was much stronger than the one here involved, in that as a result of the claimed illegal agreement between Hudson and another dealer only one Hudson dealer would have been left in the city of Baltimore. In the instant case there were many Hudson dealers left in Alameda County.

In the Schwing case the court stated the problem as follows (138 F. Supp. at p. 900):

> "The principal question . . . is whether an agreement between an automobile manufacturer and a retail dealer, pursuant to which the manufacturer refuses to renew expiring agreements with two other dealers, and gives the dealer a 'virtual monopoly' of the sale of one make of automobile in one city, is a combination or conspiracy to monopolize trade or commerce, . . . in violation of the Sherman Act and of the Clayton Act."

The amended complaints charged a conspiracy between Hudson and another dealer almost identical to the one here charged, with the results that, as here, plaintiff's dealership of some six years' standing was cancelled.

The court, citing many cases, pointed out that every manufacturer has a natural and complete monopoly of his product sold under his brand name. He may decide to sell his product to the public through dealers, and, if he does so, he may exercise his own independent discretion as to the parties with whom he will deal.

> "This is a common law right which the anti-trust laws have not destroyed." (P. 902.) "A refusal to deal becomes illegal only when it produces an unreasonable restraint of trade or a monopoly forbidden by the anti-trust laws." (P. 903.)

The court then pointed out that even an exclusive dealership is not per se invalid, particularly where the article to be sold is in direct competition with the products of other manufacturers. The court laid down the governing principles in the following language (p. 903):

"The main purpose of the anti-trust laws is to protect the public from monopolies and restraints of trade, and the individual right of action for treble damages is incidental and subordinate to that main purpose. [Citing cases.] Public injury alone justifies the threefold increase in damages. It is essential, therefore, that the complaint allege facts from which it can be determined that the conduct charged to be in violation of the anti-trust laws was reasonably calculated to prejudice the public interest by unduly restricting the free flow of interstate commerce. [Citing many cases.]"

The court then analyzed the allegations of the complaint—allegations quite similar, and, in some respects, stronger than those here involved. It is pointed out that there is no allegation that the alleged conspiracy caused a dearth of automobiles in general in the area or of Hudson automobiles in particular, nor is there an allegation that any member of the public who desired to do so was prevented from purchasing a Hudson by the agreement. Even if fewer Hudsons were sold because of the charged agreement, which was alleged in the Schwing case, "it does not follow that the public was injured or that there was any such restraint of trade as is forbidden by the anti-trust laws." (P. 904.) The court referred to Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,039], 310 U. S. 469 [60 S. Ct. 982, 84 L. Ed. 1311, 128 A. L. R. 1044], where it had been held that the public was not injured by the fact that because of the conspiracy 1,000 pairs of Apex stockings failed to move in interstate commerce, for the reason that the conspiracy did not affect the general market in hosiery and did not give the conspiring group the power to fix prices, restrict production or lessen quality with impunity. The general hosiery market remained in its normal competitive state:

"So, in the case at bar, the public was not injured by the alleged fact that 357 Hudson automobiles failed to move in interstate commerce, since the market in the general commodity, automobiles in all price ranges, remained in its normal competitive state. The Apex case emphasized market control as a prerequisite for violation of the Sherman Act. [Citing other cases.]" (P. 904.)

The court pointed out that neither Hudson nor the dealer with whom it conspired controlled the automobile market in Baltimore, Hudson selling, in the year in question, but about two per cent of all automobiles sold in the United States. It quoted from several cases holding that, without a restraint producing an effect upon the market in a commodity generally, there is no illegal restraint, and that a restraint which merely affects a relatively minor part of the highly competitive market of the general commodity is not illegal. The court held that the complaint was fatally defective because no

"horizontal conspiracy between competitors, no effort to extend the manufacturer's natural monopoly of its own product, no effort to establish market dominance and drive out the products of competitors, is alleged. . . . The question, of course, is what agreements tend 'unreasonably' to restrain interstate commerce, and whether the 'monopoly' is a true monopoly of a commodity, or merely the natural and proper monopoly which every manufacturer has of his own product in a highly competitive market." (Pp. 905-906.)

The court then stated that the right of a manufacturer to his "natural" monopoly

"is not to be lost simply because the manufacturer and the dealers discuss the matter before the expiring agency or dealership agreements terminate and are not renewed. . . .

"If the plaintiffs' contention were correct, it is hard to see how Hudson could ever reduce the number of its dealers in any given area after discussing the matter with the dealers involved, since the remaining dealers, whether one or two or three, would have a 'virtual monopoly' of the sale of new Hudson automobiles in the area." (P. 907.)

The court concluded "that the amended complaints do not show any unreasonable restraint of interstate commerce nor any monopoly forbidden by the anti-trust laws nor any injury to the public sufficient to support an action for treble damages." (P. 907.)

On appeal to the Court of Appeals the decision of the District Court was "adopted as the opinion of this court" for the reason that "we agree . . . that no violation of the Sherman or Clayton Acts . . . is alleged for reasons adequately stated in . . . [the] opinion." (Schwing Motor Co. v. Hudson Sales Corp. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,564], 239 F. 2d 176.)

The Schwing case is on all fours with the instant one. Except for changes of names, the opinion, in most respects, could be adopted in toto as the opinion on this phase of the instant case. If it states good law, and we think that it does, it is decisive of the present appeal.

In his briefs on this appeal Milton placed his greatest reliance on the case of Webster Motor Car Co. v. Packard Motor Car Co. [1955 Trade Cases ¶ 68,171], 135 F. Supp. 4. That case, too, is on all fours with the instant one, and undoubtedly the District Court decision relied upon supports the position taken by Milton. The Webster case was discussed in the Schwing case, and the Court of Appeals refused to follow it, holding it to have been erroneously decided. The Webster case was appealed. After the briefs were written in the instant case, the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit reversed the District Court. (Packard Motor Car Co. v. Webster Motor Car Co. [1957 Trade Cases ¶ 68,682], 243 F. 2d 418—decided April 18, 1957. Certiorari has been filed with the United States Supreme Court but has not yet been acted upon.

In the Webster case the action was based on alleged conspiracy between the Packard manufacturer and the plaintiff's rival car dealer to eliminate plaintiff as a Packard dealer and to install the rival dealer as the exclusive Packard seller in the Baltimore area. The case was submitted to the jury and a large verdict returned. This the Court of Appeals reversed, holding that, as a matter of law, no cause of action has been stated.

The Court of Appeals held that "[w]e think the defendants were entitled to judgment. We agree substantially with Schwing Motor Co. v. Hudson Sales Co. . . ." (P. 420.)

The court held that, under the facts alleged and proved, there was no monopoly or conspiracy to monopolize within the meaning of the Sherman Act. The court referred to and quoted from the so-called "cellophane" case decided by the Supreme Court of the United States after the Webster case had been decided by the District Court —United States v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. [1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,369], 351 U. S. 377 [76 S. Ct. 994, 100 L. Ed. 1264]. There the court had held that an agreement tending to create a monopoly had to be appraised in the terms of a competitive market for the product, and that where commodities are reasonably interchangeable by consumers for the same purposes, agreements restraining trade as to a portion of the general product are not illegal. Thus, although Du Pont produced 75 per cent of all cellophane in the country, there was no illegal monopoly. The Court of Appeals in the Webster case then held:

> "Since there are other cars 'reasonably interchangeable by consumers for the same purposes' as Packard cars and therefore in competition with Packards, an exclusive contract for marketing Packards does not create a monopoly. And there is no evidence of any attempt or conspiracy to create a monopoly, since there is no evidence of any attempt to get control of the relevant market." (P. 420.)

The court went on to hold that there was no illegal contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade, because only "unreasonable" restraints are prohibited. The court then held that if competition in the general product at both buyer and seller levels still exists, the challenged agreement that results in an exclusive dealership is not illegal. The court stated (p. 421):

> "The short of it is that a relatively small manufacturer, competing with large manufacturers, thought it advantageous to retain its largest dealer in Baltimore, and could not do so without agreeing to drop its other Baltimore dealers. To penalize the small manufacturer for competing in this way not only fails to promote the policy of the anti-trust laws but defeats it.
> ". . . That Packard had agreed with Zell [the competing dealer with whom Packard was alleged to have conspired] not to renew Webster's contract . . . is immaterial, not only because the agreement was legal, but also because it inflicted no damage."

One judge dissented in the Webster case. This judge not only agreed with the District Court in the case, but expressly refused to follow the Schwing case, holding that any restraint, a product of an agreement to restrain, is unreasonable and illegal. This conclusion is contrary to the decided cases.

[Rulings of Court]

Further discussion is unnecessary. These two cases are on all fours, and controlling. The judgment against Hudson, et al., must be reversed and the trial court directed to enter judgment in their favor. This disposition of this appeal necessarily disposes of all the other appeals.

It is therefore ordered:

1. The judgment on the first cause of action from which Hudson Sales Corporation appeals is affirmed;

2. The judgment against Hudson Sales Corporation, W. E. Young, N. K. VanDerzee and Frank J. Lawson on the second cause of action under the Cartwright Act is reversed, and the trial court directed to enter its judgment in their favor.

3. The appeal by John M. Milton from the order granting the new trial on the second cause of action is modified to provide that judgment should be entered for all the defendants, and, as so modified, is affirmed. Respondents to recover costs on this appeal.

4. The judgment entered in favor of Donald C. Reath on the second cause of action is affirmed.

[¶ 68,792] Technical Tape Corporation v. Minnesota Mining and Manufacturing Company.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. No. 337—October Term, 1956. Docket No. 24207. Argued April 12, 1957. Decided August 2, 1957.

Appeal from a judgment of the District Court, Southern District of New York, after a trial before BICKS, J., dismissing plaintiff's complaint, amended complaint and supplemental complaint, which sought a declaratory judgment that defendant's Drew Patent No. 2,177,627 was invalid, not infringed, and unenforceable; and sustaining the defendant's counterclaim for patent infringement, and adjudging the patent valid and infringed by plaintiff, and awarding the defendant an injunction and damages, and an accounting to ascertain the damages. Affirmed.

Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts

Combinations and Conspiracies—Exclusive Dealing—Tying Arrangements—Sufficiency of Evidence—Misuse of Patents as Defense To Infringement Claim.—An alleged infringer of a patent for a transparent adhesive tape did not establish that the patentee misused its patent by selling its transparent adhesive tape on the condition that the purchaser thereof buy other products of the patentee not covered by its patent or by selling its patented transparent adhesive tape on the condition that the purchaser thereof refrain from buying other adhesive tape products, not covered by its patent, from any other manufacturer. Therefore, the patentee was not barred from asserting patent infringement claims against the alleged infringer. A manufacturer has the right to stop dealing with a distributor who is acting unfairly towards his product or is trying to undermine his trade. It was not established in the instant case that the patentee's refusal to sell to certain distributors was done in bad faith and had as its purpose to substantially lessen competition, or had a tendency to create a monopoly. Also, there was no showing that competition had been foreclosed in a substantial share of the line of commerce affected. This was not a case where a manufacturer imposed a uniform exclusive dealing contract on its distributors.

Affirming a decision of the U. S. District Court, Southern District of New York, 1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,427.

Before: MEDINA and WATERMAN, Circuit Judges, and LEIBELL, District Judge.

[Prior Proceedings]

LEIBELL, District Judge [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: Plaintiff instituted this action on November 17, 1951, under the Declaratory Judgment Act (28 U. S. C. § 2201) to have the defendant's patent #2,177,627, issued to Richard Drew October 31, 1939[1] declared invalid, or, if valid, then not infringed. On a motion in the District Court the complaint was dismissed on the grounds that no justiciable controversy was stated upon which a claim for relief could be founded and that the court lacked jurisdiction. On appeal, this court (200 F. 2d 876) reversed and held that an amendment to the complaint in the interest of clarity, should be allowed. Then followed various procedural steps, resulting in an amended complaint, a supplemental complaint, the defendant's answer and plaintiff's reply. In its answer Minnesota set up a counterclaim for an injunction against further infringement of its patent by plaintiff, and for damages. Plaintiff's reply charged a misuse by defendant of its patent, in that defendant allegedly attempted to extend its patent monopoly to cover unpatented products, that defendant illegally restrained competition, and for those reasons a court of equity should not grant defendant any relief on its counterclaim.

The trial of this case before Judge Bicks took five weeks. On July 18, 1956, he filed his opinion [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,427] (143 F. Supp. 429) and on July 26th signed a judgment. The judgment declared that (a) all of the sixteen claims of the Drew patent are valid "except claim 9 as to which no adjudication of validity is made, no infringement of said claim having been found"; that (b) the plaintiff had infringed all the claims of the patent (except claim 9); that (c) defendant had not been guilty of inequitable conduct and was not barred from enforcing the patent; that (d) an injunction should issue enjoining and restraining the plaintiff from making or selling any transparent or colored non-fibrous, film-backed pressure-sensitive tape or sheeting embodying the invention of Letters Patent No. 2,177,627; that (e) defendant recover of the plaintiff the damages which defendant had sustained by reason of the aforesaid infringement; and that (f) plaintiff's complaint, amended complaint and supplemental complaint be dismissed with costs.

The patent expired October 31, 1956. Plaintiff-appellant has filed a substantial bond for any damages ultimately awarded.

[Appeal]

On this appeal Technical Tape contends (1) that there was no "invention" in what Drew did (Drew II patent, #2,177,627); (2) that there was no novelty in what Drew did because other patents anticipated Drew; (3) that plaintiff, Technical Tape, did not infringe the Drew II patent; (4) that Minnesota has abused whatever patent rights it may have had and is entitled to no relief.

[Validity of Patent]

Every judge before whom the validity of the Drew II patent (#2,177,627) was litigated in the District Court (Judges Barnes and Campbell in the Northern District of Illinois and Judge Bicks in the Southern District of New York) has held the Drew II patent valid. Judge Sparks and Judge Minton of the United States Court of Appeals (7th Cir.) and Judge Baltzell, a District Judge who sat with them and heard the appeals from the judgments entered on the decisions of Judge Barnes, upheld the validity of the Drew II patent (159 F. 2d 554). We have considered the evidence in this case on the issue of validity and we are convinced that Judge Bicks' finding of invention and validity should be sustained.

[Infringement]

Plaintiff's infringement of defendant's patent was deliberate. When he was seeking a license from Minnesota the plaintiff's president declared he would make a pressure-sensitive adhesive tape whether or not he got the license. He read the Drew II patent a hundred times. He persuaded

[1] The opening paragraph of Drew's patent #2,177,627 states:

"This invention relates to adhesive sheets having a backing with a non-fibrous surface (such as normal or waterproofed films of regenerated cellulose) and a coating of normally tacky and pressure-sensitive adhesive united thereto. While not limited thereto, the invention relates especially to transparent adhesive sheets, to adhesive sheets in the form of adhesive tapes which may be sold in stacked or coiled form, and to adhesive sheets or tapes which are well adapted to the sealing or securing of wrappers composed of non-fibrous lustrous cellulosic films and the like."

The adhesive tape made by defendant under the Drew patent is familiarly known as "Scotch" cellophane tape.

Beyer, an employee of Minnesota's, a quality control man who had access to and understood Minnesota's "standard books" which were in code, to enter plaintiff's employ in May 1951 and to head plaintiff's quality control department; and he advised Beyer to keep from his employer (Minnesota) the fact that he was to enter plaintiff's employ. He hired an expert, Shalita, who had made an infringing tape for Cofax Corporation. That was the tape involved in Minnesota's suit against Freydberg, and its suit against Bulkley, heard by Judge Barnes who held that the Cofax tape infringed Minnesota's tape. The judgments were affirmed in 159 F. 2d 554. Shalita had made tapes from the Drew patent examples. With that group around him, the president of the plaintiff-appellant herein, finally made a tape which was so similar to Minnesota's in every respect that at the trial even he could not tell the one from the other, without an identifying name on the core. The Technical Tape Corporation was a willful infringer. Colgate-Palmolive v. Carter, 230 F. 2d 855.

Defendant's Alleged "Misuse" of the Drew II Patent

As a special defense to defendant's counterclaim for patent infringement, plaintiff charges that the defendant has "misused" [6] the Drew II patent (#2,177,627), and does not come into court with clean hands; and therefore asks that defendant be denied any relief on its counterclaim. Plaintiff contends that 3M abused its patent monopoly on transparent adhesive tape (Drew II patent) in two ways: (1) by selling its transparent adhesive tape on the condition that the purchaser thereof buy other 3M tape not covered by the patent in suit (citing Morton Salt Co. v. Suppiger Co. [1940-1943 Trade Cases ¶ 56,176], 314 U. S. 488); and (2) by selling its patented transparent adhesive tape on the condition that the purchaser thereof refrain from buying other adhesive tape products, not covered by the patent in suit, from any other manufacturer (citing F. C. Russell Company v. Consumers Insulation Company [1955 Trade Cases ¶ 68,177], 226 F. 2d 373).

[Depositions]

To support the charge of "misuse" plaintiff took the depositions of six distributors, and at the trial produced oral testimony of a seventh distributor, and his wife.

The seven distributors are: Lloyd's Office Supply of Pawtucket, Rhode Island (an Industrial Tape Division account); Edwards Paper Company of Roxbury, Massachusetts (an Industrial Tape Division account); Southern Stamp and Stationery Company of Richmond, Virginia (an Industrial Tape Division account); Cammack Office Supply of Burlington, North Carolina (a Wholesale-Retail Tape Division account); Anchor Office Supply Company of Cleveland, Ohio (a Wholesale-Retail Tape Division account); Crown Office Supply Company of Chicago, Illinois (a Wholesale-Retail Tape Division account); and Aviation Service Supply Company of Denver, Colorado (an Automotive Tape Division account). Plaintiff also examined before trial Al Drew, defendant's New England District Sales Director of its Industrial Sales Division. Both sides read parts of Drew's deposition into the record of the trial. All the depositions were received as exhibits.

The defendant rebutted the charge of misuse, by the cross-examination of the distributors whose depositions were taken, [7]

[6] The charge of "misuse" is contained in the last paragraph of plaintiff's "Reply" as follows: "defendant sells its patented adhesive tape in commerce among the several states on the condition that the purchaser thereof shall buy adhesive tape, not covered by the patent in suit, from defendant, or its licensees; and that the purchaser shall refrain from buying adhesive tape not covered by the patent in suit from anyone other than defendant, or its licensees; whereby defendant unlawfully extends the monopoly, if any, of said patent to cover products not covered by any valid claim thereof."

[7] C. L. Arnold and his wife, Elizabeth, owners of the Lloyd's Office Supply Co. of Pawtucket, R. I., testified for the plaintiff, in part as follows:

The Lloyd Company's customers were mostly mills, factories, offices and governmental institutions. When Lloyd commenced business in 1949 it sold only the 3M line of tapes. In 1951 Lloyd took on Tech Tape products, which sold at a lower price. In September 1953 a 3M sales representative called on Mr. Arnold and told him that if he wished to continue selling 3M tape he would have to stop selling Tech Tape. Al Drew told Arnold that that was the defendant's policy. At the time there was an unfilled order for a customer named Glasscraft, a corporation in which Mr. Arnold had a stock interest. Later when Tech Tape came out with a new tape meeting Glasscraft's requirement Arnold sold Glasscraft some of that tape. Lloyd sells both "Technical" and "Industrial" tape products. About 81% of Lloyd's purchases of 3M tape from defendant, were on behalf of Glasscraft, to which defendant would ship direct.

Mr. Smith testified that he had no personal knowledge of the Lloyd company matter. Lloyd failed to meet defendant's requirements that by the cross-examination of the Arnolds, by using parts of the deposition of Al Drew, by testimony of Charles C. Smith, General Manager of the defendant's Cellophane Tape Division for the Wholesale-Retail trade, and by testimony of John J. Bennison, the Eastern Regional Sales Manager for the Industrial Trade Division of defendant.

[Trial Court Ruling]

Concerning the seven distributors, the trial judge stated in his opinion:

"The situation with respect to each of these seven distributors has been considered and the Court is satisfied that the conduct of 3M (the defendant) in each instance was motivated solely by honest business considerations in no wise related to an attempt to extend the monopoly of the Drew Patent."

[Jobbers]

A jobber who resorted to the disparagement of defendant's products in order to substitute other and cheaper brands of tape, including infringing brands of tape, where the customer wanted defendant's tapes; a jobber who did not deal fairly with defendant's products in displaying and selling them; a jobber who was more interested in the bulk of a distributor's buying should go to more than one customer, a policy that was in effect for a long time. Al Drew testified that the defendant did not have any policy under which defendant would refuse to sell any jobber unless he sold only 3M's tapes, and that he never offered Lloyd's any exclusive sales agreement. Bennison testified that the defendant had no exclusive dealing policy and no tie-in sales arrangement with any of its jobbers.

Mr. Trachtenberg of Edwards Paper Company of Roxbury, Mass., stated in his deposition taken by plaintiff in part as follows: That his company had been in business selling industrial customers since 1945, and that from 1947 to 1952 he had bought his tapes from the plaintiff (Technical Tape); that in 1952 he began to stock defendant's tapes. A salesman of defendant told him there was no reason why he could not handle defendant's tapes even though he was selling plaintiff's products. Early in 1953 defendant's agent cut him off, saying that it was pursuant to a new policy of exclusive handling, that if he handled any other tape he could not handle defendant's; and that an order he gave for 3M tape was refused by defendant in March 1953. On cross-examination it developed that in 1952 Edwards Paper Company made only five purchases of defendant's products, totalling $407.18 and two orders in January and February 1953 for $272.37; and that all of the purchases (except $40) were made for the benefit of a single customer (Ware Shoe Co.) whose requirements called for 3M tape No. 880 and who had purchased 3M tape before becoming a customer of Edwards. The Edwards Company had also sold about $100.00 worth of 3M masking tape (the Drew I patent) in 1952 and 1953.

Al Drew testified that he instructed a salesman, Mr. Burhoe, to notify the Edwards Company that it was no longer considered a distributor. One of the requirements for defendant's distributors was that the bulk of their sales should be to more than one customer. The Edwards Company's sales were practically all to one customer.

Mr. Smith had no personal knowledge of the Edwards Company matter, but he had heard about it. It was not in his subdivision. Mr. Bennison, who was Mr. Drew's superior, testified that the defendant had no exclusive dealing agreement or any tie-in sales arrangement with any of defendant's jobbers.

The deposition of Mr. Rosendorf, a partner in Southern Stamp and Stationery Co. of Richmond, Virginia, taken by plaintiff, was in part as follows: The Company sells a line of stationery supplies, office furniture and equipment and is one of the largest in Richmond. It purchased 3M products from 1942 to 1952, averaging about $40,000 a year. In 1953 it sold $25,000 of 3M products, mostly drop shipments and its principal customer was Reynolds Metals Co. In late 1952 Southern opened an account with Tech Tape as a distributor. In November 1953 two representatives of 3M called on Southern and complained that other makes of tape were being used in 3M dispensers. Southern was selling Tech tapes to the Reynolds Co., which was using it in 3M dispensers, acquired when Reynolds used 3M tape. The representatives of 3M said they would recommend that Southern be not allowed to sell 3M tape. In December 1953 Rosendorf was again visited by representatives who said Southern's orders for 3M tape would not be filled, that Southern could have them filled by "the other fellow," Tech Tape. Southern's orders for 1953 were mostly drop shipments to manufacturing customers. For the last nine months of 1953 Southern's total purchases of 3M tapes for store customers was only $194.96. In five of those nine months Southern made no such purchases. Southern was pushing Tech tape in preference to 3M's, even when the customer asked for 3M's tape, because Tech tape was cheaper and afforded Southern a larger profit. Only if the customer insisted on 3M tape did Southern sell him 3M. It was Southern's policy to do that. Mr. Smith testified that he did not know the details of the Southern Company matter.

Plaintiff took the deposition of Mr. Cammack, the owner of Cammack Office Supply of Burlington, North Carolina, who testified in part as follows: He had handled 3M products and those of Industrial Tape Corp. (a licensee of 3M) beginning 1946 or 1947; and some time later took on the Tech Tape line. In October 1953 he was visited by a salesman and a representative of 3M, who saw Tech Tape products on his shelves. They told him of the pending patent infringement suit. He said that he was going to continue selling Tech tape. He was again visited by 3M's salesman in January or February 1954, looking for an order. Although he was short on 3M products he limited his order to 3M dispensers and small sizes of pushing the sales of competitors' products to the detriment of defendant's products; a jobber with only a few customers, who made no effort to sell defendant's product; a jobber who faked so called "drop shipment" orders to mislead the defendant and thus gain a larger discount; a jobber who was habitually delinquent in paying his bills —jobbers who did any of those things were not desirable distributors of defendant's products and defendant was not required to continue them as distributors.

["Drop Shipment"]

A "drop shipment" order called for direct shipment of 3M's products to the jobber's customer. The jobber would receive a trade discount on such orders, because as a rule they were large and saved 3M warehousing expense. Some jobbers submitted fictitious orders and thereafter picked up the goods themselves to be utilized as stock inventory, thereby receiving a trade discount which was not given on purchases by jobbers for their own stock inventory.

Scotch tape. Next day he was told his order would not be filled. Between October 1953 and February 1954 he had made no effort to replenish his stock of 3M tape. He was selling Tech tape instead, and was displaying Tech cellophane tape in defendant's Scotch tape dispensers, which bore defendant's name. Mr. Smith of 3M testified that Cammack was not cut off and that he was still carried on the records of 3M's Atlanta Branch as an active customer.

Plaintiff took the deposition of Anchor Office Supply Co. of Cleveland, Ohio, through its president, Mr. Rosenblatt, who testified in part, as follows: The company was organized in June 1950 and handled office supplies and equipment and sold various types of tapes, including masking tape and cellophane tape. At first it handled 3M tape. It sold about $12,000 a year of 3M's cellophane tape and masking tape. In 1952 Anchor began handling Tech tape. In April 1954 when the City of Cleveland asked for bids on "Scotch" tape, Rosenblatt inquired if the City would accept a tape equally as good and he was the successful bidder and supplied Tech tape. Shortly thereafter two of 3M's salesmen came to see him about the bid and he was told that if he continued to sell Tech tape, 3M would be forced to take its line away from him. Rosenblatt stated that he then called the Department of Justice office in Cleveland to inquire if they could do that to him, and shortly thereafter (April 7th) received a letter from the Department saying that an investigator of the Department, an Agent of the F. B. I., would call upon him. Rosenblatt contended that the letter was in response to the telephone call. But the letter was from New York, not from Cleveland, and at that time an investigation of all the stationers in Cleveland was in progress, in connection with an indictment handed down against a local group of stationers early in 1954. Mr. Rosenblatt had been informed prior to his conversation with the two 3M representatives that there was a patent suit pending between 3M and Tech Tape. Since the conversation Anchor has purchased mainly one line of tape, 3M, but it has also purchased Tech tape to fill certain contracts on which Anchor submitted bids. There was some testimony that Anchor had sent a drop shipment order for 1152 rolls of 3M's tape for a small restaurant next door to Anchor's place of business (the inference being that the order was actually for Anchor itself), on which Anchor got an additional 7½% discount. Mr. Smith testified that the discussion with Rosenblatt and the differences between them had to do with the matter of Anchor's substituting Tech tape on orders for 3M tape, and also using fake drop shipments, all of which Anchor agreed to stop; and that 3M has never refused to sell Anchor.

Three representatives of the Crown Office Supply Company, of Chicago, Illinois, Mr. Avery, President, Mr. Ackerman, Vice-President, and Mr. Schultz, a purchasing officer, testified by deposition, in part as follows: The company first sold 3M's Scotch tape in the early 1930s. In 1939 or 1940 they sold defendant's "masking" tape. They ceased making purchases from defendant in December 1952. After the Tech line of products was taken on by Crown, 3M's products were no longer advertised in Crown's circulars but Tech Tape's were. Crown's twelve salesmen at the same time were instructed to tell their customers that Tech's line was a good line, comparable to what Crown had been selling (3M's), but sold at a lower price. When a customer asked for "Scotch" tape, defendant's product, Crown's salesmen would try to sell him the Tech tape product. Money-wise it was to Crown's advantage to push Tech tape. Crown had theretofore purchased an average of $30,000 to $40,000 of 3M tapes a year.

In December 1952 two representatives of defendant called upon Crown with a Crown trade circular. Crown's business with 3M had fallen off in the last few months. Crown's circular was pushing Technical Tape's products and did not mention 3M's. Crown allegedly was told that if it continued selling Tech tape the defendant would not sell Crown any more. Orders sent 3M were refused.

Mr. Smith, for defendant, testified that Crown was substituting Tech tape on customers' orders for Scotch tape, and that Crown was told that unless it stopped that practice, defendant did not want to do business with it. Crown also, according to Mr. Smith, had submitted false drop-delivery orders to 3M, in order to gain an additional discount. Crown had put out the trade booklet above mentioned. Mr. Smith sent a representative to protest against these unfair and discriminatory practices.

Plaintiff also took the deposition of Mr. Christensen, Treasurer and Chairman of Aviation Service Supply Company of Denver, Colorado. At one time the company carried the tape products of Industrial Tape Corp., 3M and Tech Tape Corp. It is no longer an authorized distributor of 3M products. Aviation tried to become a distributor for 3M, but defendant was unable to meet the requirements of its current jobbers. Aviation then became a distributor

["Select Distributorship Policy"]

The so-called "select distributorship policy" concerning which Al Drew was examined, was developed by the Industrial Tape Division about mid-summer of 1953. It did not apply to any other tape division of the 3M organization. Two of the five distributors (Aviation and Crown), alleged to have been cut-off because of their refusal to agree to the select distributorship policy, were not industrial jobbers within the jurisdiction of 3M's Industrial Tape Division.

As to the three remaining, Southern was cut-off from 3M's tape products in December of 1953 for reasons stated herein in footnote 7. There is nothing in the testimony to support plaintiff's contention that Southern was cut-off because it refused to accept the so-called "select distributorship policy." Likewise there was no connection between Edwards being cut-off as a 3M distributor and the select distributorship policy of the 3M Industrial Tape Division. Edwards was cut-off for other reasons, as indicated in footnote 7, some four or five months prior to the time the "select distributorship policy" was proposed by 3M's Industrial Tape Division.

The testimony of Arnold and his wife (Lloyd's Office Supply Co.) that in September of 1953 he was informed that 3M had a new company policy and that under such policy Lloyd, if it wished to continue selling 3M tape would have to agree to stop selling Technical Tape, and that when he refused he was cut-off, was inconsistent with the testimony of Al Drew, who denied that any proposal of select distributorship was made to Lloyd's Office Supply Company, and was inconsistent with the testimony of Bennison and Smith, witnesses at the trial, who testified that 3M does not have a sales policy requiring a jobber or distributor to sell only 3M tape and to refrain from selling other competitive brands. Apparently the trial judge accepted the testimony of Messrs. Bennison and Smith, which he had a right to do. He saw and heard the witnesses in question.

As stated in International Bureau v. Bethlehem Steel Co., 2 Cir., 192 F. 2d 304, 306:

> "It is a familiar principle that on appeal in cases tried by the court without a jury findings of fact will be given effect unless shown to be clearly erroneous. [citing cases]. And, indeed, that principle, together with the correlative one that due regard be given to the opportunity of a trial judge in a non-jury case to determine the credibility of witnesses who appear and testify before him, is firmly embodied in Rule 52(a) F. R. C. P., 28 U. S. C. A."

The trial judge did not specifically discuss Al Drew's testimony [8] in his opinion, for Industrial Tape and sold as much as $7,000 a month of its products. Late in September 1953, Aviation agreed, at the request of several customers, to become a distributor of 3M products. An arrangement was made, expressed in correspondence.

In the Spring of 1954 a representative of 3M called on Christensen concerning a bid in which Aviation had quoted and specified Tech tape. Christensen testified that further visits were made and that he was informed that because of Aviation's activities with competing lines, 3M felt it could not properly represent and promote 3M's products and that it was no longer an authorized distributor and could return 3M merchandise for credit. There was some correspondence between the two companies.

On Christensen's cross-examination it was developed that at times Aviation's salesmen would attempt to sell Tech tape to customers who had specified 3M tape; that Aviation permitted its office facilities to be utilized by Tech Tape sales representatives as a base of operations, and that Aviation had been tardy in paying its bills to 3M. When Aviation and 3M came to a parting of the ways in March 1954, Mr. Christensen wrote 3M: "We wish to thank you for past favors you have rendered our company and wish to express our regrets for the circumstances which had made this necessary." On the same day Mr. Christensen wrote Tech Tape a letter condemning defendant and enclosing copies of Aviation's correspondence with defendant, for plaintiff's use. Mr. Smith knew none of the details of the Aviation Company matter.

[8] The witness, Albert Drew (a brother of the inventor) whose deposition was taken by plaintiff, stated in the first part of his deposition, that he had submitted to a number of jobbers in New England the proposal that they handle only 3M's pressure-sensitive adhesive tape.

He was asked by plaintiff's counsel whether he had made any "gentlemen's understandings or agreements" with any jobbers or distributors to handle 3M tape exclusively. Drew answered: "In this respect: That we have proposed certain things and they have or have not accepted them." When asked what things he had proposed, Drew answered: "We have proposed to certain distributors that we think are qualified that we furnish them with all the product knowledge we have as salesmen; the facilities of our laboratory; the facilities of our customer engineering group, our merchandising group, and our sales force, and to teach them as much as we can of what we know about the application of pressure-sensitive tapes; where the customers may be found or where they are likely to be found, according to application; to make them as good salesmen for our tapes as we think we ourselves are."

but he did state (as a finding of fact based on the evidence) that defendant distributes its products through upwards of 30,000 outlets, including 6,000 paper wholesalers and 4,000 commercial stationers; that many thousands of defendant's distributors and jobbers handle competitive tapes and that "3M" (Minnesota) has never required either that they handle its tapes exclusively; or that as a condition of buying one type of 3M tape, that they should also buy another.[9]

The trial record on the issue of the so-called "select distributorship policy" proposal, shows that the proposal was made only to certain jobbers or distributors, who were thought to be qualified and not to all the jobbers served by 3M's Industrial Tape Division; that the proposal was not made on any either-or basis, i. e. that if rejected the distributor would be cut off from 3M products; that the acceptance was purely voluntary on the part of the jobber; that

Al Drew testified that these suggestions or proposals were made to jobbers or distributors in the industrial tape division; and that he first made such proposals in the middle of the summer of 1953. Prior to that time 3M provided technical service and assistance to its industrial jobbers and distributors, but in a limited way. Under the new proposal the amount of technical assistance available would be increased. Drew testified that his action in offering such proposals to certain qualified jobbers was reported to his superiors and that they did not disapprove of it.

Of the 25 or 30 who accepted the proposal, all but five or six of the jobbers had always done business with 3M and sold only 3M tape. Five or six, who agreed to give the proposal a trial, had carried pressure-sensitive tapes made by 3M competitors.

Al Drew testified that 3M's general policy with regard to industrial distributors and jobbers, handling or about to handle pressure-sensitive adhesive tape, was that the jobber or distributor have an office and a warehouse; that he have a sales force of at least one, other than the owner; that he have a good credit record; that he have contact with manufacturers who would be 3M customers; that he agree to maintain an adequate stock of 3M tape items so as to properly take care of the immediate needs of its customers; that he have more than one customer using 3M products; and that the bulk of his buying or purchases should be resold to more than one customer. Mr. Drew further testified that this policy was in effect in 1950 and applies with equal force today. Drew defined an industrial distributor or jobber as one whose customers are manufacturing plants, mills and factories. He also testified that defendant did not have any policy of refusing to sell a distributor or jobber because he handled competitive tapes.

[9] Mr. Smith, general manager of the Cellophane Tape Division of 3M, and Mr. Bennison, Eastern Regional Sales Manager of the Industrial Tape Division, testified before the trial judge as witnesses for the defendant 3M.

Mr. Bennison's testimony was short and he was not cross-examined. He testified that he was employed by 3M for over eighteen years and supervised the industrial tape sales for the Eastern Seaboard. His salesmen would call on manufacturing concerns and distributors who serviced that class of trade. He stated that sales to industrial distributors were not made on any condition that the distributor deal only in 3M tape; that the distributors who purchased 3M tape also purchased tape from others; that 3M made no tie-in sale arrangement with its distributors; that no jobber was required to handle any one type of tape in order to purchase another; and that the customers of the jobbers pretty well determined what the jobber would buy.

Mr. Smith described the managerial set up of 3M. He testified that 3M has three tape divisions, each one headed by a general manager; that he had been general manager of the 3M Cellophane Tape Division for a number of years; that one of the other two divisions dealt with insulation tape; and the third with all other types of tape; that each division had regional sales managers who in turn had district sales managers. Mr. Smith also testified that the Cellophane Tape Division had two subdivisions, the Industrial subdivision and the Wholesale and Retail subdivision; that each of the subdivisions had its own general manager; that the Wholesale-Retail subdivisions serviced the retail trade through jobbers, and sold principally cellophane tape; that the Industrial division sold to manufacturers through jobbers or distributors, whose sales are mainly of tapes other than cellophane, although they may also sell cellophane tape to industrial users; and that Al Drew was a district sales manager for the Industrial Tape Division.

Mr. Smith also testified that 3M did not require its distributors or jobbers to handle 3M tape exclusively; that many thousands of them carried competing brands; that no jobber is required to buy any other type of 3M tape in order to buy a particular type; that some jobbers handled only one type of 3M tape; that the jobber himself decides what he wants to buy, based on his customers' needs. Mr. Smith also testified that 3M never had any policy of exclusive distributorship for a given territory; that any jobber or distributor may purchase 3M tape, if he can qualify as such.

Smith further testified that while district sales managers possessed a discretion as to how they would handle their own accounts, they were supposed to conform to established policies; that prior to December 1953 it was the policy to leave the matter of distribution and distributors to the field managers, i.e., the regional managers of 3M; that he had heard that the Industrial Tape Division was operating under what they called a select distributorship policy, but that it did not apply to his Wholesale-Retail Division, although some distributors were in both divisions. The select distributorship policy involved a closer cooperation with the distributor in terms of direct selling, engineering services, technical assistance and the like; the select distributors did not carry 3M tapes exclusively.

the proposal was rejected by some distributors; that those who rejected the proposal were not cut off from 3M products; and that those who accepted the proposals received increased technical service and assistance while those who rejected the proposals, together with other jobbers or distributors who did not qualify, continued to receive 3M products and the technical service and assistance theretofore given them. This fact situation in the case at bar is in no way comparable to that before the Third Circuit in F. C. Russell Company v. Consumers Insulating Company, supra.

The trial judge also found that a large percentage of distributors identified by the President of Technical Tape as 3M distributors in the New York area are, according to his testimony, also distributors of Technical Tape's products; and that many Technical Tape jobbers or distributors also handle 3M products.

[No Antitrust Violations]

The trial court's opinion refers to the practices condemned by the doctrine of the Morton Salt Co. v. G. S. Suppiger Co. [1940-1943 Trade Cases ¶ 56,176], 314 U. S. 488 (which declared that a court of equity will not lend its aid to protect a patent monopoly when the patentee is using the patent as an effective means of restraining competition with the sale of its unpatented articles) the trial court stated: "There has been a complete failure of proof that the sales policy of 3M falls within the interdicted conduct." And there is no proof that defendant violated Section 3 of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C. § 14).[10] In fact the proof is to the contrary. The defense of "misuse" by defendant of its Drew II patent, appears to be something that plaintiff sought in vain to construct, in order to escape the consequences of its own deliberate and profitable infringement.

A manufacturer has the right to stop dealing with a distributor or jobber who is acting unfairly towards his product or is trying to undermine his trade. That seems to be a proper corollary of Eastern States Lumber Ass'n v. United States, 234 U. S. 600 at page 614, where it was held that:

> "A retail dealer has the unquestioned right to stop dealing with a wholesaler for reasons sufficient to himself, and may do so because he thinks such dealer is acting unfairly in trying to undermine his trade."

Ordinarily a manufacturer may refuse to deal with a distributor or jobber for reasons sufficient to himself. United States v. Colgate & Co., 250 U. S. 300, 307; United States v. Schrader's Son, Inc., 252 U. S. 85, 97; and Brosious v. Pepsi-Cola Co., 3 Cir. [1946-1947 Trade Cases ¶ 57,459], 155 F. 2d 99, 101-102. Of course, this right of a manufacturer must be exercised in good faith, and within the restrictions of the Clayton Act, and may not be exercised in such a manner so as to "substantially lessen competition" or "tend to create a monopoly" in any line of commerce.

The record in the case does not establish that 3M's refusal to sell to five of the abovenamed distributors was done in bad faith, and had as its purpose to substantially lessen competition, or had a tendency to create a monopoly. Further, the Clayton Act was not intended to reach every remote lessening of competition. Standard Fashion Co. v. Magrane-Houston Co., 258 U. S. 346, 356-357.

There has been no showing here that "competition has been foreclosed in a substantial share of the line of commerce affected," by the so-called select distributorship policy. Standard Oil Co. v. United States [1948-1949 Trade Cases ¶ 62,432], 337 U. S. 293; Dictograph Products v. Federal Trade Commission, 2 Cir. [1955 Trade Cases ¶ 67,932], 217 F. 2d 821, 825. This is not a case where the manufacturer imposed a uniform exclusive dealing contract on its jobbers and distributors, such as was the situation in the Dictograph and Russell cases, hereinbefore cited, on which plaintiff relies.

[Affirmed]

The judgment of the District Court is in all respects affirmed.

PER CURIAM [In full text]: Petition for rehearing denied.

Chief Judge CLARK dissents in separate opinion.

[Dissenting Opinion]

CLARK, Chief Judge (dissenting): In view of the consideration which has been given to the suggestion for a hearing in banc, I deem a short note as to the present state of "second circuit law" hereon desirable, notwithstanding the extensive statements in our former opinions now published as 2 Cir. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,577], 239 F. 2d 555.

Since one judge has died and another is disqualified, only four judges were available to vote on a hearing in banc; as the votes were equally divided, the majority required by 28 U. S. C. § 46(c) for such hearing is lacking. While decision is thus afforded for the present case, it is obvious that precedents for the future must remain uncertain. The majority herein cite and purport to follow the Laskey-Austin decision, 2 Cir. [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,103], 224 F. 2d 824 certiorari denied 350 U. S. 932; and hence it is to be taken as law, even though I feel convinced that my brothers have quite departed from its wording and purpose. And the difficulty is not lessened because, as seems clear to me, careful scholars and judges have interpreted the former decision (for whose apparent ambiguities I have to accept responsibility) as do I. See United States v. Standard Oil Co. (N. J.). D. C. S. D. N. Y., 136 F. Supp. 345, 363, 364; Note, 69 Harv. L. Rev. 1339, 1341; Note, 3 U. C. L. A. L. Rev. 105; Kaufman, The Former Government Attorney and the Canons of Professional Ethics, 70 Harv. L. Rev. 657. This tangled situation must therefore await future development.

I do deem it proper to point out that appellees' brief on the petition for rehearing affords convincing support for my conclusion that the only similarity between the issues to be tried in the present two cases and the issues in the cases Isacson started while in partnership with Malkan is the Paramount decree, which is of course public property. The real issues at trial—competitive conditions in the neighborhood of the present theatres, linking the neighborhood with the national conspiracy, proof of damages—are entirely different in the different cases. Appellees underline this by seeking support for the disqualification by reason of Malkan's unethical solicitation of clients. But only recently we explained with some precision why that should not be a means by which one party can deprive an opponent of his counsel. Fisher Studio v. Loew's Incorporated, 2 Cir. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,305], 232 F. 2d 199, 204, certiorari denied 352 U. S. 836.

Wool Products Labeling Act

Wool Labeling—Enforcement of Wool Products Labeling Act—Right of Private Party to Maintain Damage Action.—A complaint by a private party seeking damages for an alleged violation of the Wool Products Labeling Act was dismissed on the ground that the Act affords no relief to private persons. The Federal Trade Commission has the sole authority under the Wool Products Labeling Act to enforce its provisions.

See Wool Labeling, Vol. 2, ¶ 6535.

[Dismissal of Complaint]

FINE, Justice [In full text]: Motion to dismiss complaint for insufficiency is granted. The complaint sets forth two causes of action based upon defendant's violation of the provisions of the Wool Product Labeling Act (15 U. S. C. A., sec. 68-68j.) in mislabeling the contents of woolen goods purchased by plaintiff from the defendant which the latter warranted were properly labeled in conformity with the act. Under that act any violation of its provisions with respect to a mislabeling constitutes an unfair method of competition and an unfair and deceptive act or practice in commerce. Since the Federal Trade Commission has the sole authority under the act to enforce its provisions and the act affords no relief to private persons, plaintiff may not institute the present action to recover damages for any violation thereof. If the plaintiff sees fit to plead a cause of action for breach of warranty under section 130 of the Personal Property Law, or on some other legal basis, leave is granted to serve an amended complaint accordingly within twenty days after service of a copy of this order.

Ohio Antitrust (Valentine) Act

Combinations and Conspiracies Under State Antitrust Laws—Price Fixing—Labor Union and Common Carriers—Applicability of Federal Antitrust Laws and National Labor Relations Act.—A provision of a contract between a teamsters' union and a group of motor carriers which largely superseded and nullified the terms of an agreement under which an owner of trucks and trailers leased his equipment to the motor carriers, and which fixed the prices to be paid for the use of trucks and trailers owned by persons who leased such equipment to the motor carriers, violated the Ohio antitrust laws and therefore was void and unenforceable. An Ohio court had jurisdiction to declare the contract provision illegal under the state antitrust laws. The Federal Government does not retain exclusively to itself the right to remedy the evils resulting from contracts between interstate carriers and unions found to be in restraint of trade. The Federal antitrust laws do not occupy the entire field to the exclusion of state laws. Also, there was no labor dispute within the exclusive jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board, and there was no remedy available to the owner under the Federal labor laws.

Opinion

[Nature of Suit]

DOYLE, Judge [In full text]: This is an action brought by Revel Oliver, the owner of tractors and trailers, each of which is under a lease agreement with one or the other of the two appellee companies — A. C. E. Transportation Co., Inc., and Interstate Truck Service, Inc.—which are common carriers engaged in transporting freight for hire by motor equipment on the highways of this and other states under certificates of convenience and necessity issued by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Public Utilities Commission of Ohio; the other original defendants, with the exception of the appellants in this Court, having been dismissed by plaintiff in the trial court.

The purpose of the action is to restrain the appellee carriers, the appellant Union (Local 24 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America), and the appellant Kenneth Burke, as president and business agent of said Local 24, from enforcement of a contract entered into by them, which it is claimed would supersede the owner-operator and carriers' existing lease agreement, and would restrict trade and create a monopoly in the business of leasing equipment, in violation of Sec. 1331.01, R. C., et seq. (Valentine Act).

[Contentions]

The defendant Union asserts that the sole jurisdiction is in the National Labor Relations Board; that if any violation of law exists, it is a violation of the Federal Antitrust Laws, rather than the state laws; and that the matter is one falling within the field of collective bargaining and other legitimate fields of agreement between employer and employee.

The plaintiff states that:

"* * * we are not here concerned with a labor dispute. Nor do we seek an interpretation of, nor attempt an assault upon, the agreement as it deals with the wages and conditions of employees of the carriers, nor the right of the union and carriers to negotiate and execute a collective bargaining contract covering the subject matter which is within their field to negotiate.

"Our problem here is, may the carriers and Union fix by agreement the price to be charged for the use of and the supervision of the trucks and trailers used in the trucking business, owned by individuals who lease the equipment to the carriers. This and nothing else is here involved."

[Contract Provisions]

The subject of the controversy is Article 32 of the contract between the Union and the carriers, which became effective during the life of leases between the owner-operator and the carriers. The provisions are:

"Owner-Operators.

"Section 1. Owner-operators (See Note), other than certificated or permitted carriers, shall not be covered by this Agreement, unless affiliated by lease with a certificated or permitted carrier which is required to operate in full compliance with all the provisions of this Agreement and holding proper ICC and state certificates and permits. Such owner-operators shall operate exclusively in such service and for no other interests.

"(Note: Whenever 'owner-operator' is used in this article, it means 'owner-driver' only, and nothing in this article shall apply to any equipment leased except where owner is also employed as a driver.)

"Section 2. This type of operator's compensation for wages and working conditions shall be in full accordance with all the provisions of this Agreement. The owner-operator shall have seniority as a driver only.

"Section 3. Certificate and title to the equipment must be in the name of the actual owner.

"Section 4. In all cases, hired or leased equipment shall be operated by an employee of the certificated or permitted carrier. The employer expressly reserves the right to control the manner, means and details of, and by which, the owner-operator performs his services, as well as the ends to be accomplished.

"Section 5. Certificated or permitted carriers shall use their own available equipment, together with all leased equipment under minimum thirty-day bona fide lease arrangements, on a rotating board, before hiring any extra equipment.

"Section 6. Separate checks shall be issued by the certificated or permitted carriers for driver's wages and equipment rental. At no time shall the equipment check be for less than actual miles operated. Separate checks for drivers shall not be deducted from the minimum truck rental revenue. The driver shall turn in time direct to the certificated or permitted carrier. All monies due the owner-operator may be held no longer than two weeks, except where the lease of equipment agreement is terminated and in such cases all monies due the operator may be held no longer than thirty (30) days from the date of the termination of the operation of the equipment.

"Section 7. Payment for equipment service shall be handled by the issuance of a check for the full mileage operated, tonnage or percentage, less any agreed advances. A statement of any charges by the certificated or permitted carrier shall be issued at the same time, but shall not be deducted in advance.

"Section 8. The owner-operator shall have complete freedom to purchase gasoline, oil, grease, tires, tubes, etc., including repair work, at any place where efficient service and satisfactory products can be obtained at the most favorable prices.

"Section 9. There shall be no deduction pertaining to equipment operation for any reason whatsoever.

"Section 10. The employer or certificated or permitted carrier hereby agrees to pay road or mile tax, social security tax, compensation insurance, public liability and property damage insurance, bridge tolls, fees for certificates, permits and travel orders, fines and penalties for inadequate certificates, license fees, weight tax and wheel tax, and for loss of driving time due to waiting at state lines, and also cargo insurance. It is expressly understood that the owner-driver shall pay the license fees in the state in which title is registered.

"All tolls, no matter how computed, must be paid by the Employer regardless of any agreement to the contrary.

"All taxes or additional charges imposed by law relating to actual truck operation and use of highways, no matter how computed or named, shall be paid by the Carrier, excepting only vehicle licensing as such, in the state where title is registered.

"Section 11. There shall be no interest, or handling charge on earned money advanced prior to the regular pay day.

"Section 12. (a) All certificated or permitted carriers hiring or leasing equipment owned and driven by the owner-driver shall file a true copy of the lease agreement covering the owner-driven equipment with the Joint State Committees. The terms of the lease shall cover only the equipment owned and driven by the owner-driver and shall be in complete accord with the minimum rates and conditions provided herein, plus the full wage rate and supplementary allowances for drivers as embodied elsewhere in this Agreement.

"(b) The minimum rate for leased equipment owned and driven by the owner-driver shall be:

	Per mile
Single axle, tractor only....	9½¢
Tandem axle, tractor only ..	10¢
Single axle, trailer only....	3¢
Tandem axle, trailer only..	4¢

75% of the above rates to apply for deadheading, if and when ordered, provided, however, that the 75% rate will apply only on first empty dispatch away from the home terminal; thereafter the full equipment rental rate to apply until driver is redispatched from home terminal; the above rates to be based on 23,000-pound load limit. On load limits over 23,000 pounds, there shall be one-half (½) cent additional per mile for each 1,000 pounds or fraction thereof in excess of 23,000 pounds. There shall be a minimum guarantee of 24,000 pounds for leased equipment owned and driven by the owner-driver. Nothing herein shall apply to leased equipment not owned by a driver.

"The minimum rates set forth above result from the joint determination of the parties that such rates represent only the actual cost of operating such equipment. The parties have not attempted to negotiate a profit for the owner-driver.

"Section 13. Driver-owner mileage scale does not include use of equipment for pickup or delivery at point of origin terminal or at point of destination terminal, but shall be subject to negotiations between the Local Union and Company. Failure to agree shall be submitted to the grievance procedure.

"Section 14. There shall be no reductions where the present basis of payment is higher than the minimum established herein for this type of operation. Where owner-operator is paid on a percentage or tonnage basis and the operating company reduces its tariff, the percentage or tonnage basis of payment shall be automatically adjusted so that the owner-operator suffers no reduction in equipment rental or wages, or both.

"Section 15. It is further understood and agreed that any arrangements which have heretofore been entered into between members of this Union, either among themselves or with the employer or with the aid of the Employer, applicable to owner-driver equipment contrary to the terms hereof, shall be dissolved or modified within thirty (30) days after the signing of this Agreement so that such arrangements shall apply only to equipment of the owner-driver while being driven by such owner-driver. In the event that the parties cannot agree on a method of dissolution or modification of such arrangement to make the same conform to this Agreement, the question of dissolution or modification shall be submitted to arbitration, each party to select one member of the arbitration board, and the two so selected to choose a third member of said board. If the two cannot agree upon the third within five (5) days, he shall be appointed by the Joint State Committee. The decision of said board to be final and binding.

"Section 16. It is further agreed that the intent of this clause and this entire Agreement is to assure the payment of the Union scale of wages as provided in this Agreement and to prohibit the making and carrying out of any plan, scheme or device to circumvent or defeat the payment of wage scales provided in this Agreement. This clause is intended to prevent the continuation of or formation of combinations or corporations or so-called lease of fleet arrangements whereby the driver is required to and does periodically pay losses sustained by the corporation or fleet arrangement, or is required to accept less than the actual cost of the running of his equipment, thus, in fact, reducing his scale of pay.

"Section 17. It is further agreed that if the Employer or certificated or permitted carrier requires that the 'driver-owner-operator' sell his equipment to the Employer or certificated or permitted carrier, directly or indirectly, the 'driver-owner-operator' shall be paid the fair true value of such equipment. Copies of the instruments of sale shall be filed with the Union and unless objected to within ten (10) days shall be deemed satisfactory. If any question is raised by the Union as to such value, the same shall be submitted to arbitration, as above set forth, for determination. The decision of the arbitration board shall be final and binding.

"Section 18. It is further agreed that the Employer or certificated or permitted carrier will not devise or put into operation any scheme, whether herein enumerated or not, to defeat the terms of this Agreement, wherein the provisions as to compensation for services on and for use of equipment owned by owner-driver shall be lessened, nor shall any owner-driver lease be cancelled for the purpose of depriving Union employees of employment, and any such complaint that should arise pertaining to such cancellation of lease or violation under this section shall be subject to Article X.

"Section 19. (a) The use of individual owner-operators shall be permitted by all certificated or permitted carriers who will agree to submit all grievances pertaining to owner-operators to joint Employer-Union grievance committees in each respective state. It is understood and agreed that all such grievances will be promptly heard and decided with the specific purpose in mind of "(1) protecting provisions of the Union contract;

"(2) prohibiting any and all violations directly or indirectly of contract provisions relating to the proper use of individual owners;

"(3) prohibiting any attempts by any certificated or permitted carrier in changing his operation which will affect the rights of drivers under the terms of the contract, and generally the certificated or permitted carriers agree to assume responsibility in policing and doing everything within their power to eliminate all alleged abuses in the use of owner-drivers which resulted in the insertion of Section 19 (Article XXXIII) in the original 1945-47 Over-the-Road contract;

"(4) owner-driver operations to be terminal to terminal, except where no local employees to make such deliveries or otherwise agreed to in this contract;

"(5) the certificated or permitted carriers agree that they will, with a joint meeting of the Unions, set up uniform rules and practices under which all such cases will be heard;

"(6) it shall be considered a violation of the contract should any operator deduct from rental of equipment the increases provided for by the 1955 Amendments or put into effect any means of evasion to circumvent actual payment of increases agreed upon effective for the period starting February 1, 1955, and ending January 31, 1961.

"(b) No owner-operator shall be permitted to drive or hold seniority where he owns three or more pieces of leased equipment. This provision shall not apply to present owner-operators having three or more pieces of equipment under lease agreement, but such owner-operator shall not be permitted to put additional equipment in service so long as he engages in work covered by this Agreement or holds seniority. Where owner-operator drives, he can hold seniority where he works sixty (60) per cent or more of time."

[Extent of Coverage]

This contract, of which Article 32, set forth above, is a part, is known as the Central States Area Over-the-Road Motor Freight Agreement, with Ohio Rider. It has generally been adopted by common carriers and locals of the parent Union throughout twelve central states. It contracts for 3,000 to 3,500 carriers and 40,000 to 50,000 employees. In Ohio it covers approximately 500 carriers and 6,000 employees. Approximately 5 to 10 percent of these employees are owner-operators.

[Jurisdiction of State Court]

A principal question raised by the Union is whether this state court has jurisdiction to enjoin the enforcement of the contract, or whether its jurisdiction has been preempted by authority granted the National Labor Relations Board.

The Court of Common Pleas of Summit County found that such jurisdiction was vested in the state courts, and enjoined, pursuant to trial, the enforcement of the contract, on the theory that it violated the state statutes governing monopolies and restraints of trade. This Court, now entertaining an appeal for trial de novo from the judgment there entered, must determine the issues there adjudicated.

From the record, we find that the controversial agreement was entered into following a strike, called to induce the carriers to contract with the Union, and that the contract so executed infringed upon and superseded many of the provisions of an existing contract between the plaintiff and the carriers.

It is not the purpose of this Court to write at length on the legal questions presented, as would perhaps be our duty if we were hearing the case on questions of law, thereby examining the record for error of the trial court. In this appeal, this Court is a trial court, and we are called upon to determine questions of fact.

It is also necessary to examine, with diligence, the law necessarily involved, and to apply it to the facts found to exist. The hundred and more cases cited and analyzed by counsel are well known to the lawyers in the case. We will not repeat them here.

In determining the jurisdiction of this Court, we first observe that the subject matter of the litigation falls within the powers of the state courts, unless federal statutes enacted pursuant to the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States intend to supersede or suspend the exercise of the reserved powers of the states. Illinois Central Rd. Co. v. State Public Utilities Comm. of Illinois, 245 U. S. 493, at p. 510, 62 L. Ed. 425.

[Federal Antitrust Laws]

We find no federal statute ordering, nor in fact any federal case which holds, that the federal government retains exclusively to itself the right to remedy the evils resulting from contracts and agreements between interstate carriers and Unions found to be in restraint of trade. Federal legislation does not occupy the entire field, to the exclusion of state laws. We further do not find that we are met with a labor dispute, unfair labor practice, right to collective bargaining, or any other right arising under the labor laws of the federal government, of which the right of adjudication has been exclusively retained by the federal government acting through any of its agencies.

On the question of jurisdiction, we find and hold that, if it be found that the contract before us, in connection with the established facts, is counter to this state's public policy as pronounced in its antitrust laws, this Court has jurisdiction to restrain such conduct, because it falls within a field open to state regulation, even though its effect falls upon litigants involved in interstate commerce.

[National Labor Relations Act]

Upon the basis of the allegations in the pleadings and the proof adduced, we find that the petitioner, an independent contractor, to the extent that he leases motor vehicles to carriers, rather than an employee under the federal statutes, could not have presented his grievances to the National Labor Relations Board. There is nothing in the National Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Labor Management Relations Act (Taft-Hartley Act), which would give the petitioner herein such right.

As is indicated above, this Court rejects the claim of lack of jurisdiction of this Court to adjudicate the issues; and, after so ruling, we now proceed to examine the right of the petitioner to injunctive relief, because, as heretofore stated, the subject matter of the litigation falls within the powers of the state courts.

[State Antitrust Laws]

The public policy of this state in respect to monopoly and restraints of trade is set forth in Sec. 1331.01, R. C., et seq. The first-named statute, in so far as here applicable, is:

> "As used in Sections 1331.01 to 1331.14, inclusive, of the Revised Code:
> * * *
> "(B) 'Trust' is a combination of capital, skill, or acts by two or more persons for any of the following purposes:
>
> "(1) To create or carry out restrictions in trade or commerce;
>
> "(2) To limit or reduce the production, or increase or reduce the price of merchandise or a commodity;
> "(3) To prevent competition in manufacturing, making, transportation, sale, or purchase of merchandise, produce, or a commodity;
> "(4) To fix at a standard or figure, whereby its price to the public or consumer is in any manner controlled or established, an article or commodity of merchandise, produce, or commerce intended for sale, barter, use, or consumption in this state;
> "(5) To make, enter into, execute or carry out contracts, obligations, or agreements of any kind by which they bind or have bound themselves not to sell, dispose of, or transport an article or commodity, or an article of trade, use, merchandise, commerce, or consumption below a common standard figure or fixed value, or by which they agree in any manner to keep the price of such article, commodity, or transportation at a fixed or graduated figure, or by which they shall in any manner establish or settle the price of an article, commodity, or transportation between them or themselves and others, so as directly to preclude a free and unrestricted competition among themselves, purchasers, or consumers in the sale or transportation of such article or commodity, or by which they agree to pool, combine, or directly or indirectly unite any interests which they have connected with the sale or transportation of such article or commodity, that its price might in any manner be affected.
> "A trust as defined in division (B) of this Section is unlawful and void."

It has been heretofore observed that the appellee Oliver has his equipment under lease to the carriers. It was a lease entered into through a voluntary agreement between the carriers and him. That the contract between the carrier and the Union would supersede and nullify many of the items of his contract is not open to dispute.

The carrier-Union contract may be succinctly said to be one which fixes the price to be charged for the use and supervision of the trucks and trailers used in the trucking business, owned by individual persons who lease their equipment to the carriers.

It is the judgment of this Court that such an agreement, and the consequences inevitably following therefrom, if the contract were allowed to stand, is squarely in conflict with the public policy of this state as reflected in Sec. 1331.01, R. C., et seq.

We have been favored with a careful analysis of this case made by Judge Colopy, the trial judge in the court below. We accept his reasoning as sound, and, by reference, make his opinion a part of this one. We further note the similarity of basic principles between the instant case and State, ex rel. Cullitan v. Greater Cleveland Livery Owners Assn., et al. [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,614], 74 N. E. 2d 104.

Judge McNamee, in the Cullitan case, has with rare ability discussed the principles of law involved in this case. We make especial reference to the opinion there rendered.

[Rulings]

In conclusion we summarize:

1. This Court has jurisdiction of both the parties and the subject matter.

2. Article 32 of the contract, here the subject matter of the litigation, is in violation of Sec. 1331.01, R. C., et seq., and, by virtue of Sec. 1331.06, R. C., is void and unenforcible.

3. A permanent injunction will be entered of like character to that entered in the Court of Common Pleas.

Rulings on Pending Motions

BEN C. DAWKINS, JR., Chief Judge [In full text]: When the records in these cases were delivered to us by the Clerk, on July 11, 1957, we were engaged in a trial term which was not completed until August 2, 1957. Consequently, we were unable to begin study of these records until August 5, 1957. Since then we have read the amended complaints and the respective briefs, having arrived at the following conclusions:

[Sufficiency of Complaint]

Defendant's counsel have submitted a careful, comprehensive analysis of the original and amended complaints. They have cited numerous impressive authorities to support their position that, notwithstanding this Court's specific observations and rulings in its opinion of March 1, 1957, plaintiffs still have failed to allege what they must allege, if the facts actually exist, in order to state claims upon which relief can be granted.

Plaintiffs' brief, on the other hand, to be frank about it, amounts to little more than fulmination. No serious effort has been made to distinguish the authorities defendant relies on, to cite others in support of their position, or to meet and overcome the logic of defendant's position as to each and every claim for damages. Moreover, plaintiffs seem to place as much blame on the other major oil companies as they do upon defendant, although those companies are not parties to the suits.

[Rulings]

Because of this, and since the amended complaint, like the original, is a "mere gossamer web of conclusion or inference," we think we would be thoroughly justified, and above criticism, if we were to grant defendant's motions to dismiss, and for summary judgment, at this time. Nevertheless, lest it be hereafter speciously urged that we were guilty of having wrongly denied plaintiffs their day in Court, and in order to determine finally whether they can allege and prove valid causes of action, we shall defer ruling upon all of defendant's motions except those for a more definite statement, which are hereby granted. Moreover, for the same purpose, and to be sure that plaintiffs have disgorged all of the ultimate facts at their disposal, we direct that defendant's counsel, within thirty days, shall serve upon plaintiffs' counsel detailed written interrogatories on the facts, and requests for admissions of fact, under Rules 33 and 36. Plaintiffs are allowed sixty days from this date to respond to the order for a more definite statement, and to the interrogatories and requests for admissions. Thereafter, upon renewal of defendant's motions, with supplemental arguments and briefs, we then will be in position to decide whether plaintiffs are entitled to trial or that the suits are without merit and should be dismissed.

Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Pretrial Procedures—Interrogatories.—In a drug store chain's treble damage action charging that a manufacturer of tobacco products discriminated against it in violation of Sections 2(a) and 2(d) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, the court sustained the manufacturer's objections to the chain's interrogatories requesting (1) a complete schedule of sales made by the manufacturer to the drug chain, (2) details of discounts, rebates, and the lowest unit price of the manufacturer on sales to all other retailers, and (3) the manufacturer's total amount of sales and amounts expended by the manufacturer for advertising. However, the manufacturer's general objection to the chain's interrogatories because they requested information covering periods of time subsequent to the filing of the complaint was overruled.

For the defendant: Conboy, Hewitt, O'Brien & Boardman, New York, N. Y.

Memorandum

[Causes of Action]

CASHIN, JOHN M., District Judge [In full text]: This is an action by the owner of a chain of retail drug stores wherein treble damages are sought from a manufacturer and distributor of tobacco products under Sections 2a and 2d of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act. (15 U. S. C. A. §§ 13(a) and 13(d)). Three causes of action are alleged in the complaint. Each cause of action alleges discrimination between plaintiff and other purchasers of defendant's products generally during the years 1953, 1954, 1955, 1956 and 1957. However, the specific allegations of all of the causes of action refer only to discrimination between plaintiff and Liggett Drug Co., the owner of another chain of retail drug stores operating in the same areas as plaintiff and in competition with plaintiff. The first cause of action is based on discrimination by price discounts and rebates. (15 U. S. C. A. 13 (a).) The second cause of action is based on allowances for advertising not available on proportionally equal terms to plaintiff (15 U. S. C. A. 13(d)). The third cause of action alleges special damages because plaintiff purchased some of defendant's products from jobbers at a higher price than it would have purchased them from defendant had the discrimination not been in effect, as complained of in the first two causes of action.

[Interrogatories]

In interrogatory No. 6, plaintiff asks defendant to supply a complete schedule of sales by defendant to plaintiff with full details as to items sold, quantities, unit prices, total price of each sale, rebates and discounts, method of computation thereof and shipping addresses. Defendant objects to answering the interrogatory on the grounds that the information requested is equally available to plaintiff from its own records and to require defendant to compile the information would, because of defendant's method of record keeping, be extremely time consuming and expensive and thus, under the circumstances, unduly burdensome. Plaintiff does not deny that the information sought to be obtained by the interrogatory is equally available to it, but contends that it is nevertheless entitled to have the answers so that the issues on the trial may be narrowed. While interrogatories may certainly on many occasions effect the salutary purpose contended for by plaintiff, I do not believe that discovery proceedings should be utilized to cast upon a defendant the burden of establishing the plaintiff's case when the plaintiff can at least as readily establish the requested facts. See Leonia Amusement Corporation v. Loew's Incorporated (SDNY 1955) [1955 Trade Cases ¶ 68,134], 18 F. R. D. 503. The objection to interrogatory No. 6 is, therefore, sustained.

Interrogatories Nos. 3, 4, 7 and 8 seek to obtain information from defendant as to the lowest unit price all defendant's products were sold for to any retailer; what discounts or rebates were given to any other such purchaser; the method of computation of said rebates or discounts and "all other details". Similar information is requested by interrogatory No. 25 with regard to advertising allowances. I believe that the objections to these interrogatories must be sustained, at least so long as the interrogatories remain in their present form. In the present posture of the pleadings, only the Liggett Drug Co. is alleged to be a competitor of plaintiff who was favored by either discriminatory prices or advertising allowances. Even under the liberal "notice" function of a complaint under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, I do not believe that the issues of the case presently encompass any discrimination except between plaintiff and Liggett Drug Co. Under these circumstances the interrogatories need not be answered and the objections are, therefore, sustained.

The subject matter of interrogatories Nos. 11 and 12 appear to be completely irrelevant to the issues of the lawsuit. The total amount of sales by defendant (Interrogatory No. 11) and the amounts expended by defendant in various forms of advertising (Interrogatory No. 12) can have no bearing on whether plaintiff was discriminated against in the forms complained of, or on any other conceivable issue in the action. The objections are sustained.

Defendant also objects to the interrogatories generally insofar as they request information subsequent to the institution of the action on the ground that such information is irrelevant to the issues, since only periods prior to the institution of action are covered by the complaint. I find the position of defendant untenable. The disclosure of otherwise relevant information for times subsequent to the institution of the action may lead to evidence. In addition, plaintiff may amend its complaint to include subsequent periods. If defendant were allowed to refuse to answer the present inquiries, all that could be accomplished would be a series of motions for leave to amend the complaint followed by a series of interrogatories seeking the same type of information for each successive time period covered. Defendant's general objection is overruled.

[Extension of Time]

In view of the difficulty which defendant must necessarily encounter in compiling the data required, its application for an extension of time within which to answer the interrogatories is granted. The interrogatories remaining must be answered by September 15, 1957.

Settle order.

Sherman Antitrust Act and Michigan Antitrust Laws

Fair Trade—Legality of Fair Trade Contracts—Federal Antitrust Laws and Michigan Antitrust Laws.—In a fair trader's action charging that a nonsigner of fair trade contracts tortiously interfered with its rights under its fair trade contracts, the nonsigner's counterclaim that the fair trader's contracts violate the Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts as well as the antitrust laws of Michigan was held to be without merit.

For the defendant: Aldrich Baxter and Mayer Morganroth, Detroit, Mich.

Memorandum Opinion

[Nature of Suit]

THOMAS P. THORNTON, District Judge [In full text]: The Court has before it a motion by plaintiff for determination of defendant's counterclaim. The action commenced by plaintiff was one grounded on tortious interference with plaintiff's contract rights with certain of plaintiff's dealers. The contract rights were those arising out of fair trade agreements. At the time the suit was commenced this Court granted plaintiff's request for injunction enjoining defendant from doing acts constituting the tort for which the action was brought. At that time the Michigan Supreme Court had ruled in the Shakespeare Case[1] that the Michigan Fair Trade Act was unconstitutional insofar as it applied to nonsigners. The action brought by plaintiff herein against defendant, a nonsigner, was not brought on the theory of breach of fair trade contract. It was not brought on any contractual theory. It was brought on a tort liability theory.

[Counterclaim]

The theory of defendant's counterclaim herein attacked by plaintiff is that the fair trade contracts of plaintiff with its dealers violate the Sherman Anti-Trust Act and the Clayton Act, as well as the anti-trust laws of the State of Michigan. It is also defendant's theory that the injunction was wrongfully issued.

[No Antitrust Violation]

In view of the vast amount of litigation in this country during the past few years, and the conclusion reached again and again by the courts, of the non-violative character of State Fair Trade legislation in relation to Federal Anti-Trust Acts, we deem it unnecessary to deal with this point of defendant's argument other than to say that it is without merit.[2] As to any violation of the anti-trust laws of the State of Michigan, it is our view that the courts of this State have had the opportunity to declare the fair trade legislation to be so violative, and have not seen fit to do so. The decisions of the Michigan Supreme Court carry the implication that fair trade agreements in Michigan are valid and not in violation of constitutional or legislative provisions. See the Shakespeare Case and the Argus Cameras Case.[3]

[Damages]

We now reach the theory of defendant that he is entitled to damages because of the alleged wrongful injunction. It is defendant's contention that the plaintiff sought this injunction maliciously and with full knowledge that it had no right to do so. This contention is made by way of argument. The Court finds no allegation of malice in defendant's counterclaim and, as to defendant's argument that plaintiff knew it had no right to do this, the perfect foil is the dissenting opinion of Justice Butzel in the Argus Cameras Case, supra, in which Justices Boyles and Kelly concur, holding that the action of the lower court in granting a preliminary injunction (in the same situation as was present in the instant action) should be affirmed.

It is the opinion of this Court that defendant's counterclaim is devoid of merit.

An appropriate order may be presented.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Who May Bring Suit—Non-Operating Landlord of Motion Picture Theatre—Applicable Statute of Limitations—Necessity of Demand to Cease Illegal Practices.—A United States Court of Appeals, on a petition for rehearing, adhered to its rulings that a non-operating landlord of a motion picture theatre, which was entitled to a fixed minimum rental plus a percentage of the lessee's gross receipts, could maintain a treble damage action alleging that the lessee and others engaged in a conspiracy which had the effect of relegating the theatre to an inferior playing position; and that the action was governed by an Illinois two-year statute of limitations. In ruling on the petition, the court held that the non-operating landlord was not required, as a condition precedent to the maintenance of its suit, to make a demand upon the defendants to refrain from their alleged illegal practices. A demand to discontinue illegal practices is not a condition precedent to the maintenance of a private antitrust suit. The instant case did not involve a refusal to deal.

Before FINNEGAN, LINDLEY and SWAIM, Circuit Judges.

On Petition for Rehearing

[Necessity of Demand]

SWAIM, Circuit Judge [In full text]: Our holding in the instant case that a demand is not a condition precedent to the maintenance of a suit of this character and the seemingly contrary holding by this court in Milwaukee Towne Corp. v. Loew's, Inc., 7 Cir. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,891], 190 F. 2d 561, certiorari denied 342 U. S. 909, may be a source of future confusion in this area of the law and we have thought it advisable to elaborate on this aspect of the case. We have already noted that Milwaukee Towne was tried on the theory of a refusal to deal and that the court held that without a demand or request to deal there could be no refusal to deal. The defendants insist that this is a mere exercise in semantics and that the cases are not distinguishable on that basis. They seize upon the following passage from Milwaukee Towne as supporting their position that a demand is a condition precedent to the maintenance of a private antitrust suit:

> "We know of no principle of law which authorizes a person aggrieved by the deprivation of a right either statutory or constitutional to recover for such deprivation in the absence of a demand or request for its exercise. With this thought in mind, we have carefully examined all the reported cases where damages have been sought in actions of the instant character against members of the motion picture industry and in other cases where the antitrust laws were relied upon, and in all such cases it appears that the plaintiff sought in some manner to exercise the right of which it allegedly was deprived by the alleged conspiracy." 190 F. 2d, at 568.

The holding there, however, is much narrower in application, for the court continued, recognizing the very "semantic difference" which we are accused of utilizing:

"Furthermore, the instant case was tried on the theory that it was the refusal of plaintiff's request or demand for first run pictures which gave rise to its damages. In the complaint it was alleged that the plaintiff 'is legally entitled to negotiate for and obtain from defendant distributors the license of pictures suitable for first run exhibition in the City of Milwaukee, but plaintiff has been and is now prevented from so negotiating or obtaining such pictures for exhibition,' and that as a 'direct and proximate cause of the operation of said unlawful monopoly, conspiracy and agreement against plaintiff's business plaintiff has been subjected to loss and damage.' We are of the view that it cannot be held that defendants' conspiracy was the direct and proximate cause of plaintiff's damage because it was prevented from negotiating and obtaining first run pictures in the absence of a demand or request." (Emphasis added.) 190 F. 2d, at 568.

[Facts in Instant Case]

The plaintiff in the instant case is not proceeding on this theory and under the facts of this case it obviously could not do so. By the terms of its leasing arrangement with the defendant B & K the plaintiff entrusted the operation of its theater to the discretion of the lessee. Plaintiff is therefore not in a position to assert and does not assert that it "is legally entitled to negotiate for and obtain from defendant distributors the license of pictures suitable for first run exhibition in the City of [Chicago]." If the plaintiff tried to assert or exercise such a right it would probably be in breach of the terms of the lease. The plaintiff does complain however that it was injured in its property by reason of activities forbidden by the antitrust laws and the defendants concede that "[w]here the injury results directly 'by reason of' failure of the defendant to obey the law, whether it is a traffic law or an antitrust law, a demand or request that the defendant 'obey the law' is obviously not a prerequisite to a cause of action." Under the admitted allegations of the complaint the defendants conspired to monopolize film exhibition in the City of Chicago and to divert patronage from the plaintiff's theater. The antitrust laws protect the plaintiff from such activities in much the same manner that the law protects its property from intentional physical damage. In neither instance must the plaintiff assert its right prior to suit by demand as the law makes the demand of the wrongdoer.

Although the Supreme Court has not had occasion to pass on this question, the following excerpt from Radovich v. National Football League [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,628], 352 U. S. 445, 453-454, is particularly appropriate here:

"Congress has, by legislative fiat, determined that such prohibited activities are injurious to the public and has provided sanctions allowing private enforcement of the antitrust laws by an aggrieved party. These laws protect the victims of the forbidden practices as well as the public. * * * In the face of such a policy this Court should not add requirements to burden the private litigant beyond what is specifically set forth by Congress in those laws." (Emphasis added.)

Furthermore, the issue of demand in Milwaukee Towne had an additional significance not present here. The plaintiff's theater had been exhibiting second run motion pictures and the plaintiff claimed that it was entitled to a first run exhibiting position. The question arose as to whether its theater was suitable as a first run house. Along with other evidence the absence of a demand for the "first damage period" was considered indicative of the fact that the plaintiff's theater was not suitable for that purpose. The court therefore concluded that even if competitive conditions had prevailed the plaintiff's theater would have still been a second run house, with the result that the plaintiff was not damaged by the trade practices complained of. In other words, the plaintiff failed to demand or request first run pictures because it recognized that its theater was not suitable for their exhibition, and even if a demand or request had been made, the unsuitability of the plaintiff's theater would have precluded it from recovering damages. The significance of demand in this context related to the proof of damages upon the trial, and not to the prerequisites to a cause of action under the antitrust laws. Thus, the court said:

"Obviously, no damages were claimed for that period [the period when the plaintiff's theater was closed for remodeling] because plaintiff was not in a position to use first run pictures, and we think by the same token it was not entitled to recover damages for the preceding period because not only did it fail to make a demand or request for first run pictures but recognized that its theatre was not suitable for that purpose." 190 F. 2d, at 568-569.

[Effect of Ruling]

The defendants contend that the effect of our decision will cause every film distributor to deal with the theater operator at its peril unless each film contract is countersigned by the lessor. And protesting their innocence, the distributor defendants insist that they relied and had a right to rely upon the requests for pictures received from the plaintiff's tenant. Throughout this matter the defendants have found it convenient to ignore the allegations of the complaint which for present purposes are admitted as true. The complaint alleges that the distributor defendants and others conspired with the lessee to divert patronage from the plaintiff's theater. We do not have a situation where the film distributors merely supplied the plaintiff's theater with the run of pictures requested by the lessee; we have a situation where the run of pictures was determined by the dictates of a conspiracy between the lessee and the film distributors. The only peril to which our decision will expose the film distributors is the peril to which they have been subjected by Congress, and this is a peril which they can avoid by the simple expedient of refraining from activities forbidden by the antitrust laws.

Defendants concede that they had a duty to refrain from illegal trade practices, but complain that they had no way of knowing that the plaintiff considered their acts injurious in the absence of a demand or request. It is of note that the defendants do not assert that they did not know their acts to be injurious, but rather that they did not know whether the plaintiff would complain about them. But the plaintiff has complained and any lack of diligence in this record will be penalized by the statute of limitations.

[Petition for Rehearing Denied]

We adhere to the views previously expressed on the other issues presented by this appeal and accordingly the petition for rehearing is denied.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—When Recovery May Be Barred—Participation in Same Illegal Activity as Charged in Counterclaim.—In an action by a manufacturer to recover an alleged balance due on the purchase price of goods sold to the defendant, the defendant filed a counterclaim charging that the plaintiff entered into contracts with its dealers which were unlawful under the antitrust laws. A motion to strike the plaintiff's defense charging that the defendant entered into the same contracts which it had alleged were unlawful under the antitrust laws, and therefore was in pari delicto with the plaintiff and came into court with unclean hands, was denied. Where parties enter into an agreement which is violative of the antitrust laws, the doctrine of in pari delicto is a good defense. In the instant action, the plaintiff and defendant allegedly were parties to the same illegal contracts, and the alleged illegal contracts formed the basis for the counterclaim.

Opinion

[Motion to Strike]

LEVET, District Judge [In full text]: Defendant has moved pursuant to Rule 12(f) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure for an order striking from plaintiff's reply to defendant's counterclaim the "Second Defense" which charges plaintiff [defendant] with unclean hands and in pari delicto with plaintiff.

[Pleadings]

Plaintiff, a manufacturer of band instruments at Elkhart, Indiana, is suing to recover an alleged balance on the purchase price of goods sold and delivered to the defendant, and upon promissory notes given for said goods. Defendant asserts in its answer a counterclaim charging that plaintiff has entered into contracts with dealers in its band instruments pursuant to which the dealers have agreed with plaintiff to do and to refrain from doing certain acts which defendant alleges constitute a restraint of trade. Plaintiff's reply sets up the aforementioned "Second Defense," which is as follows:

> "Forty-Ninth: If, as alleged in the counterclaim, plaintiff in concert with its franchised dealers entered into a contract or combination with said dealers which was in any respect in restraint of trade or unlawful, nevertheless defendant became a party to said contract, agreed to be bound thereby, ratified, confirmed and approved the said contract, was engaged from time to time in the performance thereof and benefitted thereby, and thus is in pari delicto with plaintiff and said other retail dealers in the making and peformance of said contract and, with respect to the matter alleged in said counterclaim, comes before this court with unclean hands."

[Applicability of Defense]

The defendant seeks to have the above defense stricken as insufficient. It claims that it is now well established that the doctrine of "unclean hands" is inapplicable and superfluous in antitrust actions, citing Interborough News Co. v. Curtis Pub. Co., D. C. S. D. N. Y., 1952 [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,388], 108 F. Supp. 768, 770, wherein Judge Irving R. Kaufman stated:

> "Regardless of the circumstances under which 'unclean hands' might have constituted a defense to an action under the federal antitrust laws in the past, it seems clear that three recent decisions have, if not completely abolished this defense, narrowed it to cases of extremely limited applicability. The decisions referred to are Kiefer-Stewart Co. v. Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, 1951, 340 U. S. 211, 71 S. Ct. 259, 95 L. Ed. 219, Moore v. Mead Service Co., 10 Cir., 1951, 190 F. 2d 540, certiorari denied 1952, 342 U. S. 902, 72 S. Ct. 290, and Trebuhs Realty Co. v. News Syndicate Co., D. C. S. D. N. Y. 1952, 107 F. Supp. 595. In the last cited case Judge Weinfeld granted a motion to strike affirmative defenses of 'unclean hands' in an antitrust case after historically tracing the shrinkage of this defense and concluding that in this context:
> 'the defenses of "unclean hands" and "in pari delicto" were not considered solely within the framework of traditional equity concepts. In determining whether the defense should be permitted or denied, decisive weight was given to the necessity of vindicating the public interest in free competition—a necessity overriding the particular equities which might exist between the immediate parties.' Trebuhs Realty v. News Syndicate Co., supra, 107 F. Supp. at page 598."

However, in none of the above-cited cases were the plaintiff and the defendant parties to the same illegal conspiracy. Here the defendant asserts in its affirmative defenses in the answer (1) failure of consideration because of plaintiff's refusal to continue defendant's dealer franchise; (2) that the promissory notes were executed by the defendant pursuant to an agreement in restraint of trade; (3) that defendant purchased the goods and merchandise in question pursuant to the unlawful agreement; and (4) that the agreement between the parties was violative of the Sherman and Clayton Anti-Trust Acts, 15 USCA. Although, the defendant claims that it entered into the aforesaid agreement under duress, this is a question of fact that cannot be resolved at this time.

In Pennsylvania Water & Power Co. v. Consolidated Gas Electric Light & Power Co. of Baltimore, 4 Cir. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,641], 1953, 209 F. 2d 131, cert. denied 347 U. S. 960, it was held that where the parties had entered into an agreement which was violative of the anti-trust laws, the doctrine of in pari delicto was a good defense to plaintiff's action. In affirming the lower court, Judge Soper said:

"We are in accord with the Second Memorandum of the District Judge, filed with the Court on April 6, 1953, that Penn Water is precluded from recovery in this case because it was a party to the illegal agreement upon which it now bases its claim to recover under the anti-trust acts. Penn Water contends that the doctrine of in pari delicto is no longer a defense to a private action for damages growing out of an antitrust violation but has been rejected by the recent decisions of the Supreme Court in Mandeville Island Farms, Inc. v. American Crystal Sugar Co., 334 U. S. 219, 68 S. Ct. 996, 92 L. Ed. 1328; Kiefer-Stewart Co. v. Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Inc., 340 U. S. 211, 71 S. Ct. 259, 95 L. Ed. 219; and Moore v. Mead Service Co., 340 U. S. 944, 71 S. Ct. 528, 95 L. Ed. 681; Id., 10 Cir., 184 F. 2d. 338; Id., 10 Cir., 190 F. 2d 540.

"We do not so understand these decisions, for in none of them were the plaintiff and the defendant parties to the same illegal conspiracy or agreement on which the suit was based. * * *"

[Motion Denied]

In the instant case, the alleged illegal contract forms the basis for defendant's counterclaim and, therefore, the Pennsylvania Water & Power Co. case, supra, is apposite. See also 29 N. Y. U. L. Rev. 1463 (1954). Accordingly, defendant's motion is denied.

So ordered.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. No. 13574. Decided August 14, 1957.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Sufficiency of Proof of Damages.—In a night club lessor's damage action charging that a musicians' union violated the Sherman Act by blacklisting his night club because former lessees of the night club had failed to pay wages owed to certain members of the union, a directed verdict in favor of the union at the close of the lessor's case was affirmed on the ground that the lessor failed to sustain the burden of proving that the action of the union caused ascertainable loss and damage. The evidence did not show the loss of any particular lease or lessee because of the listing. The lessor also argued that prospective lessees were dissuaded from serious consideration of a lease because the listing precluded employment of union musicians and entertainers. However, there was no showing that the night club could not be operated with musicians and entertainers who were not members of the union.

For the appellants: Edward J. Skeens.

For the appellees: Eugene Gressman, with whom Henry Kaiser and Hyman Smollar were on the brief.

Before WASHINGTON, DANAHER and BURGER, Circuit Judges.

[Complaint]

BURGER, Circuit Judge [In full text]: This is an appeal from the District Court's grant of a motion for a directed verdict for appellees at the close of appellants' case. The issue therefore is whether substantial evidence had been offered in support of appellants' complaint, requiring submission of the case to the jury. The complaint alleged (1) unlawful interference with appellants' right to make leases of realty; (2) imposition of an unlawful boycott against appellants' realty by means of a combination and conspiracy in violation of the Sherman Act; (3) libel of appellants and their property by an illegal listing on the appellee American Federation of Musicians' "National Defaulters List."

These separate contentions of the appellants merge on this appeal into a single concept that a labor organization is not engaged in a legitimate union activity and, by implication, on the contrary, engages in an unlawful activity, when it maintains, publishes and enforces a "blacklist" which operates to prevent members from doing business with listed establishments, particularly when that sanction is permitted to operate against the owner of the establishment rather than the lessees who contracted for entertainers' services and failed to pay for them.

The record shows that appellants, as owners of certain realty, were also owners of a trade name "Club Bengazi" descriptive of the activities carried on in these premises by various lessees. Appellants leased the realty and the right to use the name "Club Bengazi" to various lessees. The several lessees from time to time employed the services of members of the appellee unions and it is conceded that former lessees of appellants failed to pay the wages of certain members of the Federation. At the time suit was commenced several thousands of dollars in wages admittedly due were outstanding.

[Blacklisting]

As a means of enforcing collection of wages, among other things, the American Federation of Musicians employs what amounts to a "blacklisting" of defaulting employers to warn union members against taking employment from "defaulters." It appears from this record that the union considers "an establishment . . . liable for indebtedness to [its] members regardless of the fact that a new operator may take over after the original default." [1] A union member who accepts employment from a defaulting establishment or operator is subject to union discipline. No procedure is established by the union for placing a "defaulter" on this list or removing him if he makes good an admitted default. The entire process is within union control and no hearings or other steps are provided.

The default of appellants' lessees led to a listing of "Club Bengazi" on the Federation's "National Defaulters List" from 1948 to the time of trial except for a short interval when the listing was suspended. The essence of appellants' complaint is that the "blacklisting" effectively prevents leasing "Club Bengazi" and the premises associated with that name.

[Proof of Damages]

The appellants' evidence in the District Court did not show loss of any particular lease or lessee because of the listing. Appellant argues that prospective or potential lessees were dissuaded from serious consideration of a lease because the listing precluded employment of any union musicians or entertainers. However, there is no showing that a night club could not be operated with entertainers and musicians not members of the appellee unions.

On this record it seems clear that the appellants failed to sustain the burden of proving at least one of the essentials of their case, i. e., that the actions of appellees or any of them caused ascertainable loss and damage. Absent proof of damage we need not pass upon the conduct complained of in the complaint. The action of the District Court directing a verdict in favor of the appellees is therefore affirmed.

In the United States District Court for the District of Delaware. Civil Action No. 1691. Dated July 19, 1957.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Patents—Package Licensing Policy—Legality.—A company's policy of refusing to grant a patent license unless a license under all of its patents is taken constituted a misuse of its patent monopoly. Although the company had, when pressed, offered to license individual patents, it had, at the same time, demanded in payment the same royalty rate as that provided in its group or package license. While it has been held that the mere accumulation of patents is not, of itself, illegal, and that it is not a per se misuse to measure consideration for a license under any and all patents related to an industry by a percentage of the licensee's sales, the company, in the instant case, refused to grant a license under one or more of its patents unless a license was taken under all of its patents. Neither business convenience nor the fact that a licensee could cancel its license justified the company's policy. There is no significant difference between conditioning the grant of a license under one patent upon the acceptance of another for an additional consideration and granting a license only under all patents at a fixed rate or under one patent at the same rate. The company's licensing policy was held to have violated the terms of a consent decree entered against the company in a Government antitrust action.

[1] The union so advised appellants, adding that: "In order for the establishment to be removed from the Defaulters List arrangements have to be made for payment of such indebtedness."

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2013.500.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Antitrust Law Violations as Defense—Misuse of Patents as Bar to Infringement Suit—Violation of Government Consent Decree as Defense.—A company's policy of group or package licensing its patents constituted a misuse of its patent monopoly; therefore, the company, having failed to purge the misuse of its patents, was barred from enforcing them in its patent infringement action. Also, the company's licensing policy violated the terms of a consent decree entered against the company in a Government antitrust action. The violation of that decree could be asserted as a defense to the company's infringement action.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9041.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Consent Decrees—Violation of Decree—Jurisdiction of Court to Determine Violation.—The United States District Court for the District of Delaware held that it had jurisdiction to determine in a patent infringement action whether or not the plaintiff violated the provisions of a Government consent decree entered against it in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, Western Division. The plaintiff's contention that only the district court in Ohio, which retained jurisdiction, should interpret the consent decree was rejected. The retention of jurisdiction by the district court in Ohio did not exclude, by implication, the recognition of the plaintiff's obligations under the decree. The Ohio court acceded to this position when it declined to accept jurisdiction on an application of the alleged infringer to fix royalties and the petition of the Attorney General to enforce the decree. The instant court had competence to test the plaintiff's adherence to its obligations insofar as it might prejudice recovery in the infringement action. The plaintiff's patent licensing policy was held to have violated the terms of the Government consent decree.

[Patent Infringement Suit]

LEAHY, Chief Judge [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: Plaintiff sues for infringements of certain patents concerning the tempering of glass. Defendant moved for summary judgment under FR 56. There is no genuine issue as to the material facts. The question before the court is one of law. A brief sketch of the historical background of this litigation is necessary.

[Government Consent Decree]

1. On October 30, 1948, a final judgment in the form of a consent decree was filed in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio, Western Division, by Judge Kloeb. The government had charged violation of the antitrust statutes. The parties consenting were the United States of America, as plaintiff, and Libbey-Owens-Ford Glass Company, Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company, American Window Glass Company, Fourco Glass Company, Franklin Glass Company, National Glass Distributors Association, Rolland Glass Company, American Securit Company, and Blue Ridge Glass Corporation, as defendants.

In part, the decree provided the American Securit Company, one of the Corporate defendants, was enjoined from adhering to any agreement providing for a license under any patent relating to the manufacture of flat glass, upon the condition the other party had to accept a license under any other patent owned by any of the defendants in that action. Also, the defendants were to grant to each applicant a nonexclusive license under their patents and were enjoined from including any restriction or condition in any license granted by such defendants, with certain exceptions. Upon receipt of a written request for a license, a defendant was to advise the applicant in writing of the royalty which it deemed reasonable for the patent or patents to which the request pertained. If the parties could not agree upon a reasonable royalty within sixty days from the date the request for the license was received by a defendant, the applicant could apply forthwith to the Ohio Court for the determination of a reasonable royalty. The burden of proof would rest on the owner of the patent to establish the reasonableness of the royalty demanded and the court determination would apply to the applicant and all other licensees under those patents. Pending the completion of negotiations, or any such proceeding, the applicant would have to make use of the patents to which its application pertained without payment of royalty or other compensation, subject to the right of such defendant, or the applicant himself, to apply to the court to fix an interim royalty rate from the date of the filing of the application.

[Negotiations Between Parties]

2. Correspondence between the present parties in the suit at bar, which has been stipulated of record, indicates a series of negotiations took place between plaintiff and defendant here with respect to defendant's licensing of plaintiff's patents. The negotiations were opened by defendant on March 20, 1951. On March 7, 1955, almost four years later, plaintiff brought suit in this court against defendant for alleged patent infringement and unfair competition. Defendant's answer denied all counts of infringement, challenged the validity of plaintiff's patents, asserted as a first defense misuse of patents, and, as a second defense, royalty free license under the Ohio decree. Defendant here also counterclaimed for a declaratory judgment.[1]

[Proceedings in Government Case]

On July 25, 1955, an application was filed by defendant in the Ohio Court for the determination of royalty fees pursuant to that Court's final judgment entered October 30, 1948. Then, on October 6, 1955, the Attorney-General of the United States petitioned the Ohio Court for orders for the construction and enforcement of the Ohio decree and judgment. Hearing on these matters was had on October 19, 1955. On December 13 the Court refused to take jurisdiction in view of the proceedings here, and ordered a dismissal of both the application and the petition of the Attorney-General. As of the present date, the paper record shows defendant is not working under any license of plaintiff corporation.

[Complaint—Summary Judgment]

3. Counts I through IV of the Complaint relate to defendant's alleged infringements of plaintiff's patents, Mosmieri, et al., No. 2,131,406, Despret No. 2,167,294, Eckert No. 2,093,040, and Long No. 2,303,749. Counts V and VI relate to the allegations of unfair competition and fraud on the part of defendant. The motion for summary judgment seeks merely dismissal of Counts I through IV.

[Motion to Strike Affidavits]

4. Preliminarily, there is plaintiff's motion to strike the affidavits of Mr. William C. McCoy, Jr., and Mr. William C. McCoy, attorneys for defendant, supporting defendant's motion for summary judgment. FR 56(e) tests the sufficiency of evidentiary affidavits on a summary judgment motion for form and content. It requires affidavits to be made on personal knowledge, to set forth such facts as would be admissible in evidence, and to show affirmatively the

[1] Plaintiff's motion to dismiss defendant's first and second defense was denied by my Opinion-Letter of May 25, 1956, pp. 5-7.

affiant is competent to testify to the matters stated therein.

The affidavit of Mr. William C. McCoy, Jr., describes a conference between the affiant and Mr. Vernon M. Dorsey, a lawyer and then Secretary of the plaintiff, The American Securit Company, held for the purpose of negotiating for a patent license from plaintiff to defendant, Shatterproof Glass Corporation. Part of that affidavit alleges the good faith of the position taken by defendant during the course of negotiations. The affidavit of Mr. William C. McCoy traces the steps of defendant's legal stand, including Shatterproof's negotiations with another defendant (under the Ohio judgment) from whom licenses for several patents, including those relating to the tempering of glass, were granted on an individual basis.

I conclude the supporting affidavit of William C. McCoy and part of the supporting affidavit of William C. McCoy, Jr., are not material to the issues raised by defendant in its motion for summary judgment.[2] They will be disregarded. As to the remainder of the supporting affidavit of William C. McCoy, Jr., plaintiff's motion to strike is denied.

[Contentions]

5. Defendant's position on its summary judgment motion is two-fold: 1. Unenforceability of plaintiff's patents because of (a) misuse, and (b) violation of the terms of the consent decree, and 2. Defendant's right to use the patents during the period of negotiations with plaintiff without payment of royalty by virtue of the provisions of the consent decree.

[Licensing Policy]

6. Defendant contends plaintiff has followed a policy of licensing which constitutes a misuse of its patent monopoly, and, therefore, plaintiff is barred from enforcing its patents at this time in an infringement action. No dispute exists as to the policy pursued by plaintiff in licensing its patents. This policy is set out in plaintiff's standard form of license agreement.[7] It provides for a grant of license on all of its patents related to the industry for the specific royalty of 2¢ per square foot of glass manufactured and sold by the licensee. Plaintiff's proposed license also provides for the termination of the license agreement by the licensee at any time after one year from the date of signing by the giving of 30 days' notice in writing to the licensor. The correspondence between the parties and other papers indicate this policy has not been subject to variance, in that plaintiff has consistently refused to license individual patents;[8] and, although it has, when pressed, offered to do so, it has, at the same time, demanded in payment the same royalty rate as that provided for in the group or package-license.[9]

[Patent Misuse]

The crux of the legal question is to determine whether plaintiff's policy of licensing constitutes a misuse of its patents. The Supreme Court has said mere accumulation of patents is not, of itself, illegal, nor is it per se a misuse to measure consideration for a license under any and all patents related to the industry by a percentage of the licensee's sales, even though none of the patents may in fact be used by the licensee.[10] But the Court stated it was not

[1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,476], 176 F. 2d 799, (one Judge dissenting), affirming D. C. Mass., 77 F. Supp. 493. The petitioner entered into a license agreement with Hazeltine whereby petitioner could make use of all patents held or acquired by Hazeltine at a royalty rate fixed on a sales percentage and regardless of use of the patents. The petitioner argued the license agreement could not be enforced since it was a misuse of patents to require the licensee to pay royalties based on a percentage of the sales of its patents when none of the patents are used. Six members of the Supreme Court (opinion by Justice Minton) found no inherent extension of the monopoly of the patent. The dissent of Justice Douglas, concurred in by Justice Black, reasoned that since the petitioner was obligated to pay as royalty a percentage of its total sales without regard to whether or not the products sold were patented or un-confronted with the contention that the licensor refused to grant a license under one or more of its patents unless a license was taken under all.[11] Thus, the Supreme Court refused to apply the principle of the so-called "tie-in" cases, of which the Court, in an earlier decision dealing with copyright block-booking, held illegal a refusal to license one or more copyrights unless another copyright was accepted under an additional consideration.[12]

The record here demonstrates the applicability of that principle. The policy of plaintiff to grant no license unless it is under all its patents for a fixed royalty, is one of unlawful coercion contrary to public policy as announced by the courts.[13] And, it can not be said by plaintiff in answer that its practice of group or package-licensing was designed merely to suit its business convenience. Convenience to the patent owner can never justify an unlawful use of the patent monopoly. In this field, a reward granted to an inventor is important, only insofar as it serves to release to the public the product of its genius. That service ceases to be rendered when the reward no longer can be found to relate to the quality of each patent. In such event one patent cannot draw strength from the others and the monopoly of each thus be extended.

7. Plaintiff relies upon the termination clause of the license agreement as a redeeming feature of its patent monopoly. I do not so consider it. As read, the termination provision works an equal, even more aggravating, hardship upon the licensee in that, when invoked, it demands the renunciation of all patents—wanted and unwanted—under the license.[14]

8. Plaintiff then attempts to avert the impact of misuse by arguing, since under its package license the royalty for all patents is the same as for any one, with no increased rate imposed, its package license in no way requires an applicant to accept, under the burden of an added consideration, a license under one patent on condition he accept a license under another. I find plaintiff's offer to license its patents individually was never an alternative to its original, controlling policy to grant a license only under all its patents. Rather it was added by plaintiff in the later stages of its negotiations with defendant in the present case to counteract the harshness of plaintiff's position by seemingly meeting the demand of defendant in that regard. Although this offer may be said, on the surface, to treat of individual patents, its design was evident—a catalyst to encourage the licensing of all patents at the same fixed rate—and its result the same—unlawful coercion on the licensee to accept unwanted patents and an illegal extension of the patent monopoly.

I thus find no significant difference between, on the one hand, conditioning the granting of a license under one patent upon the acceptance of another for an additional consideration, a practice the Supreme Court has condemned, and, on the other, as here, granting a license only under all patents at a fixed rate, or under any one patent at the same rate, which is, in effect, equivalent to apportioning the fixed rate amongst all the patents and then requiring the applicant to take a license under all if he wishes to have a license under one. In either case plaintiff's policy is inexorable. Plaintiff having failed to "purge"[15] the misuse of its patents, is barred from enforcing them in its infringement action in this court.

[Violation of Consent Decree]

9. I will consider, as well, whether this court as other than the court entering a final judgment via consent decree, has jurisdiction to determine a violation of the latter's decree, whether the terms of plaintiff's standard form of license agreement violate the terms of the decree to which it consented, and, if it does, whether violation renders the patents unenforceable in an action for infringement.

[Jurisdiction of Court]

Plaintiff takes the position [that] only the Ohio Court, which retained jurisdiction,[16] should interpret the Ohio judgment. The retention of jurisdiction by the Ohio Court does not exclude by implication in this court the recognition of plaintiff's obligations under the decree. The Ohio Court acceded to this view when it declined to accept jurisdiction both on the application of defendant (to fix royalty fees) and the petition of the Attorney-General (to enforce the consent decree). This court now has competence at this juncture to test plaintiff's adherence to its obligations in so far as it may prejudice recovery in this infringement action. If the decree is wrongly interpreted, or the consequences which flow therefrom are wrongly judged, the power rests with a higher body to set it straight.[17]

The final judgment of the Ohio Court was not an adjudication of issues of fact or law in that action. It did not constitute evidence or admission of any such issue.[18] Nevertheless, since a violation of the laws of the United States was in issue in the Ohio proceedings, the provisions of its decree, to which the United States consented, became a declaration of public policy to govern the future behavior of the named defendants. The master fact, then, is that plaintiff, a defendant in that action, consented to the entry of judgment and it thereby assumed obligations with respect to the licensing of its patents. It follows, if under the terms of its licensing agreement, plaintiff violated the terms of the decree, plaintiff must be prevented from enforcing its patents in an action for infringement such as in the instant case here. This is in keeping with time-honored principles of equity. Defendant, as a prospective licensee, has shown itself as a corporate personality within the purview of the decree. Clearly, it may seek its protection here.

[Licensing Policy Violates Decree]

10. Passing to precise questions of violation, I find the terms of the standard form of license agreement employed by present plaintiff, The American Securit Company, is in conflict with Paragraph XIV B and Paragraph XVII(1)(a) of the Final Judgment rendered in C. A. 5239 in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio, Western Division, between The United States of America, plaintiff, and Libbey-Owens-Ford Glass Company, et al., defendants. Paragraph XIV B of the decree forbids the inclusion of any restrictions or conditions whatsoever in any license granted by the corporate defendants, except certain enumerated ones.[19] The terms of plaintiff's standard licensing form impose a condition heretofore described,[20] which clearly is not within the scope of any of the excepting provisions. Consequently, it is the type of condition which the Ohio decree was designed to combat. Plaintiff, in this regard, further violates Paragraph XVII(1)(a), which specifically prohibits the licensing of any patent upon the condition that the licensee shall accept a license under any other patent owned or controlled by the licensor.[21] The argument of plaintiff that any variance in its licensing policy in defendant's favor, or otherwise, would have resulted in discrimination against the existing licensees[22] is without merit. While I appreciate the sensitiveness of a licensor not to discriminate among licensees, it has not been demonstrated by heeding defendant's wishes for the licensing of individual patents at royalty rates distinct from the package rate, plaintiff would have traveled the sure road to discrimination. On the contrary, such a change by plaintiff in its licensing policy would have been in line with its legal obligations under the Ohio consent decree.

[Defense]

I conclude, therefore, plaintiff's standard form of license agreement violates the terms of the consent decree rendered by the Ohio Court, and defendant, here, may assert the violation of that decree as a defensive shield to ward off the infringement action of plaintiff in this court.

[Right to Use Patents]

11. These findings make it unnecessary to decide defendant's final contention, except to note that the provisions of the Ohio judgment dealing with the court's determination of reasonable royalty rates and interim royalty rates seem to be expressed in terms of prior filing of an application. The difficulty is that, read apart, the filing of the application appears to be permissive and not mandatory upon the applicant. In the event no application is filed, the inference, then, is these provisions cannot be brought into play, with the result that implementation of the decree becomes seriously impaired.

[Motion Granted]

For the foregoing reasons, defendant's motion for summary judgment as to Counts I through IV of the Complaint is granted. An appropriate order may be submitted but only after there is a determination by trial, or otherwise, of the remaining counts in plaintiff's complaint.

Memorandum

[Contempt]

DAWSON, District Judge [In full text]: This is a motion brought on by an order to show cause for an order adjudging the defendants in contempt for violation and contemptuous disregard of a certain temporary restraining order signed by Judge Levet on June 13, 1957 and extended by Judge Dawson on June 19, 1957, pending determination of an application for an injunction pendente lite.

[Restraining Order]

The temporary restraining order issued by Judge Levet prohibited the defendant Association and individual defendants and the members of the defendant Association, their agents, servants, employees and attorneys and all persons in active concert and participation with them from failing in concert to enter their horses in the races scheduled to be held at Yonkers Raceway on June 14, 1957 and thereafter, from refusing in concert to drive their horses or the horses owned by members of the defendant Association in said races, and from otherwise impeding, obstructing or interfering, by any act or failure to act, with the conduct of said races at Yonkers Raceway.

[Alleged Violation]

The plaintiff contends that the defendants, or some of them, violated the temporary restraining order by acting in concert in failing to enter their horses in races scheduled to be held at Yonkers Raceway after June 14, 1957, and by refusing in concert to drive their horses or horses owned by members of the Association in said races, and by impeding, obstructing or interfering with the conduct of said races at Yonkers Raceway. Defendants deny any concerted action.

There seems to be no dispute that following June 29, 1957 a number of defendants removed their horses from Yonkers Raceway and/or refused to file entries to participate in races at Yonkers Raceway. It was conceded that the defendants had knowledge of the temporary restraining order.

[Concerted Conduct]

The primary issue is, of course, whether the acts of the defendants were done in concert and in contemptuous disregard of the temporary restraining order.

There was no direct proof that the acts of the defendants in withdrawing their horses or refusing to enter horses in races at Yonkers Raceway were done in concert or by agreement, expressed or implied, between the defendants. To prove "concert" plaintiff must establish something more than an inference. The Court, in the restraining order, did not restrain individual action on the part of the defendants, or action not taken in concert, nor would the Court have had the power to do so.

Plaintiff presented proof that a number of the members of the Association attended a meeting held at the Hotel Gramatan, in Bronxville, New York, on June 29, 1957, at which meeting defendant Smith, as president of the Association, read the following statement:

"Gentlemen: I have a brief statement to make to you as president of the SOA.

"It is my duty and obligation to inform you that you must honor all the horses that you have entered to race at Yonkers Raceway as of this time.

"As your president, I would also like to inform you that it is your obligation to fulfill all your commitments and to race at Yonkers Raceway all entries made by you up to this time.

"I wish to advise you further if you so desire that you do not have to enter any horses to race at Yonkers Raceway from this time on unless you hear otherwise from me.

"I would also like to advise you, if you so desire, that you can remove your horses from Yonkers Raceway at this time until you hear otherwise from me to the contrary."

Following that meeting a number of the members of the Association removed their horses from the track and did not enter their horses for future races. As a result the number of horses entered in races at the track declined considerably and there has been some decrease in attendance at the track and in pari-mutuel betting at the track.

Mr. Smith testified that previous to this meeting on June 29th he had been advised by his attorneys that the restraining order had expired by passage of time and was no longer in effect, and that if he had not been so advised he would not have read the statement quoted above, for in that event, it might, in his opinion, have been a violation of the restraining order.

It is not necessary for a determination of this motion to decide whether the restraining order had expired by passage of time. Even if we assume that the temporary restraining order continued in effect the Court finds that nothing in the communication read by Mr. Smith at the meeting held on June 29th establishes by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the defendants were taking "concerted action" to violate the restraining order. All that Mr. Smith advised was that the individual members could take such action as they individually chose to take and that the restraining order prohibited concerted action but did not prohibit individual action. The testimony of Mr. Brown, an officer of the Association, who attended this meeting, was to the following effect:

"The Court: Was any question raised that if anyone removed his horses it would be a violation of the Court order? Did anyone raise that question?

"The Witness: I think they did, and they were told that if they did it in concert—if they wanted to go and race somewhere, they had a perfect right to do so, but not to get anyone else to do it or to make sure that nobody got them to do it.

"That's all that was clarified. Whatever they did was their own feelings, and nobody else had anything to do with it."

In the absence of proof that the defendants agreed between themselves to take prohibited action the Court finds that the plaintiff has failed to establish by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the defendants or any of them violated the temporary restraining order.

[No Violation]

The Court finds that plaintiff has failed to establish sufficient facts to warrant the drastic remedy of finding the defendants in contempt.

The motion is denied. So ordered.
